Mr. G. Lamb did not think a satisfactory answer had been given to his hon. friend's objection. His own objection indeed went still further, and he wished to see the names both of the lord-lieutenant and the custos rotulorum struck out of this clause. The power of calling public meetings ought to be confined to persons not under the direct influence of government. Both lords-lieutenant and custodes rotulorum had lately received a pretty plain lecture as to what they were to expect, if they attended against the wishes of his majesty's ministers at public meetings. They now well knew, that if they granted them in such a case, a loss of office would be the probable result. He objected in particular to the creation of too many authorities. It was a vulgar but just observation, that what was every man's business was no man's business. If one officer should refuse to hold a meeting, another might feel disinclined to take a different course. So it might be said with regard to that further provision which extended the same power to grand juries. They would not choose to interfere where others had refused. He wished to see this important authority in the hands of those whose offices were not dependent on the mode in which they exercised it.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. Philips wished some provision to be made applicable to towns in the situation of Manchester, otherwise no meetings at all would take place, except such as were agreeable to ministers. Even on such a question as the continuance of the income-tax, the boroughreeve had refused to call a meeting.

Mr. Brougham said, he was sure the noble lord must see the necessity of yielding to this demand. By the bill, as now drawn up, there could be no meeting of whole towns, except they were cities, boroughs, or towns corporate.—Was it known to what extent this exclusion would operate?—They would exclude not only Manchester, more important perhaps than any other town, but several other most populous and important cities; for cities they were, though not so in a legal sense. They were to exclude Birmingham, Sheffield, Wolverhampton, which, though in law only market towns or villages, had grown, by means of the trade and manufactures of the country, to exceed in importance those places which were called cities. It was to exclude also, he believed the borough of Southwark—[The solicitor-general signified his dissent]—He was informed, at least by persons acquainted with the constitution of the borough of Southwark, that it did not come within the description of a borough corporate.

The Solicitor-General said, it was not necessary that the place should be a borough corporate.

Mr. Brougham said, that the words of the bill were "city, borough, or town corporate," which, in the ordinary interpretation of the phrase, would lead to suppose that it was necessary that the place should be a borough corporate. It was not, however, on the case of the borough of Southwark that he meant to rely, but on those of the great towns which were obviously excluded. He addressed himself particularly to the independent part of the House (there were persons who in every other sense might be called independent, who were connected with the parties which divided it, but) he meant those who kept themselves aloof from any party :—could they, he would ask, find any solid reason why towns, like York or Exeter, which were cathedral towns, should be allowed to have general meetings, under the same circumstances under which Manchester, Birmingham, and other places, which only differed from the cities he had named by being more populous, more wealthy, and every way more important portions of the community, could have no meetings? He could not help also agreeing with his hon. friend, in the objections made to the naming of lieutenants and custodes rotulorum, and he thought the power should be given to freeholders of certain qualifications to call meetings of their own authority.

Mr. Alderman Waithman said, at present it was the undoubted right of the subject to petition; the clause before the House deprived them of it. What, for instance, would be the case in the city of Bath, where a small corporation of twenty or thirty persons were elected by one another, and who were altogether unconnected with the people, so that the members who took their seats for that place were as secure as if they had possession of a freehold estate. In the city of London also, requisitions, signed by eighty and one hundred persons, had been refused, and when the citizens had taken the only opportunity that had occurred to state their sentiments, they had been prosecuted by the attorney-general. It was better to say at once that the bill was to repeal the Bill of Rights, or to confine the meetings of the people to those parochial ones which alone it would be possible to be held. As to the six days notice which was made necessary, what would become of the right of petition, when the noble lord followed the example which he had now set of hurrying through the House bills against the constitution? What petitions could overtake him? If a bill was brought in to repeal the Habeas Corpus altogether, and Yorkshire or Devonshire, or any other distant county was to be called upon, the bill might be passed before the petition, with the utmost expedition which this new law admitted, could be decided upon. He wished to have a clause inserted to compel the magistrates, when called on by a certain number of persons, to call meetings. The bill, if passed in its present state was a repeal of the Bill of Rights, and a subversion of the constitution.

Earl Compton said, he had to propose an amendment, which was in accordance with the principle on which he had supported the bill. That principle was, that the right of meeting was a valuable part of the constitution, though the limits within which it should be confined, had of late been overstepped. He wished to grant the power of convening a county meeting to twenty freeholders possessed of at least 100*l.* per annum, in the county; or, if the number of twenty was deemed too small, to thirty. He wished to lay down the principle, that property had a right to be heard, and also to relieve the magistrates from the odium of refusing meetings, when the sanction of that number of respectable persons could not be obtained—when it could be conceived there could be no danger from the meeting. If this bill was to continue, which he hoped it would not (though the suggestions of his noble friend were rather ominous), some such clause as that which he proposed was the more necessary. He had consulted many of his friends who were not in opposition to ministers, and they saw much objection to the bill as it stood. He had, therefore, offered this amendment as not being attached to any party, but if to any, rather to that of the ministers, he had thought it would come with a better grace from him than from those who opposed the bill altogether.

Mr. Maxwell referred to the power to be granted for calling meetings in Scotland. In Scotland, he said, the sheriff, being an officer appointed by the Crown, was in some measure an objectionable person in whom to repose the right of refusing or sanctioning public meetings. The same observation might be made with respect to the lord advocate. He should therefore propose, as an amendment, that after the words "or any meeting called by the convener of any county or stewartry," the following should be inserted—"or ten persons legally qualified to be commissioners of supply." These were persons of respectability, who had a great stake in the country, and therefore were not likely to give their countenance to meetings which were calculated to place that stake in danger.

Lord Castlereagh said, that this amendment was the same in principle as that proposed by his noble friend, and, if it were adopted, would at once go to destroy the very end which the bill was framed to secure. The object of the bill was to prevent those tumultuous meetings which had heretofore taken place, and at which so much pains had been taken to subvert the constitution. The ordinary practice was, for the sheriff of the county to convene public meetings; and it was now proposed to associate with him a certain number of the magistrates of the county, in whom a confidence might be reposed, for the preservation of the peace, and the suppression of those acts which might be injurious to the public welfare. If, however, power were given to twenty freeholders, in such a county as York, to convene a meeting, no such confidence could exist; for the House very well knew that there would be no difficulty whatever in gaining the consent of twenty freeholders, qualified as his noble friend had described, to countenance proceedings which might be altogether at variance with the principles of this measure. In refusing to accede to this proposal, too, no real injury would be done to the right of petitioning; for the inhabitants, although not permitted, unless under certain restrictions, to meet in large bodies, would still have the means of meeting in their respective districts, and of coming to such resolutions as their supposed grievances might warrant. It was the meeting in military array, and under circumstances of strong disaffection, that had induced his majesty's ministers to propose this bill; and it was as a security against such alarming assemblages, that it was proposed to make the presence of responsible persons necessary. If meetings were to be called by twenty freeholders, no such security would exist; and it was with this conviction on his mind, that he should set his face against the amendment of his noble friend.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, the bill was altogether of such a nature, that he could not even attempt to improve it without some degree of pain. At the same time he could not help observing, with regard to both amendments, that the observations of the noble lord who had just addressed the committee only showed the excess to which he was willing to carry that principle in his own mind which had led to the proposal of this measure—he meant a principle of distrust towards the people of this country. His distrust was not merely directed towards those wild and visionary politicians of whose doctrines the House had heard so much, nor even to the lower classes of society; but was directed towards those country gentlemen who, from their situation and character, were least likely to excite suspicion. That which the noble lord meant to insinuate was, that twenty freeholders, of 100*l.* a year each, were so blind to their own safety, or so ignorant of what was due to the safety of the country, that they would unite in calling a county meeting under circumstances which must necessarily be productive of great danger to the community. The same observation of course, applied to the persons to whom he had referred in the amendment respecting Scotland. The qualification legally required in Scotland for a person holding the situation of a commissioner of supply, was 100*l.* a year; and could it be supposed that those persons would unite to call a meeting which they must know from the state of the country would be attended with danger? He begged leave to say, too, without meaning to detract from the rights of the gentlemen of England, that in Scotland this would be more justly conceded than in this country. In Scotland there were no grand juries; and to this was to be added the fact, that the sheriff was an officer appointed by the Crown, holding his situation for life, and looking to the Crown for his promotion to some high judicial situation. If the people were to look to him alone, therefore, for calling them together, it was scarcely necessary to say, that circumstances might occur in which his inclination might be in opposition to their wishes. While he was on his legs, he would call the attention of the House to the state of the boroughs of Scotland. It was well known that the large cities there were governed by corporations; and it was likewise well known that there was not a single city in Scotland in which the corporate body, the head of which was to have the power of convening meetings, had the slightest connexion with the population of the country. They were appointed by one another, and invariably elected their own officers.

Lord Normanby said, that though he had felt it necessary that some steps should be taken with respect to public meetings, he had felt great repugnance to the continuance of the bill for a long period, which repugnance had been much increased by the objections which he had heard the noble secretary of state offer to the amendment of the noble earl. He found now that meetings were to be prohibited, not merely when called by demagogues, or by the lower classes, but when called by persons of property. They were told, however, that the people might meet in smaller divisions, but even in those cases the magistrates, by frittering away the time, might render the privilege in many cases nugatory. This opinion had actuated him in voting on the last night for making the duration of the bill as short as possible, and the rather, because he felt that he could not vote for limiting the bill in point of space. He should most willingly support the amendment, but would suggest that the number of freeholders should be greater than twenty.

Earl Compton said, he would willingly alter the number to thirty.

The Lord Advocate said, that if the amendment of the noble lord were adopted with respect to England, he should have no objection to its adoption towards Scotland. But he apprehended that, with respect to Scotland, it was not at all necessary. The persons authorized to call meetings in Scotland were, in the first place, the sheriffs or the stewartry. It was very true that the sheriff was appointed by the Crown, but he was not removable by the Crown; and he believed he might with perfect confidence state, that there was no instance in which this officer had ever sacrificed his duties from any influence used on the part of the Crown. The conveners of the county were appointed for the express purpose of convening public meetings; and he believed there was no occasion on which a convener had been called upon, in which he had refused to call a meeting. He thought those persons fully adequate to all the purposes of assembling the people in Scotland. He might add, that from the nature of the commission of the peace in Scotland, all persons qualified for becoming commissioners of supply were included, whether they were in favour of government or not.

Mr. Mansfield considered that if this amendment were adopted, the bill might as well not be passed at all. This bill was intended to protect the loyal and peaceable inhabitants of the country, and if the restrictions proposed were agreed to, it would prove fatal to those who wanted to put down sedition and rebellion. He believed twenty freeholders might be got in any county, who would call a meeting for improper purposes. What reason was there for confining all the virtues of the community to freeholders of 100*l.* a-year? Why not extend them to freeholders of forty shillings a-year? Were they not as loyal as those of 100*l.* a-year? He thought the proposed amendments were extremely absurd, and calculated to destroy the object of the bill.

Mr. Brogden reminded the committee that the amendment of the noble earl was not under their consideration.

Lord Althorp said, that the amendment of the noble lord, and that of his hon. and learned friend, were the same in principle. His only object in rising was, to state that the qualification proposed by his noble friend, to entitle 20 or 30 freeholders to call a meeting, was precisely the same as that which qualified an individual to become a justice of the peace. The only difference was, that the noble secretary of state made 5 freeholders of 100*l.* a year each, sufficient to watch over the safety of the public peace, while his noble friend proposed that that number should be extended to 20. He did not conceive that there was any danger in this regulation, and therefore he should vote for the amendment.

The Attorney General appealed to the experience of the committee, whether the mere fact of holding a freehold of 100*l.* a year was considered a sufficient qualification for appointing a magistrate. It was true, that a qualification of that nature was considered necessary; but there were other qualities still more important that it was requisite he should possess. The principle of the present bill was to prevent those meetings which were so frequently called without legal authority. It had often been doubted whether a sheriff had, in point of fact, the power to call the county together. This doubt the present bill would set at rest. It should be recollected too, that the grand juries of counties, to whom a power was also given to call meetings, were almost all magistrates. [Cries of "No!"]. During his experience on the circuit which he had been in the habit of going, this had been the case; and in addition to this, the same power was given to the lord-lieutenant, and custos rotularum; so that no restrictions could exist which were not in all respects necessary to suppress meetings, which no man who had looked to the state of the country for some time past could deny were highly dangerous to the public peace. He denied that the sheriff was an officer of the Crown; it was true that he was appointed by the Crown, but then the names of three persons were sent by the county as fit persons to hold the office, and the Crown only selected one of them. In his opinion, however, no sheriff who valued his own character, would merely from political differences refuse to call a meeting of the county. With respect to the amendment, he conceived that it struck directly at the principle of the bill, and if it were adopted, the House might as well not pass the measure at all. It could not be denied that in such a county as York or Lancaster, twenty freeholders qualified in the way which had been stated, might be found capable of giving their sanction to proceedings directly at variance with the good order and peace of society.

Mr. Kennedy thought, that even if the amendment proposed with respect to England were rejected, yet that the amendment respecting Scotland ought to be adopted. In Scotland, the people would labour under greater disadvantages than those in England; while in justice both countries should be placed on the same footing. In the first place, Scotland had no such person as a custos rotulorum. In the next place, the lord-lieutenant was a military officer, and therefore one upon whom the people could not rely for affording them the means of political discussion. Then the sheriff was an officer appointed by the Crown, and held a judicial situation, with which it would be extremely improper to mix up political animosities. It would be highly injudicious to impose upon that officer a duty which was calculated to diminish the universal respect in which he was held. As to the convener of the county, it was true that that individual was liable to be removed from his office, if he did not act according to the pleasure of those who appointed him; but he was one of the people themselves, and had only the power of calling together the commissioners of supply. It was customary, indeed, for that officer to summon meetings of the county; but he had no right to do so.

Mr. Denman supported the amendment of the noble lord. This provision, if inserted in the bill, would be expressly the same in principle as the clause relating to parish meetings; for, supposing notice to be given in the one case, as was required to be done in the other, there would clearly be no difference between them. The attorney-general had said, that the clause as it now stood was consistent with the other parts of the bill, which required the sanction of some legal authority to a meeting; but this he denied altogether, for there was, in fact, nothing in the principle of the bill that said the constituted authorities must be present. It appeared to him, that the proposition of the noble lord coincided perfectly with the other provisions; and the argument of his learned friend was clearly unfounded, because, of all the authorities mentioned, the sheriff was the only one that could be considered legal; and the lord-lieutenant, if he attended at all, must do so in the character of a military officer. As to the argument of another hon. member, that this provision was intended to support the right of the people to meet, he could not see on what view it was founded, unless taking away the rights of the people was synonymous with supporting them.

Lord Binning, in reply to the argument of the hon. and learned gentleman, said, he would mention, with submission to the learned gentleman, that there was a difference between the principle of the amendment proposed respecting county meetings, and that which in the bill was applied to parish meetings; and that difference consisted in the notice of meeting which was required in the latter case. His hon. friend had said, that in Scotland there was no custos rotulorum; but it should be considered that in that country the lord lieutenant had, in some degree, the appointment of the magistracy. The next security provided in the bill was the sheriff of the county. An hon. and learned gentleman, however, had described the sheriffs of Scotland as persons who looked to the Crown for preferment, and therefore not likely to act in opposition to the wishes of ministers. He doubted whether this was generally the case; but at all events, admitting it to be in some instances true, it did not universally apply to the sheriffs of Scotland. The matter, however, did not rest with the sheriff; for the convener also might call a meeting, and though the convener was entitled only to assemble the commissioners of supply, still it was known that county meetings were generally called together by that officer. As to saying that magistrates would not be found who would call a meeting contrary to the will of the minister, it could not be denied, whatever gentlemen might say for the sake of argument, that there were as many magistrates attached to opposition principles as there were to ministerial.

Lord Ebrington observed, that it had been asked whether in such counties as York and Lancaster, the requisition of twenty freeholders of 100*l.* a year each could be called a sufficient security: in reply he would state, from his knowledge of the fact, that there was no class of his majesty's subjects better disposed towards the constitution than that description of persons—the independent yeomanry. If the object of the noble lord was to put down dangerous meetings only, the proposition of his noble friend, if adopted, would have that effect; but if the original clause were carried, it would take away the right of meeting altogether. He should therefore give his hearty support to the amendment.

Lord Castlereagh said, that no meetings were touched by this provision, but those that were held out of doors; and, therefore, the question was narrowed to this—whether the House would have the security of the magistrates for the safety of such meetings, or throw them open to the will of evil-disposed persons."

Mr. Boswell suggested, that by omitting that part of the 25th clause which preceded the words "within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland," the power of calling a meeting would be reserved to the same magistrates in Scotland as in England.

Sir Robert Heron wished to set the Attorney-General right in what he had said respecting the sheriffs. He himself knew an instance in which a sheriff had been hired by the Crown after the person appointed to the office had refused to accept it. [Cries of name, name.] He should not name the gentleman who accepted the office, because he did not wish to hold him up to public view; but the person who refused it was Mr. Calcraft, of Lincoln.

Lord Strathaven begged leave to inform the hon. baronet, that Mr. Calcraft did serve the office of sheriff.

Sir R. Heron said, that was perfectly true, but it did not in the slightest degree contradict what he had asserted. Mr. Calcraft did serve the office of sheriff for the county of Lincoln last year, but the proposition to which he had alluded had been made to him several years ago.

Mr. Bathurst said, the hon. baronet did not seem to know that if the person appointed to the office of sheriff made an excuse, the Crown had no power to appoint another, except from the list of those nominated. It was evident, therefore, that if Mr. Calcraft refused this office, the person who did accept it could not have been appointed by the Crown, except according to the regular forms.

Mr. R. Martin declared, that if the amendment was passed, he would immediately apply for leave to return to Ireland. He thought it very likely that twenty persons of the description proposed by the noble earl might be disposed to call a meeting for a very improper purpose. He would appeal to the committee, whether the sense of a county might not be better taken in small sections than by assembling large meetings. He protested against such meetings as the noble earl proposed to call by his twenty freeholders, at which no person would be able to make himself heard by his lungs, or in any other manner than by banners and flags [A laugh.]

Sir C. Monck said, that if the object of the noble earl was only to regulate these meetings, and not to prevent them altogether, he ought to state what would be a proper amount of the tenures of freeholders to constitute a sufficient security for the proper conduct of a meeting. If this were specified, the requisitionists might send the requisite security to the lord-lieutenant, and the latter ought then to be bound to call a meeting. If this was not to be the case, parliament was taking away the right of meeting.

Earl Compton suggested, that if twenty freeholders did not afford a sufficient security, the number might be increased to thirty, in those counties which were supposed to be in a disturbed state, such as York and Lancaster.

Lord Castlereagh said, that if he understood the noble lord, he had now three distinct propositions before the committee. Finding that the first was not tenable, the noble lord had told them to throw the bill over the table, and thus send his hon. friend off to Ireland. The noble lord had said, that it should be compulsory on the sheriff to call a meeting; that because the people were not pleased to meet in parishes, and because twenty persons could be found in the county who wished to call a meeting, the magistrates should charge themselves with the public peace.

The noble lord, however, seeing that this proposition was no more palatable than the other, came at last to his strong hold, and proposed to take away the principle of the bill, and therefore he (lord Castlereagh) considered his last position the most untenable of all. He was of opinion, that unless the noble lord wished to render the bill entirely nugatory, he must withdraw all the three propositions.

Sir C. Monck was surprised that the noble lord considered it a new proposition, that a sheriff or a magistrate ought to comply with a requisition to call a meeting. Whenever an officer was intrusted with authority, any person subject to that authority might call on him to exercise it for the protection of his rights; and if, under such circumstances, a magistrate refused the protection required, the court of King's Bench might issue a mandamus to compel him. He wished to know whether the sheriff should be compellable to call a county meeting on the requisition of twenty freeholders of 100*l.* a year. He had no objection to raise the qualification to 200*l.* or even 500*l.*, but he was anxious to know the terms of the amendment precisely.

Lord Falkstone wished the House to understand the proposition of his hon. friend behind him (Mr. Maxwell), which he was sure was not generally understood, as the situation of the commissioner of supply in Scotland was confounded with that of freeholder in England. He begged the committee to remark, that county meetings could be convened in England by officers who did not exist in Scotland, or who could not by this bill exercise the power of calling meetings. In Scotland there were lord-lieutenants as well as in England; but in England they could call meetings, while in Scotland they could not by the present bill. In England there was a custos rotulorum who could call county meetings; in Scotland there was no such officer. In England the sheriff could call county meetings, and the same power was lodged with the sheriffs in Scotland; but in that part of the kingdom, looking to the Crown for preferment, sheriffs could not be expected to be very friendly to meetings called to complain of grievances. In England five justices of the peace could call meetings; in Scotland, if he rightly understood the bill, they could not. In Scotland there was an officer who could call county meetings unknown in England—he meant the convener of the commissioners of supply; and this officer was said to have the singular property of never refusing to assemble the county upon a requisition properly signed. The noble lord wished there were such officers in England. Some difficulties, however, might be thrown in the way of meetings if they depended solely on the convener, who might be out of the county. The convener of Renfrew was a member of the House, and in attending his duty in parliament, might find it impossible to comply with a county requisition in Scotland.

Lord A. Hamilton differed with his noble friend who had last spoken, on the construction of the bill. It gave to lords lieutenant and five magistrates, the same power of calling county meetings in Scotland as in England. If this were not the case, he wished the attorney-general to declare so.

The Attorney General said, the act, applied to Scotland in the same manner as to England, with the difference only of the denomination of the officers.

Mr. Brougham allowed that the attorney-general might mean to apply the bill to Scotland, but he had not used sufficient words. The law should be precise, and not taken on the interpretation of the attorney-general.

The committee divided—For the amendment of Mr. Maxwell, 81; Against it, 261: Majority, 180. Lord Compton then withdrew his amendment, in consequence of seeing the sense of the committee against him, by the previous decision on the amendment applicable to Scotland. On the clause for convening parochial or district meetings,

Mr. Alderman Wood proposed as an amendment, that the power of calling the meetings should not be limited to aldermen in the city of London, but extended to three or more of the common council of the ward. If the power was confined to the aldermen, there were many wards that never would be permitted to hold meetings. They had no halls. The churches were, on the Manchester business, refused, and therefore unless the power was given to the deputies, or some of the common council, as was now the practice, a great proportion of the inhabitants of the city of London would be denied the right of expressing their complaints by petition.

Lord Castlereagh did not think the objection of the worthy alderman warranted any special regulation. There were rooms sufficient in the wards where they could assemble; and if any difficulty on that head existed, he could recommend them a very convenient place in his neighbourhood, namely, Willis's Rooms. He must object to the amendment, as it was directly opposed to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Alderman Wood believed the noble lord would not be much pleased at meeting ten or twelve thousand persons marching up to any meeting in his neighbourhood. He was determined to take the sense of the committee.

Mr. Alderman Waithman believed that the amendment would destroy the principle of the bill; for as its object was to destroy the right of petitioning altogether, therefore any amendment that went to give a facility to the exercise of that right was at variance with the principle. The measure itself was so hateful that he was not disposed to recommend it by any modification. Let it go out with all its imperfections on its head, to meet that public reprobation which it would experience.

Sir W. Curtis opposed any alteration in the old practice. He thought the aldermen of London fully entitled to confidence, and it was not to be presumed that they would abuse it. For his own part, as an alderman, he should not like to be interfered with by the common council.

Mr. Alderman Wood said it was notorious, that many of the aldermen constantly refused to convene ward meetings. It was better at once to declare that three fourths of the inhabitants of London should not meet at all.

Mr. Alderman Waithman rose, but was received with loud laughing on the ministerial benches. He said the reception he met with was too often tried to have the effect of dismaying him. It was undeniable that many of the aldermen of the city of London uniformly refused to convene ward meetings. In his ward, which contained one-fifth of the population of the city of London, his predecessor never would call a meeting: it was uniformly done by the deputy, or some of the common council.

The gallery was twice cleared for a division, but none took place. On our return we found alderman Wood contending for the insertion of words calculated to extend the powers given to corporate bodies by the bill, to the livery of London. It was understood that a clause to that effect would be subsequently proposed.

Lord Castlereagh proposed the insertion of words, for the purpose of bringing all meetings in the open air, called for the purpose of deliberating on questions of trade, manufactures, wages or professions, within the operation of the bill. The noble lord founded the propriety of his proposition on the abuse which had been practised on such meetings, where persons assembled for the avowed purpose of discussing the interests of their trade, or the state of wages, were diverted from that subject, and led to consult on resolutions of a wholly different nature, such as annual parliaments and universal suffrage.

Mr. Marryat referred to the meetings of merchants, bankers, and traders, of the city of London, which, on occasions of great emergency, had been held on the Royal Exchange, no room being large enough for the purpose. Two meetings of this description had taken place within his recollection; one when so much danger was apprehended from the propagation of French revolutionary doctrines, the other on the suspension of cash payments by the Bank. The resolutions passed at those meetings had been productive of the happiest effects; had strengthened the hands of government, and given confidence to public credit; but as this bill now stood, no such expression of the sentiments of that great and respectable body could in future take place. In his opinion, all restrictions upon the meetings of commercial men were unnecessary. They could only be too numerous for any room to contain them, in a few large cities; and where that was the case, their opulence, and consequently the stake they had in the public welfare, must be commensurate with their numbers.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that he had the highest veneration for meetings of the character alluded to by the hon. member: the last thing he should apprehend would be, that sufficient authority could not be obtained for the assembly of the merchants and bankers of the metropolis.

On reading the clause empowering magistrates or justices of the peace to allow meetings to be held in parishes,

Mr. G. Banks suggested the propriety of making some provision with respect to extra-parochial places. The principle of the bill was to give to all ranks of people a right to meet somewhere or other for the purpose of petitioning, and therefore it was necessary that persons who resided in extra-parochial districts should be distinctly recognized. A provision similar to that contained in the militia acts would answer every purpose.

Lord Castlereagh said, he had clauses to bring up at the close of the bill, which would meet this and other objections.

On reading the clause which directs that the notice of an intended meeting shall be personally served on some justice of the peace residing near the parish or township in which such meeting is intended to be held,

Mr. Bernal objected to it, and contended, that the notice ought to be considered sufficient, if it was left at the usual place of residence of the justice.

The Attorney General said, the clause was framed for the purpose of preventing persons who wished to hold a meeting for an improper purpose, from purposely leaving notice at the residence of the justice, when they knew he was absent.

Mr. Bernal said, that as the clause stood, a magistrate, not wishing to have a meeting in his parish, might absent himself purposely. In that case, what power had those persons who were desirous to call the meeting of effecting that object?

Mr. G. Lamb expressed his concurrence in the propriety of the objection.

Mr. Bathurst defended the clause as it was framed; which, after a few words from lord Compton, who argued that the alteration proposed was unnecessary, was agreed to, without amendment.

When the clause was read which enacts that there shall be no adjournment of meetings held for the purpose of deliberating upon any public grievance,

Mr. J. P. Grant objected strongly to it. He conceived it was a great hardship, where individuals were unable to bring to a conclusion at one meeting the business they had met to transact, that they should not be allowed to adjourn to a more convenient time.

The Solicitor General defended the clause, which was, he said, framed to prevent the unnecessary extension of public meetings.

The clause was agreed to. On the clause being read pointing out the description of persons who should be deemed eligible to attend county meetings,

Lord Castlereagh stated, that he had an amendment of some importance to propose. The alteration was, to allow persons holding freeholds of the amount of 50*l.* per annum, in any county town, being in itself a town and county, to attend county meetings. He proposed this sum, because it was possible, if the sum was very trifling, to create fictitious freeholders; but when the freeholders was of this amount, the notoriety of the fact would prevent spurious freeholders from making their appearance. Persons who were legally entitled to attend a meeting would thus be enabled to detect and take into custody, individuals who might wish to intrude themselves, and whose presence would give such meeting a character of illegality. If freeholders of the lowest grade were admitted, their numbers in many county towns were so great, that persons who did not possess any claim whatever to the character might mix amongst them, without detection; but a fifty pounds freehold had attached to it sufficient notoriety to prevent the chance of an intruder of that kind passing without discovery.

Sir R. Fergusson said, he despaired of improving or rendering palatable a bill which was so highly unconstitutional. As it applied to Scotland, it was exceedingly defective. Unless the word "heritor" were introduced, as well as "freeholder," a great body of respectable men, men possessing considerable landed property in that country would be prevented from meeting. He begged leave to advert to what the noble lord had lately said with respect to certain manufacturers of Scotland, which, although perhaps it was not intended, conveyed a severe calumny against that body. The noble lord had stated, that a meeting of manufacturers had recently been held for the purpose of considering the rate of wages; but that a few radicals got amongst them, and they immediately forgot the subject they had met to discuss, and proceeded to debate on a political question. In the name of a large body of people in the county to which he belonged, he believed the noble lord's statement to be totally without foundation. There were a great number of manufacturers in the county of Fife, and to their honour he could state, that although their wages were reduced to a mere pittance—a pittance not sufficient for their subsistence—they behaved with moderation and propriety. A radical meeting took place in that part of the country about a month ago. Very few attended it. The parties by whom it was projected passed through a populous town containing from 15,000 to 20,000 inhabitants; but scarcely more than 100 persons joined them. There were said to have been 500 persons present on that occasion—of these he believed very few were radical reformers; and he was convinced that even those who were, harboured no designs against the state, but were merely following up the foolish notions of major Cartwright. He wished farther to state, that, while the manufacturers were thus peaceably conducting themselves, the wages which some of them obtained for labouring fifteen hours a day, amounted to but 2s. 6d. per week, and the best manufacturers did not receive more than six or seven shillings per week.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that his only object was to make the reality of the freehold so much a matter of notoriety, that it could not be mistaken.

Mr. W. Smith adverted to what he conceived the groundless fears of the noble lord, as they regarded the facility with which the qualifications to attend at these meetings, might be transferred to radicals by actual freeholders. They would surely be more eager to retain their qualification in quietness, than to be at the trouble of vesting others with it.

Mr. Wynn, in alluding to the fourth clause of the bill, said, that he did not see, as it was at present worded, how it would be in the power of the magistracy to exclude a great number of persons, who, without being freeholders, might attend all meetings to which freeholders were summoned by name, and insist upon overhauling their proceedings.

Sir R. Heron observed, that in the county to which he belonged, it had never been the custom or practice to confine meetings called by the sheriff to freeholders only.

Lord Althorp wished to ask, whether it was the intention of the hon. gentleman to say, that every person, not a freeholder, but attending such meetings of freeholders, would be guilty of a misdemeanor?

Mr. Wynn certainly did mean to affirm, that any inhabitant, or householder, had no more right to attend such meetings, provided they were summoned as meetings of freeholders, than any other description of persons whatever.

The Solicitor General said, that the object of the clause to which the hon. gentlemen alluded, was, that any meeting, whether of householders or freeholders, which was attended according to the limitations of the act, should be held to be a lawful meeting. But it did not take away the same right which was before secured to freeholders, of excluding from their meetings any other persons.

Mr. Primrose said, that if he understood Mr. Wynn correctly, he meant to make the act more severe than had been intended even by ministers themselves. The hon. gentleman's intention seemed to be, that an inhabitant or householder attending a meeting of freeholders, would become guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to two years imprisonment.

Mr. Honywood wished to ask whether the clause was intended to apply to the county which he represented. The election took place always in the public road, so that no traveller could help mingling with such an assembly, and rendering himself by consequence liable to the penalties of the bill. He needed not observe, that this would be a most flagrant violation of the constitution.

Lord Castlereagh apprehended that it would be necessary to protect meetings against improper intruders by a police much stricter than had hitherto been employed for that purpose.

Sir C. Monck hoped the hon. gentlemen on the bench below him would not forget to remind the noble lord, at a future stage of the bill, of the proposed admission of copyholders, as well as freeholders, to these meetings.

Mr. Graham, member for Hull, wished to suggest the case of a meeting called for the purpose of putting in nomination a new member to represent a town or county in parliament, a parliament having been just dissolved. In such a case, would the old member have a right to attend his constituents, to render an account of his past conduct in their service? His reason for asking the noble lord this question was, that he happened to represent a town of which he was neither a freeman nor a householder. There might be other honourable gentlemen similarly circumstanced with himself. He was not, however, anxious about the fate of any one clause in particular of this bill, for he objected to its principle altogether.

Lord Castlereagh had supposed that meetings for the election of burgesses could not be imagined to fall within the scope of this bill; and it seemed impossible that any difficulty should be cast upon the case put by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Brougham contended, that the difficulty of his hon. friend was perfectly natural and well-founded. That some difficulty, in whatever degree it might have been anticipated, was pre-supposed by ministers themselves, was clear from a part of the clause which concluded thus—"Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to any member of the Commons House of Parliament attending any such meeting, as aforesaid, in any county, city, borough, town, or place, for which he shall be serving in parliament." But this provision only extended to members actually serving; not to those gentlemen who had served.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that if a meeting was convened for an innocent purpose, to discuss whether it was a fine day, for instance, or to debate upon an election, the law did not interfere; but if they proceeded afterwards to topics leading to the overthrow of the constitution, that was the case in which the penalties would be incurred. But as he had already stated, he was willing to put the cases of elections entirely out of the bill.

Mr. Brougham declared, that the noble lord had not removed the objection by any thing he had said, and pledged himself to show, when the clause was brought up, that it was far from being an answer to it.

Mr. Williams proposed as an amendment, to enable all persons who had a right to vote for members of parliament in corporate towns to attend at meetings for the discussion of any matters arising out of the conduct of their representatives.

After a few words from lord Castlereagh, the gallery was cleared, but the amendment was negatived without a division. Lord Althorp proposed an amendment, which went to confine the operation of the clause, which makes it a misdemeanor for non-residents to attend public meetings, to those who spoke.

Lord Castlereagh said, that one of the most valuable properties of the bill was, that it put the magistracy in the situation of ascertaining that most difficult of all points, the exact state of circumstances under which meetings were liable to be dispersed by the powers of the law. If it was not a misdemeanor to attend such a meeting, any person might come to it—there might again be assembled meetings of 100,000 men, and therefore no object would be gained by passing the present bill. Casual comers to these meetings were kept free from harm by the words, "knowingly and wilfully," which had been added to the clause.

Mr. W. Smith maintained that the clause, as it now stood, was contrary to the practice of the constitution as it existed from time immemorial. He could suppose a case, which was not at all an improbable one. A member on vacating his seat and going into the country, might pass through some town with which he was totally unconnected and in which a public meeting might be convened. Anxious to hear how the good people of the town argued on political questions, he might go to the meeting, and then, according to this clause, he would become liable to all the severe penalties which this bill created. This was a sufficient reason to induce him to vote for the amendment.

Mr. Marryat considered the provisions of this clause unnecessarily severe: The curiosity which the noble lord on the treasury bench had inveighed against in such strong terms of reprobation, and was so desirous of repressing, had been hitherto considered not merely as innocent, but laudable; being nothing more than a desire to gain information on those political topics, in which every subject in a free country had a direct and legitimate interest. When the noble lord expressed his apprehensions, that such numerous assemblages of the people as had lately taken place at Manchester, might again occur, he forgot the other clauses of the bill which effectually guarded against that danger. Surely if the meetings were divided and subdivided into sections of parishes, if the magistrates had the power of regulating them both as to time and place; if parties were prohibited from coming to them in military array, or with arms or weapons of every description, or with drums or any kind of music, or with flags, banners, emblems, or other insignia, ample precautions were taken against their being too numerous. The truth was that nineteen people out of twenty who attended the meetings in question, went there out of mere idleness or curiosity, and not from any interest they felt in the political questions that were to be discussed there. They went as they would go to a fair, to a fight, to a race, to a review, or to any public exhibition; but now all the attractions that had led them there were taken away, they would go no longer. The other clauses of the bill not only guarded against these meetings being numerous, but against there being dangerous, for even if ill disposed persons did attend, they must come without weapons and consequently without the means of doing mischief; and if any proposition was propounded, or a single syllable uttered, which the magistrate thought might tend to bring his majesty's government into contempt, or excite the people to sedition, he had the power of immediately dissolving the meeting. For these reasons, he considered this clause wholly unnecessary. The committee should recollect, that they were legislating, not for the radical reformers alone, but for the well affected and loyal classes of his majesty's subjects, and therefore they might not go farther than the necessity of the case actually required. If they adopted measures of unnecessary harshness and severity, they would run the risk of alienating those who were entitled to be treated with every degree of tenderness and conciliation, and might aggravate the evils they intended to avert. He should, therefore, feel himself bound to vote for the amendment of the noble lord.

Mr. Robinson said, that hon. gentlemen appeared to misunderstand this clause entirely. If they considered it attentively, they would see that it was absolutely necessary in order to give effect to the intentions of the bill. Unless some provisions were made to prevent the inhabitants of one parish from attending the meetings of another, the entire population of different parishes might flock together upon any meeting called in one of them, and all those evils be created which the country had so much reason to deplore.

Mr. Primrose thought that the right hon. member when he stood up so vehemently for this clause, had forgotten the penalties which were contained in another part of the bill. The enactments of the present bill were far more severe than those of the Riot act, and yet owed their origin to a state of affairs much less dangerous. Indeed, the clause which punished with transportation for seven years any person who did not depart after proclamation was made to disperse, was so severe that it would inevitably destroy itself. To attend a meeting in a district to which an individual did not belong, was also to be punished with two years imprisonment: a strong necessity ought to be shown before such a punishment was inflicted upon an action which in itself was innocent. The haste with which it was attempted to carry these bills through the House was extreme; as that time was not allowed to the people for petitioning against them, which was generally allowed them on a common tax bill. If it had not been for the recent discussions upon them, which had occasioned the delay experienced in forcing them through the House, this bill would have passed in all its original deformity, and would in the language of the noble lord who introduced it to their notice, have been "a permanent beneficial bill for the people." As to the present clause, it would not affect those who were engaged in any treasonable conspiracy; it would not affect those who, to use another of the noble lord's phrases, were in a state "almost bordering on rebellion;" but it would affect, and it was passed for that purpose, the independent part of the community, and would prevent them from assembling in such numbers as were necessary to give effect to the object of their petitions or remonstrances.

Mr. Bathurst supported the clause, on the ground, that if the amendment were passed, it would render the whole bill ineffectual.

Lord Folkestone did not know whether he could make that subject clear on which his noble friend had endeavoured, but apparently in vain, to enlighten gentlemen on the other side. But with what justice could it be said, that it was intended, by this amendment, to render the whole bill nugatory, when it left so many of its penalties in full force? One of his reasons for voting for it was, because he did not deem it right that any person who went by chance and innocently to a public meeting in another district, should be rendered liable to an imprisonment for two years, and, what was still worse, to a discretionary fine of an unlimited amount. The intention of the bill was, it was said, not to suppress discussion, but to put down itinerant orators. Did not his hon. friend's amendment provide as strongly as any clause now in the bill for that object.

Mr. Brougham rose, and after commenting on the arguments against the amendment, proceeded to state, that even under this bill great county meetings might be regularly called. Now, it was evident that great and important affairs might occur, which, even in the opinion of a lord lieutenant, a sheriff, or any of the other bodies who were to be empowered with authority to convene meetings, might require a meeting to be convened. It might be of the very greatest importance to call such a meeting, and it might be of no less importance that the proceedings at it should be accurately and correctly given to the public. How was this in future to be done? Not by those who usually gave the reports of such proceedings; for an hon. and learned gentleman opposite had treated those individuals as if he considered them far below his notice. Nay, if it were not for the free constitution of the country, which the attorney-general was using his every endeavour to subvert, he did not know whether he would allow them to exercise their functions at all. The attorney-general had said that it did not signify whether they were allowed to attend public meetings or not. He (Mr. B.) was of a very different opinion: it signified much to the country; it signified much also to themselves. It was their trade, it was their profession, just as much as it was the profession of the attorney-general to appear in a court of justice to defend his clients, or in that House to defend the rights of his constituents. The wording of this clause, therefore, was of much importance to the reporters, and also to the country; for if the country had not these men to perform these duties, how would it have, what was of the last importance, correct accounts of public proceedings? The country might indeed still have reports; but how must those reports be obtained? The attorney-general, who stood on such an eminence, might not know the manner in which these reports were obtained; but he who was not so elevated, he who was nearer in station to those who gave them, knew it well. He would say it confidently, that the reporters would not come under any of the exceptions mentioned in the bill. They were not freeholders of counties, they were not freemen of boroughs, they were not resident inhabitants or householders within them: how, then, could they attend public meetings under such restrictions as were now contemplated? No, the country must be left without any intelligence from them, let the subject on which a meeting is called be ever so momentous. There had been at former periods meetings to inflame the loyalty and patriotism of the country—meetings which were attended to by the Houses of Parliament.

Those meetings for general purposes would have been rendered useless and ineffectual by such an exclusion as was contained in this clause—an effect which he acquitted the noble lord of having intended, for he was convinced that the noble lord's object was only to exclude Mr. Hunt and his columns. The proceedings, therefore, at meetings, how important soever, could not be known to the public. Who could, he would ask, give an account of their proceedings to the public? The first personage there was the lord-lieutenant; but he was not likely to be an accomplished short-hand writer. The next was the high sheriff, a very respectable person, but not likely to be an adept in stenography. There were besides the freeholders, the yeomen, and the country gentlemen, and admirable reporters they would make! These, if the member for Montgomeryshire obtained his object, would be the only persons allowed to attend county meetings. He would ask, then, what tolerable chance of an accurate account of the proceedings could exist, if this exclusion formed part of the bill?

The Attorney General hoped the committee would excuse him for saying a few words in reply to the most unprovoked and most undeserved attack which had been made upon him. He had not said a syllable on the subject of reporters, and yet the hon. and learned gentleman had said that he had treated them as if they were unworthy of his notice. He asked, what had called forth such an attack upon him? He had been paying all the attention in his power to the noble mover of the amendment, and to the hon. and learned gentleman, and had intended to reply to their arguments, as well as his humble talents would enable him. But there was nothing said or done by him which could relate to reporters, but as they might come within the provisions of the act. What right had the hon. and learned gentleman to suppose that he had so treated reporters? But how did the hon. and learned gentleman himself propose to treat them? He would leave them within the reach of the clause making it felony to remain after proclamation to depart. He hoped the committee would excuse him if he showed some warmth, because the attack made upon him was most undeserved, unprovoked, and, he could not help saying, with a view to make him obnoxious to that respectable class of persons with whom he did not expect to stand on the same footing as the hon. and learned gentlemen. He would now offer some remarks upon the proposed amendment. The clause would prevent the attendance of strangers. It was therefore necessary, in justice to those who legally attended, to make it a misdemeanor in others to attend. Such a clause would ensure the legality of the meeting, and prevent persons from incurring the harsher penalty of felony.

Mr. Brougham explained. He had been led to make the remarks he had made, not merely by the cheers, but by the attitude of contempt with which his hon. and learned friend had received the first mention of reporters [Cries of No, no! from the back seats of the ministerial side.] The hon. gentlemen behind might easily say no, no; but they could not possibly have seen his reason for misunderstanding his hon. and learned friend. He admitted that he had misunderstood him. He thought that he had even heard his hon. and learned friend contemptuously repeat the word "reporters." At least, this was not the first time in which notice had been taken by members, not only of words spoken, but of cheers and gestures.

The Attorney General said, it was for the committee to form their opinion, whether any cheers or gestures on his part had deserved the remarks made by the hon. and learned gentleman. He had no recollection that he had cheered at all. He had been remarking upon the arguments used, to his learned friend who sat next him.

The Solicitor General said, that his hon. and learned friend had remarked to him, that the clause would have the effect of excluding reporters, but had not cheered. The hon. and learned gentleman ought to have been satisfied, and thoroughly satisfied, before he had replied in the style he had done.

Mr. Denman lamented the interruption which had arisen from this altercation; and regretted the warmth into which the attorney-general had suffered himself to be led. He regretted the tone of the attorney-general, produced by the altercation to which he had alluded, because he thought he had opposed the amendment in consequence, with greater vehemence. His objection to the clause was, that it kept alive quarrels at meetings. Why should it not be left to the discretion of the magistrates to suffer strangers to remain to the conclusion of the meeting? Strangers might be present, properly and meritoriously, as at meetings when the distinguished candidate at Liverpool delivered speeches, and might listen for the purpose of improving their minds. The amendment would have been so much for the interest of the other side, that he had hoped the clause would have been withdrawn, but for the personal altercation which had taken place.

Lord Castlereagh said, there had been nothing in the gesture or manner of his hon. and learned friend to justify the remarks that had been made. If any thing had occasioned those remarks, it had been on his lordship's part, not from disrespect for the persons alluded to, for whom he felt no disrespect, but because he had said that the amendment, if introduced for the purpose of admitting reporters, would alter the whole frame of the bill. The noble lord then defended the clause against the objections urged by the opposite side.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that in his opinion there was a great deal in what had fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman on the other side, of the importance of admitting reporters. He thought it of very great importance that we should know what was done at public meetings. Publicity had been of the greatest service during the late meetings; it had opened the eyes of the country to the views of those who agitated it. But he was aware of the difficulty of admitting the amendment, because a great number of persons might attend in the first instance, and occasion much inconvenience and mischief, if the clause were withdrawn. He, therefore, did hope that provision might, in some other way, be made for those whose object was reporting.

Mr. Maxwell agreed in the importance of giving publicity to the proceedings of public meetings. He opposed the amendment, because persons had come from Manchester and Leeds to tell those who conducted meetings in his part of the country, what they should say, and how they should act. The radicals had also availed themselves of the attendance of persons from mere curiosity, and had represented them as friends of annual parliaments and universal suffrage. He was decidedly against the radicals, though a sincere reformer, and representing a part of the country abounding with sincere reformers; yet he thought that free discussion ought to be permitted to the radical reformers, and he considered it of great importance that reporters should be present at their meetings, and at all other meetings.

Mr. R. Martin thought it prudent to prevent reporters from attending meetings. It would be dangerous to let publicity be given to the seditious nonsense of parish parliaments.

Mr. S. Wortley said, that if the object, which he thought a great one, should be adopted, it ought to be introduced in a clause by itself.

Lord Castlereagh said, that if at all introduced, it should be in a specific clause; but he thought it a very serious question whether reporters ought to be allowed to attend.

The amendment was negatived. Mr. W. Smith said, he conceived it was highly improper to proceed further at so late an hour (past one) and moved that the committee should report progress. Lord Castlereagh observed, it was not an hour usually considered inconvenient for business. Mr. W. Smith said, he felt it a public duty to prevent matters of such consequence to the public from being proceeded in at that hour, and he should take the sense of the House on the question. The committee then divided: For the adjournment, 34; Against it, 166: Majority, 132.

Mr. Brougham trusted it was not intended to go into any of those clauses which were likely to produce discussion. The result of the division, he presumed, would only be to agree to those parts of the bill on which no controversy was expected to arise. This, indeed, he took to be the understanding of many who had voted with the majority; and he must be permitted to add, that it was in this view only that he and his friends could consent to give the committee no further trouble.

Lord Castlereagh knew that there were certain means by which a minority might protract the passing a measure, and retard the course of business in that House. But it was a great error to suppose that those on his side had understood, that, after such a division, any hon. members would think it consistent with their public duty to put in force this power of renewing motions for adjournment. In his conscience he believed that the public safety was deeply involved in the immediate progress of this measure. The hon. and learned gentleman, who was thus induced to oppose it in every way, had, a few nights since, risen at a much later period, and had spoken two hours, not certainly confining himself with much strictness in any part of that lengthened address to the question before the House. Yet now, such was the feebleness of that circle of friends by whom he was surrounded, that he appeared determined to throw every obstruction in the way of a bill that went to provide a remedy for as great an evil as any with which this country had ever been threatened. At all events, he felt satisfied that the House and the country at large would think that he had only done his duty in bringing the question to an issue with the hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. Brougham remarked, that he had been represented as having troubled the House on a late occasion for two hours, upon a subject still more general and various than the present. He begged leave to say, that he had then addressed the House, and at that length with great and unfeigned reluctance. The reason was not, that he was reluctant to discharge a public duty. The pain he felt arose from perceiving that he addressed himself to so many members who seemed determined to hear nothing that differed from those views which they had already taken. He grieved to say, that he had then found himself in a House of Commons ready to pass the most severe measures against their constituents, and which would hear nothing in their defence—a house, that while it was dwelling upon the tumult and confusion of other popular assemblies, and regarding all other popular assemblies as a rabble rout incapable of any deliberation, was itself an audience which had given him a reception not often experienced at the most stormy meetings. He must confess he had felt ashamed. The reason for the length at which he had troubled them on the occasion alluded to, was the speech of the noble lord's right hon. friend (Mr. Canning), whose speech had occupied three hours in its delivery. No doubt, it would have been very convenient to the noble lord, that that speech should have been left unanswered. This, however, had not squared with his own notions of public duty. His impression was, upon the present subject, that the numerous clauses of this most important bill could not be properly discussed or investigated at that hour. On its future stages, he could assure the noble lord, that he and his hon. friends would not refuse their assistance in rendering the bill more effectual for its purposes; as in its present shape it was not adapted to the ends professed to be had in view. And he implored the House, if immediate alarm had not utterly indisposed them to all candour and deliberation, not to press forward such an alteration of the ancient law as this bill was about to introduce.

The motion for reporting progress was then renewed, and carried unanimously. The House then resumed; and the chairman reported progress.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, December 8.

TRAINING PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh having moved that this bill be read a first time,

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that some circumstances had recently come to his knowledge which made him think it necessary that this bill should go through all its stages in as short a time as possible. Up to this time it had been said that training existed only in Lancaster. He had now documents in his hands which showed that it extended to Yorkshire, and was spreading to an alarming degree. He had been informed that a number of persons had been seen drilling in the neighbourhood of Barnsley last Friday night. He immediately wrote, desiring his informant to lay his depositions before sir — Wood. He held sir — Wood's letter in his hand. It stated that the training at Barnsley was notorious. He had also a second letter, containing the examination of persons whom it would be imprudent then to name, who had witnessed trainings of upwards of 200 men near Barnsley, on the nights of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. The men had poles about eight feet long, which they exercised as muskets. On Monday night deponent was within 150 yards of these men, and it being light, he could see on the tops of the poles something shining like bayonets, and which he believed to be pike-heads. This morning he had received a letter from a gentleman named Forbes, a man whose politics were rather opposed to his own. That gentleman had witnessed a body of from 70 to 100 training on the night of Tuesday the 30th ult. They had poles about 8 feet long in their hands; and he distinctly heard the words halt—march—stand at ease, &c. repeated several times. Two of the party advanced towards him, and asked his business; he answered—"What the d—l are you about?" The men returned to the party, and he fearing danger, rode away. Since this he (Mr. Wortley) had been informed that the drilling was openly carried on, not only at Barnsley, but at Barton and the neighbouring towns, in defiance of the law. He hoped the House would see the danger which existed, and the necessity of preventing it from gaining ground, by speedily passing this bill into a law.

Mr. Tierney said, that no one could be more anxious than he was to put down any of those practices against which this bill was directed. But at the same time he was desirous of proceeding with due caution, and in such a manner as not to establish a precedent for mischievous measures hereafter. The House would see that they were now called on to proceed without observing their usual forms, not on any communication made by his majesty's government, but on a communication made by a private individual, however high the character of that individual might be, and whatever credit might be due to what had the sanction of his authority. It was singular enough that these communications, instead of being made by lord Sidmouth, or even by the lord lieutenant of the county in which the training was said to take place, who was a member of that House, should be made by one of the members for that county. With respect to the practice of training, if this practice was not already liable to animadversion, he was willing to make it so. He had thought that by the existing laws, this practice could be stopt; but he now understood this was not the case. If the practice was not now punishable, it ought with all convenient dispatch to be made so. No friend of liberty could wish a practice of this sort to go on unchecked. But, then, see how the House was placed. There was nothing on their journals as a warrant for their proceeding, which was merely founded on the communication of an individual member of the House. When the House at once passed the bill suspending the Habeas Corpus act, they proceeded on a message from the throne, and a communication from his majesty's ministers, and it was proper to pass the measure, if at all, without delay, because otherwise the parties against whom the measure was directed, having notice of it might make their escape. But here there would only be two or three days more drilling at most, and if the numbers drilled, instead of 2 or 300 were 2 or 3,000, he did not think that would make much difference. He was on this occasion as sincerely desirous as the noble lord opposite could be of coming forward fairly to put down the practice of training, but he could not help thinking they would be laying the foundation for a dangerous precedent, if they were to pass this bill summarily, without evidence.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the Crown had already made a communication to the House with respect to the existence of the practice of training, and, therefore, in passing the bill in the manner proposed, they would not be proceeding on the information of any individual member. But if they were to pass the bill two stages to-night, and to go into a committee to-morrow, perhaps this would be satisfactory to all sides.

Mr. Curwen said, that much as he lamented the existence of the practice of training, he could not entertain the smallest doubt, that this practice had taken place in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, as he had received the information from various respectable persons who had seen the parties. He owned that at one time he was in considerable doubt as to the fact of trainings taking place; but now he had not the least doubt. The inhabitants of the neighbourhood were most anxious that a stop should be put to this practice without delay.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, that his noble friend, the lord lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire (lord Lascelles), had felt it his duty to leave town last night for Yorkshire, after the adjournment of the House. He was the more anxious this bill should pass without delay, as a meeting was advertised to be held at Barnsley on Monday next, and it was held out by those people who proposed to attend the meeting, that they were to go armed—a circumstance which had caused no small alarm in that neighbourhood.

Lord Louther expressed his conviction, that training in a regular manner, had been practised to a great extent in the northern counties.

The Lord Advocate bore his testimony to the existence of similar practices in Scotland.

Sir James Graham said, that the inhabitants of Carlisle were under very great alarm, lest they should be attacked. At the same time he must say, the inhabitants in general were well-disposed, and the number of the disaffected very small. He did not believe the number of those who were badly disposed exceeded 4 or 500; but still these persons had arms in their hands, and were able to destroy the whole place. The cutting down of plantations had taken place to a great extent, for the purpose of obtaining staves to their pikes. The magistrates discovered that pikes had been made by blacksmiths to a very great extent. One of those who communicated the circumstance to the magistrates had received an order to make twelve dozen of pikes; but the other blacksmiths who had received orders did not choose to make any communication. Every inhabitant of Carlisle looked up to his majesty's ministers for protection, and if they did not receive that protection from ministers, they would look up to the opposition for it [laugh]; for they must have protection.

Mr. Brougham said, he was rather surprised that any magistrates should entertain a shadow of doubt as to their power of preventing these nightly drills. If seventy or eighty men, even if they were armed only with clubs, but certainly if they were armed with pikes, met at midnight, or under the cloud of night, for the purpose of training, there was only a shadow of difference between this crime and the highest crime known in law, that of levying war against the state. Surely those who thought the meeting at Manchester illegal, ought to think a meeting by night of persons, armed with pikes, illegal. Those who saw these practices ought to have given warning to the magistrates, who should have called out the yeomanry, and if the yeomanry were insufficient, the military also, to put down these trainings, and endeavour to secure some of the persons engaged in them. It was now between two and three months since he was in Carlisle, and he then heard the same account which was now given. Good God! where were the magistrates all the while? As to their saying they looked to his majesty's ministers for protection, and then to the opposition—he would merely observe, why did they not look to their own magistrates? He had no manner of doubt that the practice of training was illegal, and a new law was only advisable to adopt penalties more specific than those of the common law of the land. The measure would also have the effect of a parliamentary denunciation against those mischievous persons who dared to commit such an offence.

The Attorney General said, that several individuals had been committed for trial, at the last sessions, for the offence of training, but they had traversed. It was undoubtedly true, that if it were possible to establish the purpose for which men met armed by night, that amounted to high treason; but the hon. and learned gentleman must know, that there was a great difficulty in getting at that proof; and then they could only be indicted for the lowest offence in law—misdemeanor. But, in consequence of the traversing, there had been as yet no conviction, and consequently no example had been made. He needed only to state also, what was seen from the papers before them, the difficulty of getting evidence as to such training, the persons who had gone to see them having been attacked and maltreated. He trusted that the alarm now felt would induce individuals, at all hazards, to put down this practice, and that they would not suffer themselves to be intimidated by threats from doing so. After this act, he had hopes that the specific punishment would have the effect of preventing the repetition of this act. It had been said, if the Manchester meeting was illegal, surely there could be no doubt these nightly meetings were illegal; but the Manchester meeting had been held up to the country as a legal meeting, and thereby considerable difficulty had been thrown in the way of magistrates.

Lord Stanley was surprised at the incredulity which the hon. member for Carlisle intimated, that he had till recently entertained with regard to the existence of these practices. All he could say was, that in the county of Lancashire they had been going on for a long period, and it was matter of general astonishment that legal proceedings had not been before instituted. Several persons had indeed been apprehended, but no prosecution had followed, and they were dismissed on promises of good behaviour. This was done, he believed, from doubt as to the illegality of the offence charged. He agreed with Mr. Brougham, that it was an offence at common law; but if it were not, it evidently ought to be made one; for it created not only alarm, but real danger.

At the same time he did not wish to see it adopted without some time for consideration.

Mr. Curwen said, his original doubt existed, because he had not at that time met with any person who had actually seen this drilling and training practised. Whatever might be the case in Lancashire, he was firmly persuaded that the far greater part of the people in Cumberland were loyal and well disposed. He never would believe until the fact was proved to him, that any men could be desirous of overthrowing a constitution under which they enjoyed so many blessings.

Mr. S. Wortley was quite satisfied with the mode proposed by his noble friend, which would mark, in some way, the feeling of the House. He had no hesitation, on the part of the magistrates of Yorkshire, in saying that they considered themselves perfectly warranted in proceeding against the persons who met for training: the only difficulty was in obtaining proof against individuals—but he believed such proof was now obtained, and he expected some of them were in custody.

Mr. J. P. Grant concurred in all that had been said, as to the immediate necessity of putting down practices which were as illegal as they were dangerous. He wished, however, to learn whether they were not understood to be confined to very small districts in Scotland.

The Lord Advocate replied, chiefly to the neighbourhood of Glasgow.

Sir C. Burrell thought that the information communicated by magistrates should always be treated with respect. It was too much the custom, on one side of the House, to represent such information as coming from government spies.

Lord Folkestone gave his assent to the object of this measure, which he should have thought useless if the magistrates had done their duty.

Mr. Calcraft agreed that training was an offence which ought to be put down. The House by showing an unanimous opinion to that effect, would, he was satisfied, recover many from delusion, and secure the punishment of irreclaimable offenders.

The bill was then read a first and second time.

NAVAL EXPENDITURE.] Mr. Hume called the attention of the House to the subject of our present naval expenditure. A resolution, he observed, had been passed respecting it, when the last three millions of new taxes were imposed. Six months had since elapsed without any attempt at reviewing this expenditure. His own opinion certainly was, that not one pound ought to be spared in order to render our naval force efficient. This was due to the honour as well as to the safety of the country. It was at all times of more vital importance than the state of our army; and however splendid the recent achievements of the latter, they had been preceded, and an opportunity opened to them, by the unrivalled victories of our navy. When he compared, however, the present expenditure for this branch of the public service, being between 6,000,000*l.* and 7,000,000*l.*, whilst we had only 19,000 seamen, with that of the years 1791, 1792, and 1793, it appeared enormous. The chief cause of the increased expense was, the much greater number of ships now employed. We had no less than 607 ships, of which 97 only were at sea. Although at the present moment there were 607 ships in his majesty's service, yet there were no less than 120 other vessels building in the different dock-yards. From the estimates on the table for 1819, the expense for building alone was 1,850,000*l.*—a sum which, at a period like the present, he submitted, was far beyond any necessity which could exist. The great point, however, to which he wished to call the attention of the House, was the extraordinary disproportion between the disbursements in this department during the years 1792, 1793, and 1794, and those of the present period. If the papers for which he should move were granted, the House would be enabled to see the real state of the case. Surely, no satisfactory reason could be assigned for building new ships, which would cost upwards of a million sterling, at a time when we had more than 600 sail capable of being called into immediate service; and at a time, too, when every consideration demanded a decrease, rather than an increase of the public expenditure. He could not refrain on this occasion, too, from stating how much he regretted the addition which, within the last few days, had been made to the marine force. These corps might now be considered almost as a part of the standing army. They were no less than 8,000 strong—a number far exceeding their strength at any former period. Their utmost amount heretofore was 5,000 at any one time. He had submitted the motion with which he should conclude, to the proper officers, and he believed there was no objection to meeting his wishes. It was thought that some difficulty would arise in furnishing the details of the accounts which he required; but this difficulty would be obviated when he stated, that he only wanted the totals or aggregates of the expenditures during the years to which his motion would refer. The hon. gentleman concluded by moving, That there should be laid before the House a return of the total number of Ships and Vessels belonging to the royal navy during the years 1791, 1792, and 1793, and during the years 1817, 1818, and 1819, distinguishing their different rates, the number of each employed at sea, and the number in ordinary during each year; a return of the number of ships building for the royal navy during each of the above years; a return of all charges incurred for building the same; a return of the total amount of the charges under each separate head, with a statement of the sums actually expended during the three years ending in 1794, and the three years up to the present time. If these accounts were submitted in a succinct manner, the House would see that the question was of the first importance, and that, in the single department of building, a very considerable saving might be made.

The question having been put from the chair,

Sir George Cockburn said, he did not rise to promote debate, nor to oppose the production of these papers, so far as they could be given. But it appeared to him, that the larger part could not be made up with sufficient accuracy for the hon. gentleman to found any argument upon them. As far as they could be given, however, they should be laid on the table of the House. There would be no difficulty whatever in furnishing correctly the accounts for the last three years; but those for the years 1792, 3, and 4 were kept in such an irregular manner as almost to preclude the possibility of laying them before parliament in a satisfactory state. The hon. gentleman in the course of his observations, had indulged in remarks which were altogether erroneous; one of these was, that a great many ships were rotting. This applied of course to the ships which were in ordinary. Now, the fact was, that so far from such ships being in a situation to rot, they were actually improving; and, in proportion to the time they were in ordinary, their excellence increased. Thus it was said, "if you let her lie two years longer in ordinary she will run ten years; or, if you let her lie four years, she will run twenty years;" and so on. In truth, it had long been a subject of anxiety to discover the means of curing that most destructive enemy to ships of war, the dry rot. It had, at length, been ascertained, that exposure to atmospheric air was the true remedy; and, therefore, vessels were opened from one end to the other, and exposed as much as possible. The effect of this management was, that the navy had never been in a better state than at the present moment. With regard to the necessity of continuing to build, he could only state, that many of the old ships were falling to decay, and therefore it was necessary to supply their place. The policy of keeping up this vital force of the country was too obvious to require a single comment.

Sir Joseph Yorke said, he thought the object of his hon. friend, in bringing forward this motion, had been mistaken. What he conceived to be his hon. friend's intention was, that by the production of these papers, such a disproportion would be found to exist between the expenditure of 1792, 3, and 4, and the expenditure of the last three years, as would lead the House to see that a very great reduction might be made in the supplies granted for the service of the navy. In the propriety of this proposition he fully agreed, and he saw no reason why there should not be as great a reduction in the manufacture of ships of war as in the other manufactures of the country. He perfectly recollected an answer which he gave to an hon. member who had formerly belonged to that House (Mr. Whitbread) on this very subject. On that occasion, allusion was made to the great extent of ship-building; and he said, that this must be the case as long as the dry-rot was permitted to continue its ravages, and that until vessels were built under cover, it never would be undiminished. Since that period every vessel and every ship was covered; consequently the destruction must have become much less. He perfectly agreed in the expediency of preserving unbroken the naval strength of the country, but he saw no sort of necessity for carrying on such enormous expenditure. As he was now on his legs, he would take the opportunity of alluding to the manner in which a very meritorious individual, to whose services the country was greatly indebted, had been treated. He alluded to sir Robert Sepping, who, although he had received the honour of knighthood, and had been particularly recommended by that House as deserving of pecuniary reward, had not received a single shilling. He would say no more on this subject at present, and should conclude by expressing his conviction, that a considerable reduction might be made in the naval estimates.

Sir Isaac Coffin felt it his duty to offer a few words in defence of that highly meritorious corps to which the hon. mover had alluded—he meant the royal marines. If it had not been for the integrity and loyalty of this corps, the whole fleet under lord St. Vincent, at the time of the mutiny, would have been carried into Ireland. It was to the conduct of the marines alone that the safety of the fleet, as well as the preservation of the lives of the officers, was to be ascribed. He had repeatedly seen them in service, both on shore and on board, and never knew an instance in which they had not manifested great courage, zeal, and loyalty. He therefore maintained, that in adding 1,000 men to the marines, the House was not turning them into a standing army.

Mr. Croker regretted that the hon. mover should have brought forward this subject now—not that he meant to say that a subject of such importance ever came amiss, but that many of the papers included in the motion would, as a matter of course, be laid on the table of the House, with the navy estimates for the year; and therefore, an additional degree of trouble and expense would be incurred. From what quarter the hon. gentleman had obtained his information respecting the expenditure for the navy for the years 1792, 3, and 4, he was at a loss to conceive; but most certainly he did not seem to be in possession of all that might be collected on the subject. If he had consulted the Journals of the House, he would have found, that, in addition to the estimates for those years, there was always a very large disbursement, the effect of which was, the creation of the navy debt which had subsequently been funded. When, however, the House proceeded to the discussion of this subject, he pledged himself to prove, when they looked to the size of the ships, and the other necessary differences in the state of the service, that there was by no means that enormous difference of expense which the hon. mover would insinuate. With regard to what had fallen from his gallant friend (sir J. Yorke), though he differed from him in the view which he had first taken of the question, yet he felt satisfaction in the opportunity which was afforded of paying a most deserved compliment to him for the great attention which, for many years, he had devoted to this particular branch of the public service; and he had the pleasure of stating, that the very system which that gallant officer had recommended was that which those now in office were studiously pursuing. When ships decayed, it was necessary that their places should be supplied. The hon. mover had said, that there were 120 vessels on the stocks; where he had got this information he knew not, but had he consulted the papers which were already before the House, he would have found his error; for most certainly his account was greatly exaggerated. With reference to the actual state of the navy, without any regard to the temper or disposition of foreign powers, it had been considered expedient to keep a proper number of ships fit for service. Beyond this number, which was founded on a sound view of the policy of the country, no increase had taken place. The House would therefore see, that they were not building at random; and that they were not, as had been stated, manufacturing vessels merely for the sake of building them. He begged also to allude to the observations which had been made with respect to sir Robert Sepping. Of the merits of that individual no man entertained a higher sense than himself. It was only last year, however, that the recommendation had been given to the committee of finance, to grant him a sum of money in consideration of his great merits. So far the admiralty had done all that was in their power to farther his claims. The committee of finance had since resolved, that he should receive 5,000*l.*, and the Prince Regent had confirmed that resolution. From the shortness of the period which had elapsed since the meeting of parliament, no opportunity had been afforded for completing this object. The Prince Regent had also been pleased to confer upon Mr. Sepping the honour of knighthood.

Sir Byam Martin said, that when the papers which had been moved for were produced, he would take upon himself to say, that the hon. gentleman would be found to be incorrect in every point to which he had alluded. He would pledge himself to prove, that he was wrong in every instance to which he had called the attention of the House. He wished to say, that the accounts referred to in the motion could only be obtained with great inconvenience, arising from the incorrect manner in which the naval accounts had been kept in the years 1792, 3, and 4; and when they were produced, he thought they would be more likely to mislead, than to inform the House. He begged leave to say also, that, two years ago, the committee of finance kept him before them for a full hour, with a view to ascertain whether they could not get rid of one poor unhappy clerk. If, therefore, his department was now to be called upon to undertake an increased portion of labour, he trusted no objection would hereafter be made to a considerable addition to the estimates; for it was impossible to go on without an enlargement of expense.

Mr. Hume, in reply, pledged himself, when the accounts were produced, to prove every one of his allegations; and, with regard to the expense of these accounts, he would undertake for five pounds, if they would give him the inspection of their books, to obtain all he desired. He could not but complain of the spirit in which this motion had been met, after he had endeavoured to reduce it into that shape which was likely to be the least objectionable. For his own part, he could see no rational ground for objecting to the papers, nor could he discover what difficulty would be found, unless indeed it was said, there were no accounts at all for the early period to which he referred. If there were such accounts, and this had not been denied, then all he wanted was an abstract of their totals or aggregates. He was particularly anxious that these papers should be in the possession of the House before the discussion of the estimates for the service of the year.

Mr. Croker thought the hon. gentleman had no reason to complain of the spirit in which his motion had been met, when all that he had asked had been at once acceded to. The hon. gentleman was however mistaken when he supposed that the papers for which he had moved were to be obtained without trouble. He was ignorant of the manner in which the public accounts were kept and therefore could form no correct judgment on the subject.

Sir Joseph Yorke observed, he did not wish to make any invidious comparison, yet he considered, when the services of sir Robert Sepping were contrasted with those of Mr. Graham, a Bow-street magistrate, who had received 5,000*l.*, that such a sum was extremely inadequate to the merits of the former. He thought that he should at least have had 10,000*l.*, at all events, the grant of 5,000*l.* was very paltry.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the 5,000*l.* to Mr. Graham had been granted upon his resigning a lucrative situation, in consequence of ill health; whereas sir R. Sepping still continued to receive the emoluments of a profitable office.

The motion was then put and carried.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for the House resuming the committee on this bill. The House having resolved into the committee accordingly, the chairman proceeded to read the eighth clause of the bill, which enacts, "That if notice shall purport, that any thing by law establish may be altered, except by authority of King, Lords, and Commons, &c., the meeting shall be deemed an unlawful assembly."

Mr. Denman said, he considered this clause, as totally unnecessary, inasmuch as before the meeting could be assembled the magistrates must be satisfied that the objects for which it was called were not of an improper nature. According to this clause, after the meeting had been assembled with the sanction of the magistrates, they would have the power of exercising their caprice and dispersing it.

The Attorney-General said, that this act did not give a magistrate the power of dispersing a meeting without previous notice.

The ninth clause, which enacts that if any person or persons shall attend a meeting contrary to the provisions of this act, and shall not depart within a quarter of an hour after proclamation to that effect has been made, the meeting shall become illegal, and every such person remaining shall be guilty of a felony—having been put by the chairman,

Lord Althorp said, he thought that some amendment to this clause should be proposed, to prevent a magistrate from dispersing a meeting while there was any one person of a different parish present.

Lord Castlereagh apprehended it would be dangerous to oblige a magistrate to draw a line of distinction respecting the number of strangers that should render a meeting illegal.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that the first proclamation directed to be made by the magistrate, declared the meeting to be unlawful, and the second made the persons so remaining liable to the penalties of a felony. Now he begged to know, what was the right construction of that clause? because, from the ambiguous manner in which it was worded, 20,000 or 30,000 people might be made guilty of felony by the obstinacy of one person.

Mr. Denman said, that once or twice a-year a greater number of persons than was allowed by this clause attended at Lloyd's and if one stranger was to intrude himself among them, and refuse to withdraw, they would all become subject to the penalties of a felony. He should wish to be told how it was to be known that a person was a freeholder. Was he to take his title-deeds in his pocket; or was the magistrate to take the word of the party himself? He needed not, surely, remind the supporters of the bill, that no language admitted a greater latitude of construction than that which applied to residence. This clause rested the case of persons attending a meeting who had no right to be present, and it gave the magistrate the power of dispersing the assembly if those strangers did not withdraw. Now, supposing that, in the execution of the order for dispersion, death should ensue, would the magistrate be guilty of murder, if it was shown to the jury on the trial, that the person on whose account the meeting had been dispersed was really an inhabitant of the parish? These, he conceived, were topics that deserved the consideration of the noble lord, and of the learned gentlemen opposite.

Lord Castlereagh said, that when a magistrate had read the Riot Act in ordinary cases, individuals who did not depart, subjected themselves to the penalties of the act, with a full knowledge of the consequences; and the same would be the case after the reading of the proclamation according to the provision of this clause. The learned gentleman had not stated any circumstance that would not justify a magistrate to act in other cases where the law had been violated.

• Mr. Denman said, that here were facts on which a magistrate was to judge, while not one of the facts was within his knowledge; and yet the noble lord had said, that this case was the same as any other riot. The distinction was evident and important.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the moment a magistrate had read the Riot act, persons remaining culpably on the ground subjected themselves to the penalties of the law. This provision was merely a transcript of the Riot act, with this difference only, that the parties offending were guilty of a felony, instead of a misdemeanor. In all cases, the magistrate ought to decide on the law, and it did not become the subject to sit in judgment on the magistrate.

Lord Folkestone remarked, that the noble lord did not seem to understand the objection of his learned friend. The magistrate, not knowing the fact himself, but acting on the information of others, might be liable to commit a mistake; and the case put by his learned friend was, that if death ensued in consequence of this mistake, the magistrate might be guilty of murder. The right of the magistrate to judge of the law was not questioned; it was only alleged, that by acting on the information of others, when he had himself no means of knowledge, he might be led to the commission of murder.

Mr. Leslie Foster said, the objection of the learned gentleman was, that by the attendance of one stranger, or rather of a person erroneously supposed to be a stranger, a magistrate might be brought into the situation supposed. The objection, however, did not apply, because the object of this clause was, to prevent individuals who were known certainly to be strangers from interfering in the business of a meeting.

Lord Milton considered the clause to be one of a most savage description. The noble lord had endeavoured to draw a parallel between actual riots and constructive riots, and had contended, that the penalties annexed to the latter, after the reading of the proclamation by a magistrate, were analogous to those which were annexed to the former after the reading of the Riot act. There was, however, a most important distinction between the two cases; for, supposing even that the penalties were the same, which was not the case, the Riot act allowed a whole hour for the dispersion of the meeting, after notice of its illegality had been given, while this clause allowed only a quarter of an hour. Thus the present clause subjected persons guilty of a constructive riot to the penalties of a felony, after a quarter of an hour's notice; while, by the provisions of the Riot-act, those guilty of a real riot were exposed to the penalties of a misdemeanor only, and that not till an hour after notice had been given.

Sir J. Marjoribanks suggested the introduction of a clause, purporting that a meeting should not be dispersed as illegal, unless the order of a magistrate for the arrest of any unqualified person present should be resisted by such meeting.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that as the clause stood at present, the meeting became unlawful when the magistrate declared it to be so. His object was, that after a declaration to that effect by the magistrate, time should be allowed to the people to disperse before they became subject to the penalties of the bill; and he wished the attorney-general would frame an amendment to that effect.

Mr. Denman observed, that a man pointed out by the magistrate as a stranger, might, in reality, be a freeholder, while another person, not pointed out, might be a stranger. As the clause was at present worded, that person's presence would make the meeting illegal; though surely that never could be intended by the framers of the bill. The magistrate, therefore, should be required to point out the individuals whose presence rendered the meeting illegal.

The Attorney-General agreed to alter that part of the clause, so as to have the following effect:—that when any person who was a stranger had been ordered to withdraw and had refused to comply with that order, the party so refusing should, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of felony.

Mr. Denman proposed that the provision in this clause which empowered a single magistrate to disperse a meeting, should not extend to meetings called by the lord-licutenant of a county or riding, by a sheriff, by five justices, &c. or to any other than parish meetings.

A conversation ensued, in which lord Castlereagh, lord A. Hamilton, sir J. Sebright, lord Milton, Mr. Ellison, the Solicitor-general, Mr. Denman, the Attorney-general and Mr Primrose, took part, when the amendment was negatived, and the original clause carried without a division.

The clause indemnifying magistrates in case of killing or maiming in dispersing meetings, being read,

Mr. Denman objected to it, as introducing a new and dangerous principle in law. By the riot-act, the remaining together, or not dispersing on proclamation made, rendered the parties guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy; but even there the magistrate was not indemnified for ordering those who disobeyed the proclamation to be killed.

The Solicitor-General contended, that the magistrates, by the statute of Henry 7th, and by other statutes founded on the commission, had the right to disperse an unlawful assembly by force.

Mr. Denman most positively denied this principle, and would appeal to the whole body of lawyers in support of his opinion. Hawkins, who was in opposition to the principle of the learned Solicitor-general, had put the case of an assembly for the purpose of hearing Mass, which was then unlawful, but could not be dispersed by force. Force could not be used but when there was a breach of the peace. Unless, therefore, every thing cruel and despotic were to be raked into this measure—unless a contradiction was to be given in it to every principle of law and justice—unless a complete power was to be placed in the hands of magistrates over life, limb, and liberty, without responsibility, this clause he was confident could not pass.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that the proposition of the Solicitor-general was the most alarming that he had ever heard, and the most opposite to the principles of law or the opinions of any lawyer. Let the hon. and learned gentleman consult Mr. Justice Hale, who said that it required an act of parliament to indemnify a magistrate who had caused death in dispersing an unlawful meeting, from the charge of having committed murder. Was the Riot-act to be brought up here?

That act applied to a riotous assembly; while the assembly here contemplated was merely an unlawful one; and yet a magistrate was to be justified for sending troops of horse to trample down and destroy them! He never heard a more monstrous proposition than this—that by implication any assembly might be made unlawful, by implication any unlawful one might be dispersed by force; and if lives were lost, the magistrates would be indemnified against a charge of murder! If this was the meaning of the clause, why was it not openly declared, that his majesty's subjects might be put on their guard?

The Solicitor-General said, that if he looked at the statute of Henry 7th, and other acts founded on the commission of the peace, he found that the magistrates had the right of dispersing unlawful assemblies, even before the Riot-act. Suppose 50,000 people had assembled to the breach of the peace, they might have been dispersed without the provisions of that act. If a magistrate was called to any riotous meeting, or to any unlawful meeting, in breach of the peace, he was justified in using force to put it down, and was indemnified against the consequences. The force, however, was only to be a proper force; he was not allowed to exert more force, or to apply greater violence, than the dispersion of the assembly required. He acted under a heavy responsibility in this respect, but his power by the law could not be denied.

The clause was agreed to

The Attorney General, before he alluded to the clauses relative to unlicensed places for debating and discussion, would only call the attention of the House to one or two of the many questions of the sort which had been debated and discussed, as it was called, within the last six weeks, in different parts of the metropolis. Perhaps it would be sufficient to observe that what he held in his hand purported to have been a question propounded at a place called Hopkins's Chapel, near Berwick-street, Soho, on the 24th of November last. The notice of the meeting ran in these terms:—"This evening the following question will be debated; Which of the three professions has the greatest tendency to harden the human heart—the hangman, the grave-digger, or the parson?" He need not say in what manner that question was decided. Another question was, "Who ther lord chief justice Abbott's refusal to allow Mr. Carlile to read the Bible, in the course of his defence, arose out of a real respect for the sacred writings, or from the fear that their supposed absurdity and folly might be thereby exposed?" With the leave of the House he would just read them a passage from a publication called the Black Dwarf. The hon. and learned gentleman here read a short extract, which was to the effect "that the radical reformers wanted concentration; that reformers should deal only with reformers; that they should carefully endeavour to keep their body in force by their holding together; lastly, that they should subscribe, so that in every considerable town there might be public dinners, or other meals provided, of which reformers might partake at a cheap rate; and from which all exciseable articles, as much as possible, should be banished; that delegates should be paid to repair to them, in order to exhort and instruct them in the cause; and that in every town where they possessed a reading room, they should keep books which might be lent out upon the cheapest terms possible." Now it was with a view to the mischief likely to be caused by such practices, that the provisions relative to debating societies, both in 1817 and 1796, where blasphemous or seditious opinions were read or maintained, had been enacted. This clause, relative to unlicensed places for holding debates, was founded upon the 36th of the king, and upon the act of 1817. He should therefore propose by way of amendment, that the operation of the act should not only extend, as at present, to "places used for the purpose of delivering lectures and holding debates, at which discourses have been held of an irreligious, immoral, and seditious nature," but also to all places whatever, where persons not licensed should publicly read or debate.

Sir R. Heron wished to ask the hon. and learned gentleman whether any prosecution had been instituted against the authors of the two first papers which he had read?

The Attorney General said, that no prosecution had been commenced; but a bill had been found against one of the persons who attended at the meeting, for the seditious and blasphemous opinions he had there maintained.

Mr. Alderman Wood desired to know, whether the clause was meant to apply to meetings for the discussion of philosophical or scientific subjects.

The Attorney General said, the clause only applied to places where money was received.

The amendment was carried without a division. The next clause was, that all houses, &c. where meetings should be held, and money taken either for admission or refreshment, such places not being previously licensed for that purpose, should be deemed disorderly houses.

Mr. Denman objected to one part of this clause. He did not know what disorderly houses meant, except in one sense, which he did not care to name. He should move that those words be omitted.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. Denman objected to the clause relative to the revocation of licences. As the bill now stood, a man might be ruined, and never know the cause of his misfortunes. He should therefore move, that after the words "complaint made," the words, "upon full evidence and information on oath," be inserted.

This was also negatived without a division.

Lord Folkestone, adverting to the clause relative to the limitation of actions, said, that if he read it rightly, actions against individuals charged with the offences contemplated by this bill, might be proceeded in, within a term of six months; but if any of those individuals should happen to have been committed under an erroneous impression, they must prosecute the magistrates, upon whose warrants they had been so falsely committed, within three months. This surely required explanation. The clause went on to say, that if the plaintiff in the latter case should become nonsuited, or the jury should find a verdict for the defendant, or if, upon demurrer, judgment should be given, as against the plaintiff, the defendant should have double costs. This, too, was to be noticed; because it was evident how very cautious it would have the effect of making persons in adopting proceedings against any magistrate.

Mr. G. Lamb moved, that the words, "three months" be omitted, and "six months" substituted in their stead. After some observations from Mr. Barham, and Mr. J. P. Grant, this amendment was put and carried. In answer to a question from an hon. member, why in the case of Scotland the costs should be trebled? the lord advocate observed, that it was the usual custom. Mr. J. P. Grant thought, that the sooner the custom ceased to exist, the better it would be for his unfortunate countrymen, who were thus liable to pay more than their southern neighbours, who could afford it so much better. He should move that the word "double" be inserted in the place of "treble." Mr. Martin (of Galway) thought, that some security ought to be given to magistrates who might be proceeded against for the payment of their costs in case of nonsuit. The amendment was carried without a division. The other clauses of the bill were then agreed to, after which

Lord Castlereagh rose, for the purpose of proposing some new clauses. His first clause was, that in those cases where strangers, or persons who had no right to attend at a particular meeting, were present, and after being ordered to withdraw refused to go, it should be lawful for any person or persons (having a right to attend at such meeting) to take the person so refusing into custody, and bring him before the next magistrate, to be dealt with according to the act. This clause was read a first time. On its second reading,

Mr. Brougham objected to it, and contended that it would be manifestly absurd if carried into effect. It went to give any man who had a right to attend at such a meeting a power of a special constable, and also to take away all those who had not the right to attend. Now suppose, as he understood was the case at Manchester, there were 20,000 out of the 30,000 who might have attended, who had no right at all to attend under this bill, what would be the consequence? Or suppose, to take small numbers, there was a meeting assembled of 1,500 persons, of whom only 500 had a right to be present, did the noble lord mean to say that every man who had a right to attend should arrest one who had no right; or, to speak in short terms, that each lawful man should arrest his radical and take him off? Now, in such a case, all the 500 men who would have a legal right to attend, would be engaged in taking away 500 of those who had no such right; or, as he might say, in "pairing off" with them (laughter), and thereby leave 500 of those present who had no right so to be. Would not this, he would ask, be a manifest absurdity, if the object was, to put down the seditious meetings mentioned in the bill?

and learned gentleman had put upon the clause. He should recollect that it could not have the effect alluded to, as it was not compulsory on any man who had a right to attend, to take any other not having the same right from it. Every such man was not bound, as the hon. and learned gentleman had supposed, to take his radical and walk away.

The clause was then agreed to.

Lord Althorp, on rising to propose a clause for limiting the operation of the bill to the disturbed districts, observed that he had many disadvantages to surmount. These disadvantages did not consist merely in the lateness of the hour, or in the disposition of the noble lord to repel every important alteration. He felt, also, that any suggestion coming from himself must come with this disadvantage—that as he was known to object to the whole principle of the bill, he might be suspected of an intention to interfere with that principle in recommending a clause for their adoption. The clause, however, which he felt it his duty to propose, did not interfere in any degree with the useful operation of the measure, though it was calculated to prevent its unnecessary and vexatious application. The papers before the House did not make out a case of alarm beyond some of the great counties of England and Scotland. His majesty's ministers had described the measure as an improvement of the law; but that was not the opinion of the House, or they would have made it permanent. But it was not enough, according to his view of it, that it should be temporary; justice seemed to require that it should be local also, and that those parts should be exempted from its severity, where no case of disturbance could be made out to justify its introduction. The Bill which authorized search for arms was limited to the disturbed districts; why should not this be limited in the same way? It was more easy to remove a magazine of pikes from one county to another, than to remove such meetings as this bill was intended to prevent. The clause, which he should propose might appear, on the first view, to impose restrictions upon certain counties; but it only affected some counties, while the bill, as it stood, affected all, and therefore was rather to be considered in the light of an exemption. It might be argued, that it was an odious task for magistrates to apply for an extension of the bill to their respective counties, when the state of things required it. But, disagreeable as the task might be, he was sure that no magistrate would refuse to do his duty. Another argument which might possibly be urged against it was, that it gave too great a discretion to magistrates; but their discretion was not increased beyond the powers of the present act, and was, after all, a discretion to exempt where it might be expedient. The noble lord concluded by moving a clause to limit the operation of the measure to certain counties therein mentioned, but empowering the lords lieutenant or magistrates of counties, now quiet, to introduce it by proclamation whenever disturbances might render it expedient. The counties named in the clause were the west riding of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, Durham, Cumberland, Northumberland, Nottingham, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Renfrew, Lanark, and Derby.

Mr. Cartwright opposed the clause, and denied that it was more easy to transport arms than assemblies from one county to another. The tranquil part of the country, he was satisfied, would feel themselves aggrieved if the bill was not extended for their protection.

Mr. Honywood thought it strange that any of the quiet counties should feel aggrieved at not being placed under the ban of this act; and he was sure he might say for his own constituents, that they would feel much aggrieved, if, without any act of disloyalty upon their parts, they were exposed to all the hardships and severities of such a measure.

Mr. W Lamb said, that with the opinion he entertained as to the danger of the country, he could not refuse his support to the bill; but, on considering its provisions, the amendment proposed by his noble friend appeared to deserve the adoption of the House. He was sure the noble secretary of state would feel the necessity of carrying along with him in those measures as much of public opinion as possible; and when he considered the measures of 1817, he would find, that nothing had tended so much to render the Habeas Corpus act odious in the eyes of the community as the indiscriminate universality of its operation. There were many who admitted the existence of danger, and yet thought it hard, unjust, and iniquitous, that those who had committed no fault should be exposed to its severity. He could assure the noble lord, that the same feeling would operate with regard to the present measure, if it was applied with the same indiscreet latitude. The bill, if properly limited, was not essentially an abridgment of the rights of the subject; for right, when properly used, was under a better limitation than that of law. But, when rights were abused, as that of petition had been, the law was a necessary corrective. An hon. gentleman had observed, that the disturbers of the public peace might carry their effects into other counties, but his belief was, that in no other part of the country could their projects be brought to act. As to any abuses that might arise out of the plan proposed by his noble friend, they might easily be met by other provisions, and therefore he did not hesitate to press seriously on the attention of ministers, the feeling which they run the risk of exciting by extending the measure in the first instance to the whole country.

Mr. Grant admitted the necessity of carrying along with these measures as much of public opinion as was possible; but the first object was, to carry their purpose into effect. No fact could be more plainly proved than the necessity upon which they were legislating. He would not now discuss the extent of the danger, as he might assume that it was admitted by the House. This danger did not arise merely from distress, a system had been pursued which was not the creature of distress, though it had availed itself of the advantages supplied from that source. The question therefore was, whether, with the conviction that such a spirit was in existence, with a knowledge of its increasing activity in making converts, and of the distress which constituted its chief aliment, they should anticipate the danger, or leave the country, not to the chance of a small evil, but to the chance of an evil growing to that extent which might soon require, not measures of prevention, but of suppression and dispersion. Two engines were employed for the propagation of a system, the object of which was national and not local—those engines were public meetings and the press. Could any one imagine that local bills would succeed in putting it down—or was it not more probable that they would have to follow the disaffected with unequal steps into other counties? It was necessary to destroy their hopes, and show them that parliament was determined to crush their designs. An hon. gentleman had said, that the system could not be carried into other parts of the country, but he was not willing to see the experiment tried, how much poison the frame of the country could bear before it was destroyed. It was in behalf of that population with which he was officially connected, and to whose interests he was bound, that he was anxious the bill should stand in its present shape. It was said to be a bill of coercion; on the contrary, it was one of protection. It was coercive, not against the people, but against the enemies of the people, whose name was so often usurped by revolutionary demagogues. He must say, that if this measure was made local, it would be an encroachment on the high privileges and liberties of the undisturbed counties; as it would deprive them of that protection to which they were entitled. To use the words of lord chief justice Holt, it would be "an assault upon the people of England." It was not the nobility, nor the commons, that were to be protected by this measure; it was the honest the uncontaminated, the industrious peasantry of the country whom they were to protect against those who wished to deprive them of the privileges of the constitution, and the consolations of religion; thus rendering them miserable in this world, and hopeless as to the next.

Sir M. W. Ridley did not mean to say that something of this kind was not necessary; but he thought that it should be strictly confined to the necessity of the case. If the bill was limited, as proposed by the amendment, it would be adequate to all its objects, for magistrates could correspond with ministers sufficiently early to prevent inconvenient or dangerous meetings.

Lord Ebrington felt that he should be wanting in the duty which he owed to the populous and loyal county which he had the honour of representing, if he did not oppose the extension of these measures to it. He entered his protest against including the loyal and peaceable inhabitants of Devon in this measure. It was urged, that the seditious leaders would, if the measure was made local, extend themselves to the peaceable counties. Even if they did, it would be impossible for them to produce any effect in the county where he resided. He therefore felt it his duty to support the amendment.

Mr. W. Courtenay agreed with his noble friend, that infinitely the largest portion of that part of the country with which they were connected was free from any disposition which might require restraint; but, at the same time, they all looked for something of this kind; and if they were left exposed to the attacks which might be made by itinerant agitators, they would consider themselves unfairly treated.

Mr. Macdonald said, that whatever difference might exist as to the necessity which called for coercive measures, he thought they all agreed in feeling reluctance in passing them. There was but one way of demonstrating that general feeling, and that was by limiting those measures to the strict necessity which called for them. This measure was to be limited in a two-fold way—in point of time and in point of extent. The time had been already fixed, and for a period which he regretted as he thought a much shorter time would be sufficient. The extent in point of district was still to be limited. He would ask, whether his noble friend had not provided for any emergency in counties proposed to be exempted from this bill? He should like to hear something like an answer to this from the other side of the House. What could be required more, than that the magistrates should have the power of proclaiming their county, in whole or in part, subject to the operation of this bill? At least the onus was upon the other side.

Lord Milton fully concurred in the reasons urged for limiting the bill, and felt disposed to support the amendment for other reasons. The hon. member for Exeter had stated, that the part of the country with which he was connected was well disposed. His noble friend, the member for Northamptonshire, had said the same of that county. He could make the same statement respecting the county in which he lived—he meant Huntingdonshire. It was a French saying, that where nothing exists, the king loses his rights; so he would say of this bill. Whatever ground there might exist for passing it in the manufacturing districts, no necessity for its extension to agricultural districts could exist, but in the imaginations of men who saw nothing but radical meetings all over the country, threatening fire and destruction to all within their reach.

Mr. Mansfield opposed the amendment. If the measure was made local, the evil would spread itself, and parliament would in a short time again be convened, in order to enact additional measures of restriction.

Mr. Barham said, that if he was convinced of the efficacy of the clause he would vote for it. It was the wish of all that some efficacious measures should be adopted. It was urged that the great bulk of the people were loyal. Why, then were the great bulk of the people to be subjected to the same restrictions as the disaffected? There were several counties in England where the term radical reform would not be understood. The most certain mode of spreading the evil would be by passing this law, as it would excite the curiosity of the people to discover what it was enacted to prevent. The best way of convincing the people of the benefit of entertaining loyal principles, would be to let those who did not abuse their liberties, continue in the enjoyment of them; while those who abused were punished by being deprived of them. The bill would have a dangerous tendency, by showing that the loyal and the disaffected were treated with equal rigour.

Mr. Cooper considered the present bill as intended for the defence of our rights and liberties. What was liberty? Was it not the right of doing what a wise and good man would wish to do? They were legislating, not for mischievous agitators, but for the liberties of the people.

Mr. W. Parnell strongly objected to the clause. He also objected to the measure altogether as it regarded Ireland, where according to the statement of the noble lord himself, the greatest tranquillity and prosperity existed. Even in this country he did not think it would effect the end proposed. The conduct of ministers reminded him of a little French tale which he read some time since. There was a very ugly knight, but a man of great wisdom, who fell in love with a beautiful young lady, who, notwithstanding was very indiscreet. The knight thought the folly of the young lady could make no obstacle to their union, "for," said he, "our children will possess all the beauty of their mother, with all the wisdom of their father." Unfortunately the knight was mistaken. The children possessed all the ugliness of the father, with all the folly of their mother. Now, so it was with the question before them. This boasted beauty, the privilege of the people, was as a corrective to its indiscretion to be coupled to the ugly but wise knight; the measure proposed by ministers. He feared, however, that the produce of the union would be similar in both instances—namely, that it would possess the ugliness of the father, and the folly of the mother without retaining any trace of the boasted wisdom or beauty of either.

Mr. Hutchinson said, he was anxious to impress upon the House, that, in the event of the amendment being negatived, he was determined to bring it forward, as far as Ireland was concerned, on the bringing up of the report. In doing this, he trusted that he should receive the support and co-operation of every independent member of that House. Though he had not any immediate connexion with the right hon. the secretary for Ireland, he could not but express his regret at the speech which he had made that night. When he recollected the brilliancy with which that right hon. gentleman had conducted himself, both before and since he commenced his public career, when he considered the efforts he had made in another quarter, he could not help feeling a sincere anxiety, for the consistency of his political character. He did not express this regret from a feeling that his country could be benefitted by the exertions of any right hon. gentleman, but from a respect for the right hon. gentleman's former exertions.

Sir W. Guise said, his constituents deprecated the extension of this measure to them, and had told him that there was no occasion for it in Gloucestershire. He would therefore support the amendment.

Mr. R. Martin pledged himself to oppose any attempt to prevent this measure being extended to Ireland. It was calculated to produce peace and happiness in that country.

Sir R. Fergusson protested in the name of his country against the measure. It was said that it would be a blessing to the sister kingdom. It may be so, but from such blessings good Lord deliver us.

The committee then divided: For the Amendment, 51; Against it, 191: Majority against it, 140. The original clause was then put and carried; after which the House resumed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, December 9.

WESTMINSTER PETITION RESPECTING THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY.] Sir Francis Burdett rose to present a petition from the electors of Westminster, against the coercive measures now under the consideration of parliament. It had been resolved on at a numerous, and he would add, an orderly and well-conducted meeting of those electors. It expressed as strongly as it did justly, the dissatisfaction which they felt at the proposal of such measures, and the hope which they entertained that time would be given to the country to declare its opinions upon measures which were allowed to be of an unconstitutional tendency by all, even by those who admitted the temporary necessity of them. No pressing necessity existed for forcing them with such haste through the House, and he therefore implored hon. gentlemen to give to the country that extension of time which the petitioners so earnestly desired. The hon. baronet then moved that the petition be brought up.

Mr. Lambton seconded the motion, and expressed his concurrence with the wishes of the petitioners. At the same time, he took the opportunity of saying, that he had that morning received a communication from the country, containing statements in direct opposition to those made on a former evening by the noble secretary of state, and to which he wished to call that hon. member's most particular attention. It was in allusion to the noble lord's assertion that 700 men had marched with concealed arms to a late public meeting near Newcastle, and came from the union societies of the two villages from which these men were said to have marched. It was of considerable length, but he did not think it requisite to read more of it than the first three paragraphs, which were to the following effect: "That they had read with considerable surprise, a paragraph in the letter of A. Reed, mayor, stating that 700 of them had gone to the meeting held on the 11th of October, at Newcastle, with arms concealed. They deemed it their duty to deny this statement, and to declare their willingness to deny it individually upon oath, if required. So far from having any arms concealed about them on that day, they had not even with them common walking-sticks, and therefore they had no hesitation in saying, that this statement of the mayor was an unfounded calumny." Unless, therefore, these individuals were to be supposed destitute of all moral and religious feelings, the House must credit the statement which they had made to it [Hear!]. He had also received from an individual residing at Newcastle, unequalled in talent and respectability, a communication relative to the same subject. That individual, whose name he should not mention, but which, if he did mention, would ensure general respect, said that the exaggerated account which had been given in parliament, of the state of public feeling in and about Newcastle, had appeared perfectly absurd and ridiculous to the inhabitants of those districts; and added, that the letter of the mayor of Newcastle was laughed at as a mere rhodomontade. He had also another circumstance to which he wished to call the attention of the House, and of the noble secretary. He had been informed, that so convinced were the gentry about Newcastle and Durham, of the falsehood of the libel which had been circulated against the people among whom they resided, that they had thought it right to take certain steps in order to contradict it. A meeting of the deputy-lieutenancy had in consequence been called at Gateshead, and a representation of the real state of the county had been sent by it to government. The noble lord would be able to set him right if he was misinformed on that point, and also to state, why, if such a representation had been made to government, it had not been made known to the House. He could not help observing, that he considered all the alarming statements which had been propagated regarding the disaffected state of the counties of Durham and Northumberland to be totally unfounded; and the country would be enabled to decide with some degree of certainty whether they were or not, by circumstances which would be that evening disclosed in the other House. He would only state at present, that an hon. and reverend relation of his own, who was represented as having been forced to leave his country seat, and take refuge in Newcastle from the designs of a discontented population, had now returned to his seat and left Newcastle, whither he had gone in compliance with the wishes of some of his family. For his own part, he had left all that was dear to him, his wife, his children, and his property, in the midst of these men, who were accused of disloyalty and disaffection, but upon whose loyalty and attachment he rested with implicit confidence. He apprehended more danger from the measures of that House, than he did from the turbulence of those who had been made the objects of so many calumnies. When the arms and training bill came before the House, he should move that its operation should not extend to the county of Durham.

Lord Castlereagh could assure the hon. gentleman that he had not seen any such report of deputy-lieutenancy as he had alluded to, though he would not pretend to assert, till he had inquired into the matter, that no such report had been received. As to the county of Durham, he had never said that it was in a state of open disturbance; but still there might be evil designs entertained by some individuals residing within it, against which it was the bounden duty of government to guard. The hon. gentleman maintained that there were no such designs: but his assertions on that head were no more proof of the non-existence, than that the assertions on the other side were of the existence of such projects. He (lord Castlereagh) would refer the House to what the hon. gentleman had himself allowed on a former occasion: he had said that there was a meeting of 40,000 persons at Newcastle, and that of these 40,000, 7,000 marched to it under military organization; and yet with these admissions staring him in the face, he now came forward to say, that all the danger which he apprehended was from the proceedings of the House, and to propose, as a proof that he believed his own opinions, that the county of Durham should be excepted from the operation of these acts. With such a description as the hon. gentleman had himself given of these radical meetings, could any thing be more imprudent than not to make these measures general [Hear!]?

Sir M. W. Ridley, after speaking in terms of high praise of the present chief magistrate of Newcastle, observed, that he was the last person in the country who would be guilty of writing rhodomontade; and that the statements in his letter had no reference to the general state of the country. He implored the House, however, not to believe all the exaggerated statements of alarm which were now abroad, especially with regard to those districts with which he was connected. The letters which he had received from them stated, that though many were alarmed, the alarm was by no means so general as was supposed, and was rapidly subsiding in every quarter. He would mention one fact which would show the nature of the exaggeration which existed, and the causes from which part of that exaggeration arose. A gentleman in the country told a friend with whom he (sir M. W. Ridley) was acquainted, that he had heard the radicals firing at 2 o'clock in the morning: his friend was incredulous, told the gentleman that he was mistaken, set about finding out the cause of his mistake, and ultimately succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of the alarmed man himself, that the firing of the radicals was nothing more than the explosion of one or two retorts employed in some gas-works which were seated near his House.

Mr. G. Lamb said, he did not rise with any view of prolonging the debate which had arisen, but merely to state that the meeting at which the petition now before the House was agreed to, was highly respectable and most orderly in its behaviour. He would not say that another meeting had drawn away from them those who wished for noise and riot; but he would say, that the meeting which had voted this petition was as respectable as any public meeting which he had ever witnessed.

Mr. Alderman Waithman described the meeting which took place on Wednesday in Smithfield, as one of the most despicable public meetings which he had ever seen. Those who composed it were dirty boys, women, and children; and if there was any thing respectable about it, it was the appearance of some strangers out of mere curiosity, and of some special constables, who were wandering up and down the market to see that no breach of the peace occurred. Meetings of this nature had now had their run in London [Hear!], and no danger was in future to be apprehended from them.

The petition was then brought up. It purported to be the petition of the electors of Westminster, assembled in pursuance of a requisition to the high-bailiff, in Covent Garden, on Wednesday the 8th of December 1819; and sat forth,

“ That the petitioners view with the utmost astonishment and regret the proceedings of the House relative to the late transactions at Manchester; that the petitioners find that whatever hope may have been entertained that the House would institute some inquiry respecting those transactions has been totally disappointed, and that instead of the apparent authors of the violence committed on the 16th of August last at Manchester being at least called upon to justify their conduct, the people themselves, the sufferers by that violence, have had to endure fresh injuries, by calumny, by misrepresentation, and by being marked out as the victims of the unheard-of and sanguinary laws now in progress through the House; that the petitioners complain that they, as well as the great body of the people, are, on the pretext of a conspiracy said, but never proved, to exist against the government, about to be deprived of many of their dearest and most acknowledged rights, which have remained untouched even in the worst of times, and which nothing but wicked ministers, resolved to destroy the whole fabric of British freedom, would dare to violate; that the petitioners regard the right of public assemblage, without any restriction as to the place or number, for the sake of a peaceable discussion of national grievances, as a right derived from the earliest practice even of their remote ancestors, a right which has in all ages formed the main basis of their popular government, a right which has always been exercised to prevent the preponderance of interests hostile to those of the people, and which cannot be infringed without destroying every vestige of popular control in the government of these realms; that the petitioners consider the limitations and conditions under which, if the seditious meetings bill should pass the House, the people would still be allowed to meet, as amounting to a virtual annihilation of all the purposes of popular assemblage, the magistracy, and other official persons of this country, under whose sanction only it is proposed any large assembly shall be holden, having lately given but too good reason to make them fear that they will seldom, if ever, unite with the people in any wholesome opposition to acts of government; that the petitioners having thus good reason to apprehend that it is the intention of his Royal Highness's ministers to deprive the people of their freedom and opportunities of speech, see also, with the utmost indignation and alarm, that another of the bills now in progress through the House has a direct tendency to deprive the people of the freedom of the press, so that they will be debarred from all the old established means by which the nation has hitherto made known their wishes and their wants to the king and the parliament; that the petitioners consider the limitations upon the press proposed to be passed into law by one of the bills now in progress through the House, as establishing in effect a previous censorship as intrusting that censorship to a magistracy, or official persons, who for the reasons before mentioned, will check all animadversion on acts of state, and as amounting in fact to a complete destruction of the liberty of political discussion by writing, there being no medium between the entire freedom and the total subjection of the press; that the petitioners consider the proposed increased severity of the libel law as contrary to all sense, justice, and humanity, and the spirit of the British constitution, more especially as recognized by the Bill of Rights; that the petitioners consider the bill now in progress through the House for the seizing of arms either by day or night in certain districts, said to be in a state of disturbance, another invasion of the rights and liberties of Englishmen, which nothing can justify, and which does not appear to be called for by any of the evidence before the House, or by any events generally known to the nation; that the petitioners consider the bill now pending in parliament for the purpose of depriving defendants from traversing, as having the same pernicious tendency as the before-mentioned bills, as being contrived to deprive the accused of one of those humane provisions which the law of England contemplated for his

defence, and to render more easy and expeditious the arbitrary proceedings of the government, and as being confessedly an infringement of the ancient laws of the land; that the petitioners believe the history of the English nation can furnish no instance of a similar attempt upon the liberties of the people as that which is now attempted to be made by the said bills, and they are confident that the great majority of their fellow-subjects regard the pending measures in the same light as themselves; that the petitioners, as they view these measures with alarm, so they view with indignation the pretext under which these bills are proposed for adoption; and they believe that the alarm of actual conspiracy, and impending insurrection, which is said to prevail in certain parts of the country, has no other origin than in the designs of wicked ministers themselves, fomenting disturbances, circulating false rumours, and attempting to drive the people to acts of desperation; that the petitioners know many of the rumours respecting the pretended disaffection, and meditated insurrection of certain portions of his majesty's subjects, to be not only false, but that it is physically impossible they should be true; and that in the three northern counties of Westmoreland, Northumberland, and Durham, where 100,000 men are said to be in arms, the population returns of 1811, give only 405,648 as the total number of inhabitants in these counties, comprising men, women, and children; that the petitioners, well acquainted as they have long been with parliamentary reformers of all classes, do venture solemnly to deny the assertion, audaciously stated by the abettors of the bills now before the House, that the object of any body of individuals called reformers, is the subversion of the constitution, the plunder of property, and the destruction of social order; on the contrary, they know of no other design, either professed or intended, by any body of reformers, than that of making attempts to bring back the constitution to its genuine temperament; attempts, which a great legal authority of this country (sir William Jones) has declared, are so far from being seditious, or even derogatory from the respect due to the Crown, that they would, if successful, highly augment the splendor of it; unless it be more glorious to rule like princes of the continent over slaves, than to be the chief of a free nation; that the petitioners imagine they discover a cause for the present discontent, very different from that alleged by the proposers and abettors of the proposed bills; they find themselves and their fellow-subjects oppressed with a load of taxation rendered necessary, as they believe, only for the sake of carrying on a system of mal-administration, subversive of the rights and the happiness of the people; they find that in the short space of twenty-six years nearly 600 millions have been added to the public debt, and that the yearly taxes have been raised from about 16,000,000*l.* to upwards of 60,000,000*l.*; they find by returns presented to the House in 1818, that on the average of three years ending the 25th of March 1815, those receiving parish relief amounted to nearly a million of persons; that the money expended on the said paupers, independent of charitable donations of 238,310*l.*, amounted to the enormous sum of 6,460,298*l.*; that the petitioners also see that the commerce of these realms is most ruinously depressed; that the trade of these realms is no less embarrassed, and rapidly approaching to total ruin that the agriculture of these realms has also most lamentably declined, and does no longer compensate the farmer for the use of his capital, notwithstanding the wages of his labour are in great part paid by the poor-rate; that the petitioners believe, that it is the general conviction of the people, that the lamentable state of trade, manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, is not attributable to any revulsion, or to a transition from war to peace, but to the vast sums levied on the people by rates and taxes, which have so enormously increased the price of commodities, as in a great measure to exclude them from all the markets in the world; that the people having now, and having for some time had, this conviction, have made various complaints in form of petition to the House, to the House of Peers, and to the King, and have sought for a remedy for their calamities by various modes proposed in their petitions; the petitioners find that the said petitions have been altogether disregarded; that the same system of mal-administration continues, and seems likely to continue; that nothing is done for the people; on the contrary, fresh burthens are imposed upon the people, for objects seeming to them unnecessary and unconstitutional; and the petitioners, taking into consideration all these circumstances, see that the people are suffering from a complication of real evils, and have to complain of just grievances, which will fully account for their present universal demand to obtain a fair chosen House of Commons, without supposing them to be traitors to the state, and to have forfeited their right to the mild and salutary system under which they were born; that the petitioners are fully persuaded, that if the bills now pending should pass into a law for any given term of years, and the present system of mal-administration should continue, further excuse will be found for prolonging the operation of these unconstitutional measures after the given term of years should have expired; that moreover the petitioners are assured, that none of the complaints of the people will or can have so direct a tendency to bring the House and the whole legislature into contempt, as the passing of these bills; and they would therefore urge, that their own regard for the character and consequence of the House, as well as for the welfare of the nation, must equally induce the House not to pass the said bills into laws."

MANCHESTER MEETING — PETITION OF D. DAWSON, &c.] Lord Milton said, that he had a petition to present to the House, which, though it was neither so long as the last nor the result of so numerous a meeting, was yet of very considerable importance. It came from the father, or rather from the family (as it was signed by the father and three brothers, of one who had lost his life on the fatal 16th of August. The petitioner stated, that the deceased went in company with several others, to the meeting held on that day at Manchester, that on endeavouring to escape from the hustings, near which he was standing, he received two strokes on the head from a sword; and that in consequence of the wounds he soon afterwards died. This statement, he found, was confirmed by the returns of the Manchester infirmary, and by a verdict of a coroner's inquest, which stated, that the deceased had died in consequence of the cuts which he had received with some sharp instrument, but that it was unknown by whom those cuts were inflicted. The petitioners then proceeded to state, that they had always been taught to believe that in this country there was no wrong, without a remedy; but, unfortunately, in this case it was impossible to discover the individual by whom the fatal blows were given. They therefore prayed the House, before it passed any new restrictive laws, to take into their most serious consideration those events which during the last few months had divided one class of people from another. That this petition was not got up to serve any party purposes was evident from the fact, that the whole of the petition was in the hand-writing of one of the brothers of the deceased. Besides, the coarse and homely expressions in which it was couched proved that it was the result of genuine and unrepressed feeling. He knew, after what had passed within the walls of that House, that it was not possible for the prayer of the petition to be complied with: he hoped, however, that the House would never have cause to repent of the line of conduct which it had recently adopted.

The petition was brought up and read. It purported to be the petition of David Dawson, yeoman of Strines Dale, in Saddleworth, Yorkshire, and John Dawson, Samuel Dawson, and James Dawson, brothers to the there-under-written Edmund Dawson, and sat forth,

"That Edmund Dawson, son to the said David Dawson, yeoman, went to Manchester on the 16th of August last, in good health, in order to attend a legal meeting for parliamentary reform; the petitioners believe that the said Edmund Dawson conducted himself as a good subject, in a peaceable and lawful manner; that he received two strokes on the head, with the edge of a sword, by one of the cavalry, near the hustings, whilst endeavouring to make his escape; that he was taken to the infirmary, Manchester, but was not conscious of any event after receiving the latter stroke, till the morning following, which same information he delivered to the said Samuel Dawson, in the presence of the governess of the said hospital; the petitioners beg leave to state, that the said Edmund Dawson died on the Tuesday but two following; that the jury who sat on his body, gave in their verdict, that he died with a cut from a sharp instrument, but could not tell by whom, although several who were seen cutting on St. Peter's field are known; the petitioners had been taught to believe that there was a constitutional doctrine, that every wrong had its remedy; and seeing that the jury had found no such remedy, and the courts of law having not interfered, in the most impressive manner beg the House immediately (prior to the adopting bills calculated to widen the unhappy differences), to institute a full and impartial inquiry into the above outrage by the military and civil power, by which some were slaughtered, and hundreds wounded (as they conceived under the protection of the law and constitution), by so doing, justice may be awarded to the guilty, and the land cleared from the foul stain of blood."

MAGISTRACY OF NORFOLK.] Mr. Coke hoped that the House would allow him to read a letter which he had just received, and which referred to a subject, on which some conversation had occurred on a former night. The letter was to the following effect:—"My dear Sir; having just seen an account of what passed last night in the House of Commons between Mr. Wodehouse and yourself, I have additional reason to lament the having been confined almost the last week to my bed with the gout, as it prevented my stating in my place in the House, that at your request I accompanied you by appointment to the lord chancellor's private room in the House of Lords, when every thing passed that you so correctly stated in the House of Commons [Hear!]. Believe me your very much obliged. M. B. Folkes Mansfield-street, Thursday morning." The only gentleman who was not inserted in the commission, after his application to the lord chancellor, was the hon. G. Walpole.

Lord Castlereagh deprecated the re-introduction of this subject to the House, after what had fallen from the Speaker on a former evening. He must however remark, that if he, as lord lieutenant of the county, had told any gentleman that he would insert in the commission of the peace any names which he would recommend, he should have expected, as a mark of personal civility, that they should not be left at the office of the clerk of the peace: indeed, if they had been so left, he should have treated them just as if they had been anonymous communications.

Mr. Coke said, that he did not see upon what grounds he could be accused of having exhibited a want of courtesy in this business. If Mr. Wodehouse had shown him in private the letters which he had read the other evening to the House, he should have had no objection to have made a similar communication of this letter to Mr. Wodehouse; "but," continued the hon. member, "as Mr. Wodehouse [order], my colleague, did not show that courtesy to me, I do not see how it could be expected that I should show this courtesy to him."

Mr. Wodehouse said, that the subject had been introduced into the House in consequence of what had previously occurred between his hon. colleague and himself. He had asked him, and he conceived it his undoubted right to ask, a question upon this subject. His hon. colleague replied, "If you doubt my word, sir, ask me any question in your place, and I will answer it." "Very well, sir?" replied Mr. Wodehouse, "I will." He could appeal to all within the walls of that House, and to all who had any ingenuous feelings about them, whether it facilitated any explanation to make it matter of discussion in that House. He had only to add, that he had felt no distrust of his hon. colleague's candour and firmness. All he had said was, that he should never again place his hon. colleague in the situation of making such an explanation, or put himself to the pain of asking such questions.

Mr. Tierney begged to observe, that his hon. friend (Mr. Coke) had fairly and honourably answered all the questions, and refuted all the charges, which arose from this subject. When he had done so, up got the noble lord, and began to accuse the lord lieutenant of the county, against whom no charge had been made. It appeared quite evident, that the lord chancellor was unfortunate in his recollection, and that his hon. friend stood acquitted of all blame.

Mr. G. Lamb spoke to order, as there was no question before the House.

Lord Castlereagh regretted that the hon. member had not spoken to order earlier. He had only to observe, that he should have left his noble friend under a charge, if he had not stood up and made the observations which he had made.

STATE OF THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.] Mr. Bennet rose, in pursuance of his notice, to move the appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of the manufacturing districts of this country. He said he could assure the House, that, in bringing this subject before them, he did so with a full sense of his own inferiority; but having found no one else willing to take it out of his hands, and deeming the inquiry which he proposed a measure of the utmost importance to the peace and tranquillity of the country, he was induced to offer himself to their notice. It was not his intention to mix up with this subject any thing of what might be considered party politics, or any thing which might stand in the way of the conciliation which he had at heart: he wished to excite the smallest animosity possible. It was not his intention to inquire into all the circumstances which had created the distress. He knew very well that gentlemen differed materially on this subject, as it was natural they should do, where the field was so extensive. Some attributed the distress to the enormous weight of taxation—some again attributed it to the decay of trade—others again to the change in the circulating medium of the country, which, while the taxation remained unchanged, had had all the effect of an addition of from 15 to 25 per cent to the taxes. All these things, though they demanded the particular attention of the House, went beyond the limit which he now proposed to himself. The object of his motion was to inquire into the present state of the districts, known by the name of the manufacturing districts, and now also unhappily by that of the disturbed districts. He was sure he was not stating too high the number of persons employed in these districts, namely, in Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, and Scotland, when he said they amounted to not less than one million of persons. He should first advert to the state of the manufacturing district of Scotland; and he was sure he was not overrating the manufacturing population of that district, when he stated it at upwards 200,000. The House were no doubt well aware, that within a very short period the state of the manufactures of that country had experienced a rapid increase: the House knew that there had arisen in that country a number of great towns and great villages, the seats of commercial and manufacturing enterprise, in which many individuals had acquired great wealth. But unfortunately those large and formerly flourishing towns, were now the seat of the greatest distress and misery. But the distress which existed in that country at the present period, was greatly augmented by the influx into Scotland of the natives of Ireland, who, driven by the greatest poverty and distress at home, sought to better their situation by emigration to Scotland. The relief which they sought, he believed they had not found, but this influx had added much to the distress of Scotland. From all the information he had been able to obtain, the manufacturing population of that part of the country had been reduced from a state of affluence to a state of the greatest poverty. He believed that in what he was about to say, he did not overstate the distress, and his anxiety was rather to understate than overstate it. The great staple manufacture of that country was that of cotton. The spinners, who were in the proportion of one to three of the whole, were in a comparatively good state—were in the receipt of a considerable sum of money. But the other class, that of the weavers, who formed the great majority of the manufacturers, were in a state of the greatest poverty and despair.

But perhaps the best way would be to enter into some details on the subject. He held in his hands a statement of the wages paid, at different periods, to the manufacturers in the neighbourhood of Glasgow. He believed that in that neighbourhood the wages of the weavers in 1803, when they were at the highest, were 25s. per week. In 1812 and 1813, they fell considerably, and in 1816, they were reduced as low as 10s. At the present moment they were 5s. and 5s. 6d. at most. They had now been in that state for a considerable time. They had in better days been able to make considerable savings from their wages, and to make great purchase of furniture, clothes and otherwise; for though he was not a native of Scotland himself, yet from his being connected with a northern county bordering on Scotland, he had had ample opportunities of knowing the intelligent and moral character of the Scotch, their ambition to keep up furniture, to wear better clothes than the natives of the southern part of the island; in short they had altogether a higher and more respectable air and appearance than the people of this part of the country. In the neighbourhood of Glasgow the people had been forced to carry their furniture and clothes by degrees to the pawnbrokers, and he had been told on the best authority, that the pawnbrokers having advanced their whole capital on these pledges, were nearly in the same distress. The consequence of all this was, that the people were not merely in a state of poverty and distress—these were idle terms—they were in a state of famine—in a state of starvation. Their former prosperity added to their present sufferings. From the natural feeling of self-preservation, those people were impelled to look for a change. These men thought that their miseries would be remedied by a radical reform of that House, and thinking so, it could hardly be viewed otherwise by them than as a question of life and death. However erroneous their ideas on the subject might be, the House ought to sympathise with men in their unhappy situation—they were happily placed in a different situation—they were removed from the temptation to which these unfortunate people were exposed; but they ought to feel some degree of charity and tenderness for those who were placed in their situation [Hear, hear!] He had stated what the wages were in the neighbourhood of Glasgow; he was told that in Paisley they were much lower. There were three classes of workmen. The first class who used to earn from 25 to 30s. per week, was reduced to 8s. 6d.; the second class was reduced to 4s. 6d.; and the third class could obtain no employment whatever.

He was not able to ascertain the amount of this last class of wretched people, but he understood they amounted to many thousands. In Ireland there were no poor laws in existence; in England the poverty of the manufacturer was relieved in some degree by forced contributions from the public; but in Scotland, there was no law to compel relief to persons who were able to work. He was told, however, that there had existed a contribution on the part of the gentry, which did them the greatest honour. There had been long indeed in Scotland an union between the gentry and the people, to the great advantage of both. But what availed these contributions of individuals, when whole towns, large districts, were in want of bread? Under these circumstances it was natural that so intelligent a people as the Scotch should look around them to see if they could find any remedy to their evils. He believed any person who had looked to the progress of opinions, would allow that there were particular periods, not only in the history of this country, when particular feelings and wishes might be considered epidemical. In the sixteenth century the great question was religion, and every one knew with what ardor the people of Scotland entered into that question. In the seventeenth century the great question in the country was, the right of taxation. At the present moment, throughout all the world, at least throughout all civilized Europe, the question which agitated the minds of men, and which was of the utmost consequence to the well-being of states, was that of representative governments. In Scotland, educated as the people were—and when the peasant and mechanic were in the habit of reading the works of the best poets and historians of their country—It was quite impossible that they should not deeply imbibe the feeling which was now so general throughout all Europe. Though they were led to expect from a change in the representation what a change could not give, still the desire to be admitted to a participation of the benefits of the constitution ought never to be an accusation against them with men who were taught to consider their constitutional rights the greatest of blessings. If ever there was a country where from the diffusion of intelligence, the people were entitled to all the blessings of constitutional liberty, it was Scotland. The very great intelligence of the people only added to the poignancy of their present distress, and disposed them to seek with the greater ardour and perseverance to cure the abuses which, rightly or wrongly, they considered to produce the very distress under which they were suffering. An hon. friend of his had just put into his hands a statement of the earnings of the weavers of Paisley at the present moment. The first class earned 6s. per week; the second class 2s. 6d.; and the third class nothing at all.

He should now advert to Yorkshire, the next great manufacturing district. It was acknowledged, that in all the manufacturing neighbourhood, property formerly of considerable value was reduced almost to nothing; that the king's taxes and poor-rates, and various demands made on the people, and which were rigorously exacted (the landholders were more merciful), had had the effect of reducing the smaller proprietors to the situation of paupers. He would content himself with stating, that the discontent of that district originated, not merely in distress, but famine.

It was not the evil inclinations of the people, but their distress, which induced them, like drowning men, to catch at any straw and listen to any remedy which was held out to them. The manufacturing interest were clamorous against high prices; the agricultural interest among them said, unless you keep the prices high they could not exist. The first class, the manufacturers, said they could not carry on their trade unless prices were lowered. The agriculturists said they could neither pay rents and taxes, nor exist as a class of men, unless prices were raised higher. He now came to Lancashire. The part of Lancashire to which he more particularly alluded, was the hundred of Salford and Manchester, in which there existed a population of about 400,000, solely employed in manufactures. In this district many villages had grown up to large towns. The population of that part of the country had grown up to an enormous extent in the course of a very few years. Along with the augmentation of the manufacturing population, another circumstance had arisen, which operated unfortunately on the present distress; he meant the dispersion of the gentry. The whole of that great manufacturing population were therefore not under their natural police, but chiefly under the authority of individuals who had no interest in the permanent prosperity of the place. There was another class of men in the magistracy—manufacturers who had left off business, and who were supposed to have an inclination to support those who were in the situation in which they were formerly themselves. The clergy were the other class of men in authority. The result of the whole was, that there did not exist in that part of the country that union between the magistrates and the people, which was essential to the due execution of the law. A great part of this evil might arise from the circumstance that the lord-lieutenant of that county had nothing to do with the nomination of magistrates. The nomination of magistrates was in the chancellor of the duchy; the consequence of which was, that those nominated to the magistracy had generally been persons who held principles which were considered high flown Tory. The gentry of Manchester, and that neighbourhood generally, in 1745, were Jacobites; and it was his firm belief, that though the object of their worship was changed, their principles were the same.

While such illiberal opinions were entertained by one class, the education of the labouring orders had been carried to a great extent. He could prove by the incontrovertible testimony of thousands and tens of thousands, that the greatest improvement had taken place in the morals and education of the lower orders. He would say then, that in consequence of this education, and the feelings to which it had given rise on the part of the people, and the violent opposite feeling on the part of the magistrates, there had resulted a strong opposition between them. There was one union of men calling themselves radicals on one side, and another formidable union of persons, calling themselves orange-men on the other, who were encouraged and fostered by these magistrates. He knew the fact, that one of the judges at the last assizes thought proper to pass the severest censure on one of the partners of a great house connected with a magistrate, for conduct connected with one of those societies of an illegal nature. He knew, too, for certain, that in that county there were men who prostituted the office of minister of religion to gratify the passions of the members of this society. As he saw the right hon. the member for Liverpool in his place, he would ask him if on the day of the anniversary of the battle of the Boyue, there was not in Liverpool a procession of Orange-men, who celebrated their horrid rites, and got up that procession in a manner which could hardly fail to have a necessary reaction on the other party? They got up a procession, in which there was a person dressed as the pope, another as a cardinal, and there was carried before them the mock insignia of the Catholic faith. These persons entered a church, where having stripped the Catholic robes, they with the insignia were committed to the flames, and then there was found a clergyman who preached a sermon to them. He considered that clergyman to have been guilty of what was little better than sedition and blasphemy. He held in due reverence those persons who ministered to the altar; he estimated that character highly, but he could not help saying that the conduct of the individual filled him with horror, and if he had not blasphemed, no man ever blasphemed [Hear, hear!]. Nor was this instance a solitary one; the same things took place in other places, and were fostered by the magistrates—they took place in the neighbourhood of Manchester. Under this state of things—this aggravating conduct—this difference of sentiments between the governing and the governed—they could hardly wonder that the discontent should here be extreme. He held in his hands an account of the rate of wages in different parts of Lancashire, comprehending nearly all the manufacturing neighbourhoods. The wages earned in one place were from 6s. to 9s. and 10s. per week, for fifteen hours labour per day; in another place from 7s. to 8s. for 13 hours per day; the next 6s. per week for 15 hours per day; in another place 6s. per week for 15 hours; in another 7s. per week for 14 hours; in another 6s. per week for 15 hours per day. No language could convey an adequate description of the distress of the people. They had been, to a great extent, compelled to sell their clothes—their beddings were sacks stuffed with chips—they had no blankets;—in fact, the situation of themselves and children was that of hopeless misery. This was but a sample of the condition of things that prevailed generally throughout those districts; and he would ask, whether it was not natural, whether it was not an unavoidable result, that the people should look to parliament for assistance? Could they be expected to endure miseries of this description without applying for relief to some quarter? If no relief was obtained, discontent must be the consequence, and discontent would finally produce despair. He readily admitted that these feelings had been inflamed by the practices of designing men; but for the greater part they originated in, and were kept alive by, what approached to a state of famine. Give them but food and work, and the House would soon cease to hear of their distresses or their discontents.

Seeing, then, that this was the general disposition amongst these classes, and that their poverty and sufferings were undisputed, it might be worth while to advert a little to the view which was taken by them of the late transactions. It was a firm persuasion amongst them, that long before the meeting on the 16th of August, the municipal authorities at Manchester were their enemies. They were convinced that the meeting itself was legal, and they knew that it had been dispersed by the sword. Their belief was, that the magistrates in committing Mr. Hunt for high treason, and liberating him on bail (VOL. XLI.)

for a misdemeanor, had shown a disposition to strain the powers of the law. They conceived that excessive bail had been demanded in the first instance, for they found that whilst the magistrates required security to the amount of 1,000l., the judge of assize considered 400l. to be an adequate sum. All these circumstances they looked upon as so many acts of injustice. The grand jury was supposed to have been influenced by partial considerations; and it had since appeared, that they were justified in their opinion that the magistrate at Warrington had acted illegally. The whole proceedings under the coroner's inquest seemed to them equally unwarrantable, and to manifest an equally hostile disposition towards their rights and interests. The House, too, in subsequently refusing to go into an inquiry upon all these subjects, had done more to excite distrust and inflame animosity, than by any proceeding for a long series of years. The belief and opinion which he had just mentioned as being universally entertained amongst many classes, he himself knew to be the full and firm conviction of a most respectable portion of society at Manchester. The persons to whom he now referred were good, rational, and sincere men, of deep religious impressions, of a sedate and sober character, seldom mingling with politics, or acting out of their domestic circles. Even amongst these, a certain air of fierceness, foreign to their original deportment, was observable, which reminded him of that passage in which lord Clarendon says, that the gentle nature of Hampden was so affected by the injustice which he had witnessed, as to appear entirely changed. Two questions therefore presented themselves with reference to this important point—what the state of feeling was prior to, and what it had been since, the 16th of August. His own belief was, that the fatal events of that day had led to a determination on the part of many to provide themselves with arms. Still they placed some dependence on the proceedings of parliament. In the mean time, the utmost anxiety was shown for labour, in order not only to procure subsistence, but to provide means of defence. Ever since the 16th of August, an awful and portentous silence had marked their ordinary intercourse. It bore too strong a resemblance to that state of public feeling so powerfully described by the historian, as having at one famous period of (3 M)

national misfortune characterised the Roman people:—“Neque populi, aut plebis, ulla vox, sed attoniti vultus, et conversæ ad omnia aures. Non tumultus, non quies, quale magni metus, et magnæ iræ silentium est.” Many circumstances had long before occurred to produce resentment, but the latter had filled up the measure of what they conceived their sufferings and their wrongs. An hon. friend of his had presented a petition in the year 1812, in which it was offered to prove a series of conduct on the part of the magistrates of the most unjustifiable and irritating nature. Instead, however, of examining, the House granted an indemnity. That the same system of outrage and oppression was still pursued, there was too much reason to apprehend. Most of the information of his majesty's ministers on the subject of these discontents was obtained on the reports of spies and others, who he would not say were immediately connected with government, but were employed by persons who were prone to be much too busy in their avocation. Whilst upon this part of the subject, he would also add, that one end to which he wished the inquiry, if agreed to, should be directed, was the providing some better municipal form of government for the town of Manchester than it possessed at present. Its whole police was now in the hands of a boroughreeve and constables, assisted by two stipendiary magistrates. He doubted not that their police-officers had been engaged in some very atrocious transactions; and he was sure the House could not do better than inquire into them, and endeavour to devise some better system of future regulation.

The first point of the inquiry which he recommended, however, would be, into the general state of the manufacturing districts; but it would be, he conceived, a mere delusion to limit that inquiry to the state of the markets for particular commodities. He could not exclude from the consideration of the state and condition of the manufacturing classes, the causes of their present discontents. It might be found impossible to frame any plan of general or immediate relief, but he had no doubt that many measures might be adopted to correct and mitigate the evil. It had been justly remarked, that, in this view, the people had done every thing, and the government nothing. Even small purchases of an article that was depressed in value had often been found extremely beneficial. The occasion, too, was a proper one for undertaking works of a public nature—he did not mean palaces, but works of solid utility, roads and canals by which all the operations of commercial and agricultural industry might be promoted. Even all this might be found insufficient, he admitted, to afford employment to the hundreds of thousands who stood in need of it; but if only thousands could be relieved, was not that an object of national importance? But there was also something to be undone, as well as much to be done. It might be found expedient to repeal those absurd laws, passed in times of barbarism and ignorance, with regard to the true maxims of commercial policy, by which, under heavy penalties, the emigration of our artisans was restrained. At the present moment that emigration, in his opinion, ought to be permitted ad libitum. He did not mean by this observation to approve the plan of carrying them amongst savage nations, and with imperfect means of colonizing. It was not, however, to be denied that there were too many whose absence from their country would be felt rather as a blessing than a loss, at the present moment. But he would wish to see them emigrate to our own colonies and possessions, whither they would carry their skill and knowledge, and where they would both communicate and receive advantage. It was far from his design, he could assure the House, to involve any committee in a labyrinth of matter, out of which it might be difficult to extricate itself. Though the subject was comprehensive, it was definite, and led to conclusions by no means irreconcilable in their nature. His motion had for its object the restoration of peace to a distracted country—to unite and tranquillize where disunion alone unhappily reigned. He should indeed glory if he could be rendered the humble instrument of soothing misery and allaying discontent—of raising a temple of harmony on the spot which was now a scene of agitation, of suffering, and of strife. The hon. member concluded amidst loud cheers by moving, “That a committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the Manufacturing Districts.”

Lord Castlereagh observed, that he did not rise to follow the hon. member through the extensive details into which he had entered, but he could not avoid remarking, that there was no painful circumstance, no dark picture, that could be presented by the most mischievous, which had not been introduced by the hon. gentleman, although he was ready to admit that their introduction by the hon. member was for an object widely different from the mischievous purposes for which such references were too frequently made. On entering the House, he had communicated to the honourable gentleman, with a view of rendering his motion unnecessary, that he did not object, in the first instance, to the appointment of a committee. But at the same time he felt the importance of defining specifically what the nature of the inquiry was which was to be intrusted to them. It was a duty which the House owed to the unfortunate classes of society, on whose behalf the inquiry was to be undertaken, not to cause expectations far beyond the means of parliamentary relief. When the hon. member said "give the people food and employment," did he think that it was possible for the legislature to do that? Was it possible for any fund to be established that would secure employment, amidst all the fluctuations of commerce and manufactures? Upon what principle could government act, if in seasons of difficulty they were to recognize the policy of taking from one class merely for the purpose of giving to another? Such a practice was equally inconsistent with all the rules of sound policy, and with the very nature of property in general. Yet the hon. gentleman had just delivered a speech by which it appeared, that there was nothing in the temper of an angry and irritated people, nothing in speculative policy, nothing in the administration of government, that did not mix itself with that question which he had proposed to refer to a committee up stairs. He would venture to say, that no such trust ever had been confided to a committee. That committee if appointed, would indeed be placed in a cruel situation, if the House were to instruct it to go into the consideration of all those topics. If the fact were as had been stated, that Lancashire was a county of Tory magistrates and orange clubs, if it was really divided in parties complaining of mutual injuries, and of grievances unredressed, he could not imagine a more certain means of committing man against man, party against party, and inflaming whatever of animosity already excited, than such an investigation. Was this an expedient course, a fit remedy to be adopted, in the temper and feelings which prevailed in that district? Could any measure be more calculated to bring the passions of men into an interminable conflict, than to inform this agitated part of the country, that a tribunal was now sitting ready to listen to any story which one neighbour could tell of another, every old complaint, and every actual grievance that could be alleged? Such a course would set person against person, party against party, and instead of what the hon. member termed a tranquillizing and conciliatory committee, a source of disorders and confusion would be opened, destructive of his object and replete with danger. However disposed he might be to accede to an inquiry, the object of which was to ascertain facts, and to discover more clearly and intelligibly the causes of distress in the manufacturing districts, he must guard his concurrence from any assent to what would in the event be so injurious a proceeding—a proceeding that would go to try over again every subject of local agitation and private dispute which could be revived in the present irritated state of public feeling. When he found that the present proposition tended to obtain by an indirect manner or side wind, the very kind of investigation into angry transactions, which parliament had decided was only fit for courts of justice, he could not accede to such a motion. He thought it would only be calculated to increase the evils of the times, and he trusted the House would take the same view of the subject, and would not contribute to place the country in a state of greater discontent than it was at present by granting a committee on such sweeping grounds.

Mr. Baring said, he could not see in the proposition for the committee any ground for the objections of the noble lord. Such a committee, even from the very words of the motion could not be presumed to take the course supposed by the noble lord. He was as averse as any man to confound political inquiries with an investigation into the state of the unparalleled distress notoriously existing in the manufacturing districts. It might be stated in the motion that the inquiry should be purely commercial; the attempt to go farther would be mixing questions calculated to counteract the very purpose of its appointment. It was however very natural that his honourable friend in that characteristic zeal, eagerness, and benevolence which distinguished his public life, should not have gone through his statement without adverting to circumstances which no man could reflect upon with feelings of indifference. But how did it follow that because such a reference was made in the speech of his hon. friend, that therefore the proceedings of the committee were to be encumbered with such inquiries? It might indeed furnish the noble lord with an excuse to resist the real object; but in what a situation did such an objection, if acted upon, leave the House? After having by former decisions, refused every political investigation, while the House was in the progress of passing five or six bills, which without any reference to the question of their necessity, must be considered as very important restrictions on the liberty of the subject, they were likely to separate for the holidays, without taking any one step to investigate into that state of severe and unprecedented distress, which was admitted by every one to exist in the country. But it was said the remedy was beyond the control of parliament. Even if it were so, and though it could be clearly made out that no positive benefit would follow the labours of the committee, yet he insisted that the House of Commons was called upon by a sense of decency to institute an inquiry when millions of their miserable countrymen were in such a situation—In such a state of things the noble lord, he trusted, would not oppose the motion merely because his hon. friend had not drawn it in that manner, and in those set phrases, which would have appeared to him more suitable. He still hoped that the noble lord, on further consideration, would give them the committee. For his part, he would have no objection to the insertion of words in the motion which should prescribe the precise duties of the proposed committee. It was impossible to reflect on the great change which had taken place in the character of the population of the manufacturing districts—in seeing a part of the country, once distinguished for loyalty, he might say ultra-loyalty, now converted into the theatre of sedition and disaffection—without feeling that the causes of such a violent transition ought to be deeply and minutely examined. None could be assigned but distress; and it was incumbent on the House to ascertain its causes and its extent. They would hear from others better qualified to judge, their opinions on this subject. To him it appeared mixed up with many circumstances. The immediate cause of distress amongst the manufacturing population was to be found in diminished markets, and diminished consumption of our manufactured articles both at home and abroad. To account for that diminution it was sufficient to advert to the state of every branch of national industry. In a very short time it was probable the distresses of the agricultural body would be brought before that House for its consideration. Indeed it was the strange but strong feature of the intensity of the great distress, that all classes, from the largest landowner to the humblest weaver, were in a state of great uneasiness and depression. The same distress was felt in America, brought about chiefly by the alterations in her currency, with regard to which she had lately formed her policy very much on the model of our example. Her agricultural produce had in consequence suffered a depreciation of one half, and her dealings had decreased in proportion in the markets of Manchester and Sheffield. He must repeat, though he was aware that the observation had given great offence to some persons, that it was the natural effect of a transition from war to peace, to produce in those branches of the public industry a considerable depression. But that the certain cause of the continuance and aggravation of that distress was to be found in the want of tranquillity and security in the manufacturing districts themselves, he had not the smallest doubt. Those districts were suffering at that moment under the evils which the confusion and anarchy inseparable from the delusions so mischievously propagated, could not fail to produce. With such a state the progress of successful industry was incompatible. He felt so strongly the force of that evil, that he had no hesitation in saying that if such a state of things continued for eighteen months, there would be an end to the manufacturing prosperity of the country. In what manner that state of confusion and agitation was to be repressed, whether by coercive measures or conciliation, was not then the question; but he would repeat that all commercial industry must disappear under such circumstances. The worst enemies the population of these districts had, were those designing agitators,—those fiends, as he must call them, who turned the views of the inhabitants of those districts to the ruin of the constitution as the remedy for their distresses.—Though such was his conviction, he was himself what was called a moderate parliamentary reformer; he did consider it both expedient and politic that some change should be made in the formation of that House. But when he heard persons talk of the state of the representation as the cause of the existing distress, he did think that such an observation could never be offered to the attention of men, unless through a gross contempt for their understandings. Under what system, he would ask, had the manufacturing interests raised themselves to that unparalleled height of prosperity to which in this country they had risen? Under the present state of parliamentary representation certainly. It was important that the people now suffering should understand and feel this, because he felt assured, that such was the ignorance and delusion that prevailed in their minds, that in every cottage and cabin throughout those counties, the picture of that charlatan and arch impostor Hunt was suspended, holding him out as the only person from whom these persons could expect either redress or remedy for their miseries. As long as these delusions prevailed, there existed the strongest obstacles to the return of prosperity in the manufacturing districts. If these deceived persons deserted the path of their duty and became politicians alone, there would be an end to the hope of returning prosperity. These deceptions exposed and their influence destroyed, there was no apprehension to be entertained as to the revival of trade. He did not agree with the view which his honourable friend seemed to entertain as to the improbability of that revival. It was his opinion, that unless capitalists were frightened and driven away, our manufactures would speedily revive. What had British capital and skill to fear with the whole of the New World open to their industry and enterprise—when, in the whole extent of territory from Cape Horn to Baffin's Bay, scarce an individual was to be met who was not clad in British manufacture, or a House to be entered of which the furniture was not composed of British materials? We had also begun to drive an independent trade with the East Indies; and the consumption of British manufactures in Europe was still considerable. There was, then, reason to expect as great demand for our manufactures, quite as much, as one would desire in any country, though certainly not so much as we possessed when, during the war, we had the monopoly of the world. But if those counties were not restored to that tranquillity and good order, without which commercial security could not exist, our rivals at Rouen, or on the Maine, or elsewhere (whose rivalry it would under other circumstances be absurd to dread) must succeed, and supplant this country in every branch; while the unhappy and deluded population would be left wise legislators perhaps, but without food and clothing. But of all the wicked and unfounded misrepresentations which agitators propagated amongst these deluded persons, nothing exceeded the attempt to hold out as their enemies, the capitalists, living in their neighbourhood. Without capital, how could the skill or industry of the workmen find employment? But if these capitalists found their lives and property insecure, could they be expected to remain? He understood that they were already moving away in considerable numbers. If the progress of the evil was not speedily arrested, and for such a beneficial change he mainly relied on the good sense of the people (for after all, whatever might be the extent and character of the delusions practised, the good sense of the people of this country at length generally interposed) irremediable ruin must be the result. The alarm of the present period was particularly great—there never had been a period when so much of the capital of the country was withdrawn for the purpose of being invested in foreign securities, as during the last three weeks. A sort of panic had seized the public mind—there was a general saute qui peut amongst monied men, each endeavouring to outrun the other in removing capital from the kingdom. This was a state of things which required the attention of parliament. The alarm could be dissipated only by the lower classes becoming satisfied that it was not their interest to pursue their visionary schemes, and by the higher perceiving the impossibility that a social system like that established in this country should be disorganized by such means. In any other case, the extent of danger could not be calculated. His own opinion was, that a considerable degree of the present distress in some of the manufacturing districts arose from this insecurity on the part of many capitalists, who very naturally feared to embark in business, which would be attended with more than those ordinary risks which all men looked to in trade. At the same time that he stated this, he admitted that there were a variety of circumstances which it would become a committee of the sort proposed to inquire into, and which it would be the duty of the House to take into serious consideration. He was not then prepared to say what measures it might be proper to adopt; but whether any immediate practical measure should result from this committee or not, there would at least this good effect follow—it would be impressed on the minds of those who were discontented, that the House was disposed to do something for them. God forbid that he should be of opinion that the great body of those who were discontented and who were said to be disaffected, were wilfully so. He admitted, that many of them were in distress, and were deluded by those who took advantage of that distress to instil pernicious principles into their minds. If any thing could be done to relieve them in the way of contribution, he should not hesitate to give his vote for the application of one or two million from the public fund for that object. We had resorted to such expedients in cases not so important as the present. At the same time that he would be glad to acquiesce in this or in any measure which could afford relief, yet he did not think the one he had now mentioned would be the best; for if it was considered that there were a million of persons in this distress, of what avail would 3 or 4*l.* each be to produce effectual relief? When, however the distress which prevailed was looked at, one anxiously caught at a measure which appeared calculated to give relief, though in viewing its details he might be startled from his own proposal. In agreeing to give such a pecuniary aid as that to which he alluded, he should be acting against his better judgment; but he mentioned it as showing what he would be disposed to do. There was another question connected with this subject, and which ought, in his opinion, to be referred to the investigation of a committee—he meant the state of wages. This might be considered by some as a small question, but it appeared to him peculiarly deserving of attention. It had, no doubt, been maintained by the political economists, that trade should be left to itself, and that arrangements with respect to labour should be left to the employers and the employed—that, in fact, the legislature should not interfere in such topics. This was, he admitted, a very sound principle, generally speaking; but it should be recollected, that in this country the character and operation of our poor laws produced an artificial state of society; for if we had 100,000 men engaged in trade, and 20,000 of that body were compelled to work on terms inadequate to their support, the remainder must supply the deficiency, or the community generally must be incumbered for that purpose. But a particular cause, which had arisen of late years, demanded inquiry upon this subject of wages. He meant the advertisement of several parishes to let out paupers upon reduced terms. He would not deny that the desire and policy of men engaged in trade was (whatever might be said of its inhumanity) to screw down the price of labour as low as possible. He did not say that this was generally done, but it was acted upon in a degree to be productive of considerable mischief. The great manufacturer who employed a very large number of men, and who embarked a very considerable capital in trade, could not effect this low reduction. He was obliged to take many things into his consideration, besides the immediate profit he might derive from it, and he allowed those in his employ a regular and stated price; but the small capitalist, who cared not what the world thought of him, went on a different system, and got together the scrapings of work-houses, whom he employed at from 2*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* per week. From those causes, the wages of the operative labourers were so materially reduced, that notwithstanding the principles of the political economists, which were generally unexceptionable, he was, he must confess, for the sake of humanity, an advocate for the establishment of a minimum with respect to wages. To inquire, then, into those points, he would vote for the proposed committee, in order that the House might have an opportunity of receiving information from the manufacturers themselves, who had experience upon those subjects, for he must confess, that he had himself no experience at all. He had, however, impressions which he felt it his duty to state to the House, with a view to urge investigation. But there was another point connected with this question, which he thought called for inquiry—he meant the state of the currency. Gentlemen would not, he hope, feel alarmed, as he did not intend to enter into the question of the currency at any length. But he could not help observing, that the state of the currency had a very material effect upon the present distress of the country. If, when the paper currency was said to have been depreciated 25 per cent. a metallic currency had been issued at that depreciation, the course would have been, in his judgment, much wiser than that since followed. For by the issue of such a currency, the country would have been, in his view, saved from an addition to the national debt, to the amount which he had mentioned; and that too at a time when the means of bearing such an increase were considerably diminished. One result of this had been, that the facility of commercial speculation was very much diminished. Whether a great part of that speculation was well founded or not, or whether we had not well got rid of it, was not now the question, nor would he stop to inquire into it; but this could not be denied, that we were now labouring under the effect of it. He would not go into any question upon the policy of the measures to which we had since had recourse on this subject; but while he said this, he wished it to be understood, that he had no desire to interfere with the system which parliament had adopted with respect to the circulating medium of the country, or the restoration of cash payments. As parliament had adopted that system, it ought to be pursued. One thing, however, he would advise—that as we had raised the currency, we should pay in both gold and silver, by which, in his opinion, the facility of commercial speculation would be very considerably increased; but upon this subject he might possibly have to occupy the attention of the House at another time. This appeared to him the better plan with respect to the interests of commerce, and to those interests he trusted that House would always be duly attentive, for notwithstanding what a right honourable gentleman had said on the other side as to the paramount consequence of constitutional objects, and the comparative insignificance of commercial considerations, he hoped that the constitution and the commerce of the country would as they had long done, go on prosperously together. But the peace and prosperity of the country depended mainly upon the maintenance of its moral character, for if that character were gone, it mattered nothing whether the distress of the country were relieved, or its taxation reduced. He apologized for having thus taken up the attention of the House, and trusted the noble lord would, on better consideration, consent to a committee, with the understanding that it was not to include in its investigations any political inquiry.

Mr. Booth Wilbraham observed, that the speech of the honourable gentleman who had just sat down, had done him infinite credit. But he could not concur in the view of the hon. gentleman with the establishment of a minimum of wages. There had indeed been two committees appointed by that House upon the subject of trade, to the evidence and report of which he would refer the hon. gentleman, in order to show the impracticability of the proposition which he had suggested. With respect to the speech of the honourable mover, whom he would take the liberty of calling his honourable friend, he was sorry that he could not approve of the view which his hon. friend had taken of the subject; for it was certain that nine-tenths of the speech with which his hon. friend introduced his motion, had reference more to extraneous matters than to the objects which a committee might be supposed to be called upon to inquire into. For his hon. friend, and for those feelings by which he was actuated, he had the highest respect; but there were some parts of his hon. friend's speech on which he deemed it necessary to make a few observations, as conceiving he possessed more accurate knowledge of facts than that which had reached his hon. friend. First, he begged to deny that disorder and discontent prevailed most in those districts where distress existed to the greatest extent. In many of those places where the greatest clamour was excited, the people were not only not out of employment, but were in work, and had comparatively good wages. With respect to the appointment of magistrates in Lancashire, he could not agree that it was such as to produce any evils. There was this difference in the appointment of men to the commission in that county from others—that in the latter the magistrates were appointed by the custos rotulorum, or by the lord high chancellor, but in Lancaster they were nominated by the chancellor of the duchy; and he would affirm, that in the exercise of that important trust, no unfit person had been selected. There was, however, one difference in the selection—that from motives which he was certain would be approved, no person having any connexion with the trade of the place was put into the commission of the peace. This was a regulation which originated with Mr. Perceval, and arose from a feeling that, in disputes which must arise between masters and their men, those masters should not have authority to decide upon them as magistrates. This, no doubt, was a delicate matter, but it was a delicacy of which the necessity was obvious. His hon. friend had alluded to Orange societies, and to the procession of one in Liverpool. He had heard of such a fact, but of the many circumstances attending it, such as the sermon being preached, &c. he had not heard any thing before. An Orange club or society had, he believed, foolishly walked in procession through the streets, and were pelted by the people; but, however, what had that to do with the inquiry which it was wished to institute? He was one of those who thought that all such societies tending to create or keep alive party spirit, were mischievous, and ought to be discountenanced. With respect to the change to which the hon. member alluded in the municipality of Manchester, he (Mr. Wilbraham) did not think it was called for. The principal officers in the town, namely, the boroughreeve, two constables, and deputy constables, were appointed by a court leet under the lord of the manor, who was sir Oswald Moseley; and those officers were usually selected from among the most respectable inhabitants of the town. Manchester had flourished under such a municipal government, and he did not see how it was necessary to alter it. Allusion had been made to charges against the conduct of Mr. Nadin, the officer, at Manchester. He (Mr. B. Wilbraham) had also heard of charges against him with respect to what was called “blood money,” but he could add, that of those charges, after they had been inquired into by the magistrates, Mr. Nadin was fully acquitted. It was not, it was true, before a court this examination was made; but from his knowledge of the magistrates, he might look upon their opinion on that subject as a verdict of acquittal. As to procuring work for the manufacturers of a kind different from that which they had been accustomed, he was apprehensive that such a scheme would afford little relief. Many of them had tried it, but from the effect of the shuttle on their hands had been rendered unfit for other work. He repeated his conviction, that persons willing to work were not to be found among those who had so much contributed to agitate the northern counties, and especially Lancashire.

Mr. Wilberforce said, he regretted that those persons who were so clamorous in decrying the constitution, could not hear the excellent speech of his hon. friend—could not hear him assert, that under that excellent constitution, we had become a great, industrious, prosperous, and moral people. That speech marked a most laudable respect for the religion and morals of the country, and was eminently calculated to discountenance the spirit of blasphemy and disaffection, which was at present unhappily so prevalent. He was sorry that they, whose object seemed to be to subvert all order—to destroy all moral and social feeling, under pretence of improving, or as it was said restoring the constitution: he was sorry that these, and the unhappy persons who were deluded by them, could not hear the danger in which his hon. friend had proved the commerce of the country was placed by such practices. His hon. friend had justly said, that commerce and manufactures would depart the land if those seditious practices were continued; for here was the difference between land and commerce in times of public calamity and disturbance—that the value of the one might be much reduced, but the other would be destroyed altogether; and what would be the fate of this country when deprived of this great source of her wealth and prosperity? She would share the fate of those other countries which when deprived of trade, were reduced to the lowest distress, and almost removed from the rank of nations. The fate of Venice and the Hanse towns showed that commercial prosperity or credit could not co-exist with an alarm as to the instability or insecurity of property. He agreed with his hon. friend, that something should, if possible, be done to look out for employment for those who were now deprived of it. If only a small number were so employed, it would create a proportion between the demand for labour and the supply. Something he thought might be done on this ground, but he conceived that no good could be expected.

from an inquiry into the various topics to which the hon. member by whom the present motion had been submitted to the House, had referred. If it were to be limited to the manufacturing class he should have objection to inquiry. But the discontents of which the House and the country had heard so much, were not, it appeared, principally found among the unemployed, or the really distressed, but among persons differently circumstanced. Those who were discontented with the constitution of parliament, were, it appeared, equally discontented with the character of religion. But those malcontents who felt little for the sufferings of the people, were not so universally successful in the propagation of their system as they seemed to imagine. He indeed was happy to say, that their noxious doctrines were decidedly repelled by the religious associations with whom he had the honour to be connected, as was especially found in Ayrshire and other counties in the west of Scotland, the inhabitants of which, without murmur, laboured under very great distress, and were most patient under their privations. This circumstance, and indeed the contents of the papers on the table, proved to him, that it was not where the greatest distress existed that disaffection most prevailed. Yet those papers manifested an extent of turbulence and disaffection that called upon the legislature to interfere. The hon. mover had observed, that the discontents of the people in Lancashire were greater since the 16th of August than they were before, and that the object of the people was parliamentary reform. For himself, he would say, that he was once an advocate for a moderate reform of the system of representation in that House, but he must confess that he was so in order to prevent such a fever as at present prevailed. He now, however, saw, that nothing like a moderate reform would satisfy the discontented. No; nothing would now satisfy them but the utter destruction of the constitution. Therefore he would make no concession likely to give power to those who appeared to seek nothing less than the subversion of the constitution. The distress of the people he lamented as much as any man, and he concurred with his hon. friend in urging the adoption of every possible plan to relieve that distress. He agreed with his hon. friend as to many of the causes of our present distress. He admitted that a great part of it was connected with the state of the currency; but there was another great cause—the effects of the long war in which we had been engaged. It was natural that a long war should be productive of such distress; it was one of the wise dispensations of an all-wise Providence that men should keenly suffer the calamitous consequences of war, in order to restrain them from a pursuit so revolting to a benign nature. If such consequences indeed did not follow evil deeds, an encouragement would be held out for the prosecution of vice. He again adverted to those itinerant and seditious individuals who went about the country preaching most pernicious doctrines, and only anxious to destroy what they pretended to improve, and he again wished that they could have heard the opinions of his hon. friend. Great had been the neglect, not indeed of the legislature of the present day, but of former times, in omitting to attend to the education of the lower classes. By a strict attention to the education of the poor in morality and religion, could we alone hope for future tranquillity and prosperity to the country. Where people were destined to possess a great degree of liberty, there must be a certain degree of moral education to enable them to enjoy it. Things of this kind had hitherto been too much left to themselves, and the results were now felt. For if a proper notion of the sacredness of property had been given to the people, would they have passed such resolutions as those by which they had disgraced themselves at Barnsley? He should only add, that as far as the inquiry proposed could lead to the alleviation of the distress that existed, there was no greater friend to it than he was; but he deprecated the extension of that inquiry to other subjects.

Mr. Philips expressed his hope that a good effect would be produced by the observations of his hon. friend respecting Orange meetings, although, no doubt, the noble lord classed these observations among those which ought not to have been made. He was convinced that the influence of his hon. friend's opinions on those persons in Lancashire who had been alluded to, was very considerable. If, also, it appeared from what had been said respecting the appointment of magistrates, that the present system tended to produce magistrates of one class of political opinions only, that surely was a great evil. The only valid objection which, in his opinion, had been made to the motion, was founded on a remark of the hon. mover, from which he, and he believed all the House dissented, with respect to the propriety of discussing the question of a minimum of wages. There was no doubt that the present state of the manufacturing districts had produced effects injurious to the commerce and prosperity of the country; but the evil, he apprehended, was to be met only by natural means, and could not be removed by legislative measures. He deprecated the idea of persuading the manufacturers that their wages could be raised except by the natural course of demand for labour. In his inquiries into the state of the operative manufacturers, he had recourse to a great manufacturer in that part of the country, who was a person of moderate political opinions, and well qualified to give him the requisite information. He had learned that the spinners were, in general, very well off, and that the weavers were in the worst situation. The general average of wages obtained by operative manufacturers of every description was as follows—men from 9s. to 12s. a week, and boys and girls, from 4s. to 6s. Many had much lower but others had much higher wages. It was to be recollected, that it was not with manufacturing as with agricultural families, where the whole earnings were confined to the wages of the man. When weavers had numerous families of sons and daughters, grown up, they might, low as the rate of wages was, earn what would make them comfortable; for boys and girls of 16 years of age might gain nearly as much as the father of the family, and the mother fully as much, if not called away by domestic duties. The manufacturers, therefore, on the whole, were probably not in so bad a situation as the House conceived them to be, though they were in a state of depression compared with their former condition, which they felt most severely. Nevertheless, he thought that the acquiescence of the House in the motion of his hon. friend, would be productive of the best effects on the manufacturing districts. The determination of parliament to refuse an inquiry into the proceedings of the 16th of August, had already produced the worst consequences, and the dissatisfaction of that part of the country would be increased if this inquiry was also refused. The tax on wool was one of the chief sources of manufacturing and commercial difficulty and discontent in Yorkshire. Among the good effects of inquiry, one would be, that the committee would, he had no doubt, recommend it to men of property and influence to reside on their estates, for it might be observed that, in Lancashire, in proportion as wealthy and respectable persons belonging to the county resided elsewhere, public agitators had gained ground; and the population had been abandoned to their exclusive influence.

Mr. Stuart Wortley was anxious to address the House, lest it should be supposed that he was adverse to all inquiry.—Had the motion been bona fide for a committee to inquire into and endeavour to adopt measures for the relief of the manufacturing interests, in his conscience he believed it might be productive of great good. It would be productive of great good, because it would show that the House was not insensible to the distresses which existed to so melancholy an extent, and show also that time only could remedy them. He felt that the state of the country was most painful, and that a great body of the people were in the deepest distress, aggravated by persons telling them it could only be removed by a change in that constitution under which they had grown up to the height of their former prosperity. But friendly as he was to investigation, it was impossible for him to suppose that any beneficial result could be attained by a motion like the present, mixed up and introduced with so much political matter. He would agree with the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, that a great part of the distress and dissatisfaction that prevailed in the manufacturing districts, arose from the non-residence of persons of wealth and rank.—The mechanic and his master were left, as it were, to themselves, and they had for some time been quarrelling about wages. Between the labouring mechanics and the master manufacturers, there was an opposition of interests, and violent disputes which had lasted for years. It was not as in the agricultural counties where the peasant looked up to the farmer, the farmer to his landlord, the proprietor to the peer, and the peer to the Crown, thus forming a connected chain which bound the highest and lowest classes of society together.—On the contrary the operative weaver saw no gradation. There was only himself toiling, and his employer apparently enjoying all the luxuries of life: no wonder he repined at his condition, and at observing that all labour was exhausted but for this single end. The House had often in the course of these discussions received the advice to conciliate; but the factious put it out of their power, by the violence of their conduct, to conciliate.—They could hold no parley with those who came forward to demand that they should give up the constitution. He had been led to this view of the subject, by perusing the writings of the discontented, and with the permission of the House he would read some paragraphs from a pamphlet recently published, not indeed by a Radical, but by a person of their own rank in life, if he was rightly informed, by a gentleman of education and talents who was a candidate at the late Westminster election. He certainly had no authority for saying so; but he believed that to be the case. The pamphlet was entitled “A Trifling Mistake in Thomas Lord Erskine’s Preface to a Defence of the Whigs,” and it would show the House what were the opinions entertained by certain Reformers on the subject of reform. It was preached up by the public agitators, that reform was the only source from which relief could flow to the people; and how did the writer of the pamphlet in question speak of the motion for reform which was about to be submitted to the House by a noble lord.—“It is, however, not quite so consoling, nor, may I add at all accountable, when I find your lordships’ call concluding with the notification, that you have fixed your sheet anchor in lord John Russell’s reform proposition, announced, so you say, for the next session of parliament. Gracious Heavens! are you laughing at us, my lord? It is not fair that one man should expose another to ridicule by placing him on an eminence, which his own modesty would prompt him to decline. At the same time, my respect for this young gentleman’s personal character shall not prevent me from saying that there is not a single man except Mr. Perry (and he only said he did) and your lordships, who cares one farthing about lord John’s proposition, or who looks at it with any interest whatever.” He would not at present state his opinion of the noble lord’s intended motion, nor would he say whether he intended to vote for it; but the extract which he had just read showed how every system of moderate reform was ridiculed. He should now read another passage of the same pamphlet, from which the House would see what the reform was that the author wanted, and his notions of the manner in which it was to be accomplished.—After adverting to the recent transactions at Manchester, the writer of the pamphlet proceeded thus:—“As the truth of lord Grey’s prediction that ‘the House of Commons will never reform itself,’ receives confirmation from every succeeding session; what extraordinary folly must it appear, or rather how insulting it is to the common sense of the people who suffer, to send them for redress where no redress is to be obtained? The people feel confident that one of the first measures of the next session will be to do by act of parliament what the ministers were foolish enough to try to do by the more bungling and hasty expedient of the sword. Ministers look forward to the assembling of parliament as they do to the array of an army—they know something will be attempted against the liberties of the people, and the only question with them is whether they are likely to be strong enough to resist. The parliament is by them regarded as a sort of état major to the army: there is the ecclesiastical and the civil part of the establishment; there is a commander-in-chief, seldom seen except at the bottom of a piece of paper: the statutes they make the orderly book; nothing but paper in themselves, but which are absolute commands when forced down the throat at the point of the bayonet.—What prevents the people from walking down to the House, and pulling out the members by the ears, locking up their doors, and flinging the key into the Thames?—Is it any majesty which hedges in the members of that assembly?—Do we love them?—Not at all,—we have an instructive horror and disgust at the very abstract idea of a boroughmonger. Do we respect them?—Not in the least. Do we regard them as endowed with any superior qualities?—On the contrary, individually there is scarcely a poorer creature than your mere member of parliament; though in his corporate capacity the earth furnishes not so absolute a bully. Their true practical protectors, then, the real efficient anti-Reformers, are to be found at the Horse Guards, and the Knightsbridge barracks: as long as the House of Commons’ majorities are backed by the regimental muster roll, so long may those who have got the tax-power keep it, and hang those who resist.—The only wild and visionary Reformers are those who expect a voluntary abdication of the controlling power of the most powerful empire upon earth, on the part of the present possessors of all the honours, and emoluments, and consideration, that dominion can bestow. A philosopher, a bigot, a sovereign wearied with toil or swayed by caprice, have been known to resign the reins of government; but the whole history of the earth furnishes no example of a whole body of masters, peaceably and willingly laying down that dominion which they have silently and gradually usurped. The man must be rather unreasonable who expects such virtue, such moderation, such self-sacrifice, even in an individual; but to hope for them, or to think them to be had for asking, from a whole and numerous class of society, is absolute madness. This is, indeed, wild and visionary. Nothing but brute force, or the pressing fear of it will reform the parliament. The parliament know this, and they see that the people are now meeting and following up lord Grey's recommendation to assemble, and to act upon the prudence, that is, the fear of the House. Is it not natural, then, that the parliament, should be disinclined to have its prudence so acted upon? of course it is. The ministers, who are the committee, or part, of parliament always in session, have not chosen to wait for a meeting of the whole; but have drawn the sword, without ceremony, to stop these assemblies from acting on their prudence."—The author in the next page, went on to say:—"My determination, for one, is fixed. If those who have the power attempt to deprive me of the inalienable right of meeting my fellow-countrymen by letting loose a soldier at me, without the warning of an act of parliament, I will resist him if I can: if they do give me the warning of an act of parliament, I will break it if I can. I consider the object exactly the same; the injustice equally calling for resistance; the mere additional ceremony is not worth the statute paper;—the times, the means, the occasion, must of course make part of the prudential question, which every man must determine for himself, and concerning which I do not wish to be his prompter."—If such language was held, he would ask how could they come quietly and with due deliberation to the discussion of the question of parliamentary reform: of that species of reform which they were told was laughed at, while the people were assured that nothing but brute force could have any influence on the House. At a period of agitation and distress, such as now existed, how could they make concessions, or attempt conciliation, without seeming to act from weakness?—He felt the weight of the question of parliamentary reform. He was aware that there was a very great majority of the people of the country who thought a reform of that House was necessary. He was anxious to discuss the subject as often as possible, for he was satisfied that the more it was sifted the more clearly the public would see the fallacy attempted to be imposed upon it, and be convinced of the folly and absurdity of the opinion that had been propagated, that reform was a cure for all distresses. He would say, that any great change in the constitution of that House would be a change of the constitution of the land, and therefore ought not to be introduced. The constitution wished to be overthrown was the constitution of our ancestors, and was that form of government, effectual for all practical purposes, which had rendered the country great through many past ages. To make any material alterations in this glorious fabric would be to devise a new constitution, and to try a most dangerous experiment. He felt for the distressed as sensibly as any man, but their situation was not the cause of the evil; it was the engine worked upon by a set of persons who thought they saw their way to a revolution, and whose designs must be counteracted.

Mr. Maxwell said, there was a feeling among the working population of Scotland, that by the dispersion of the meeting at Manchester their rights were affected. He thought the parliament should show that the rights and interests of the people were not disregarded, and on that principle he should vote for inquiry, without any intention of supporting the wild political doctrines which were advocated by some persons. The first effect of distress among the manufacturers was, that they took away their children from school; the next, on dissenters, that they could not support their religious establishments. With the decay of religion and education, the sources of national, and especially manufacturing prosperity, must be weakened. There was a notion among the people, that the House had lost all sympathy with the people.—He hoped the House would endeavour to show the falsehood of such a supposition. He had considered it his first duty, as a member of parliament, to exert his influence in the part of the country with which he was connected, to induce the people to respect parliament; and he also thought it his duty on the other hand to tell the House, that they ought to afford every possible assistance to the distressed manufacturers of the country.

The Lord Advocate said, it was impossible for any man to view this question, and not to see that the interests of England were inseparably connected with those of Scotland. He should offer no exaggerated statement to the House, because he conceived statements of that character to be highly injurious. He believed, indeed, that nothing had given greater confidence to the reformers in the several parts of the kingdom, than the exaggerated accounts which had been propagated of the numbers attending their meetings, and of their importance in other respects. At the same, it was necessary that the House should know the real state of that part of the kingdom with which he was connected. Independently of the assurance which had been given, that the reformers in England looked with confidence for assistance from their northern friends, he had no difficulty in saying that Scotland, was in an unpleasant and alarming state, which rendered the measures now before parliament absolutely necessary, to preserve her tranquillity; and even with them, the utmost vigilance of the magistracy, and the best exertions of all the well-disposed portion of the community. At the same time, should it ever be brought to the test, he did not doubt that Scotland would be true to itself, and would disappoint the expectations of the disaffected in other parts. That evil passions should predominate in some parts of the North would not appear strange, when hon. gentlemen considered the exceeding populousness of some of the principal manufacturing towns. Glasgow was hardly inferior in this respect to any place in the kingdom; and Paisley also contained a large population. Both had suffered severely, but it afforded him pleasure to be able to state, that in Glasgow a great part of the people had suffered without a murmur. He regretted, however, to say, that discontent was not confined to those who were in distress, but had spread among those who were not feeling the pressure of want. In the spinning department, for example, where no reduction of wages or of labour had been made, women were at this moment receiving from 10s. to 15s. a-week, and men from 12s. to 35s., and yet in that class there was as much discontent, and the numbers of radicals among them was as great as among the weavers who could barely earn a subsistence. The cause of this difference between the situation of the spinners and that of the weavers was this—the spinning was regulated by machinery, and consequently could not produce a greater quantity of thread during the hours of labour, nor employ a greater number of hands at one time than another; but the weaving was performed by the weavers at their own houses, and when the wages of the poor weavers got lower, they, with their looms at home, endeavoured to supply the deficiency, by working several more hours in the day. This, of course, had caused a surplus of produce. It was also to be recollected, that when troops were raised in Scotland during the war, there being then a scarcity of employment for operative manufacturers, the greater part of the recruits had been drawn from Glasgow, and other manufacturing towns; and when these were discharged, on the return of peace, they had resumed their former occupation; and thus the number of weavers had been greatly increased, while, at the same time, the demand for manufactured goods had decreased. Nor was the disaffection in Scotland confined to the manufacturing classes; it had extended itself to the coal-mines in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, though the workmen in these mines had higher wages than they had had for years before, and provisions were cheaper than they had been for a long period. Yet these persons had become radicals, as keen and anxious as any other body whatever. This was the stronger proof, too, that distress, or real grounds for complaint, were not essential to the reception of seditious discontent. If any class of men had reason to rely with confidence on parliament, it was these coal-miners; for parliament had relieved them from a state of slavery. In former times they were bound to the owner of the mine where they wrought, and could not leave him; nay, even if he discontinued his works and they were permitted to go elsewhere, yet whenever he resumed, they were compellable to return. From that degrading situation they had been delivered by an act of parliament. That very House of Commons, which these persons were running down, had put them into the same state as any other subjects of his majesty! Nor was this the whole extent of their obligation, for when the owners of the mines afterwards attempted to evade the law by binding them by pecuniary loans, parliament again stepped forward and declared, not only that the workman might go when he chose, but that all such contracts were null and void. Looking at the situation of Scotland, there were one or two other points of view which he begged to offer to the House. First, the march of the radicals onward to their purpose; and secondly, the method in which they were organized, were most alarming. With regard to the first, it would be recollected, that the Prince Regent, on dismissing parliament last session, alluded to the prevalence of seditious discontents, and advised gentlemen to be on the alert in watching the progress of the evil, and preserving the peace. At that time, and even for six months, it was thought in Scotland that there was no ground for such a statement. Yet, in six weeks after, meetings of reformers were held not only in Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, but in Ayrshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, and even in Fifeshire; and one of these meetings, he was grieved to say, had been headed by a person who was a landed proprietor and a justice of the peace. Even the highlands of Scotland had not been exempted from the infection. Taking advantage of the discontent arising from the system adopted in some parts of that country, of converting farms into sheep-walks, turbulent persons were now endeavouring to excite disaffection in the minds of the brave, gallant, and loyal highlanders; and to promote an unnatural union between them and the miserable radical reformers.—It was another feature of those designs, that as in former conspiracies secrecy was affected, now organization was openly avowed. The doctrine of radical reform (that was, of universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and election by ballot), was declared to be indispensable, and what ought to be obtained at all hazards. The means indeed were not exactly similar to those adopted in England, but very close in their resemblance. In Yorkshire the disaffected combined in Unions of 20: in Scotland, the Union Schools, as they called themselves, amounted to about 12 in each, including a preses, a treasurer, and a clerk. As soon as the number exceeded the rule, another union was formed. They met weekly, and spent their time in political conversation, after which the most competent of the body was called upon to read to the rest all the seditious and blasphemous publications which they had been enabled to obtain since their preceding assembly. He wished he could say that these labours produced no practical effect. But in many instances the manufacturers, who in former times were in the habit of attending church, now employed the forenoon of the Sabbath in political discussions; and it was a common practice for weavers to work at their looms on the same day, and till a late hour of the night—and this too, with their windows open, to the horror and disgust of the passengers. One of those riots also, to which the attention of the House had been called, took place at Paisley on a Sunday evening. On this occasion, the houses which were principally assaulted were those of the clergy; and the same night, and during that which followed, an attack was made upon a methodist meeting-house, in which the congregation were assembled; the windows were broken, the people were dispersed, and the clergyman was driven from the pulpit. These facts were not stated upon any idle rumours; they were perfectly notorious, and afforded an unhappy illustration of the baneful effects of those pernicious doctrines which had of late been so industriously circulated. Another fact, to which he wished to direct the attention of the House, was the prevalence of general meetings. These were precisely of the same character with those which took place in this country. They were conducted with the same regularity, with the same show of military discipline, and with the same spirit that had been exhibited elsewhere. The very silence, and order, and regularity, with which the business of these assemblies was conducted, excited in his mind the strongest apprehensions; for upon such occasions in Scotland, there scarce ever was known an instance in which the collection of a large body of people was not attended with a riot. It was singular, that, at the first Paisley meeting a disturbance actually took place, which showed that the radical leaders, who tried in vain to prevent it, had not then obtained a sufficient command over their adherents to ensure obedience to the discipline they desired. Now, however, they had acquired that control, and (contrary to the nature of Scotchmen) 5,000, 10,000, and even 20,000 persons of the lowest order assembled together, without the slightest disturbance, moved with precision, and separated with regularity; implicitly obeying every command of the orators, who harangued and deluded them. He augured from the tranquillity and order at these meetings, that a great though secret purpose was entertained; and he was persuaded that worse mischief was likely to ensue than if his countrymen gave way to their natural feelings, and rioted when they met in tumultuary numbers. Simultaneous meetings was another point which had been gained by the agitators in Scotland. Mr. Hunt had endeavoured to dissuade the Scotch from this plan; but the more violent reformers succeeded in counteracting his views; and simultaneous meetings actually took place at Paisley, Glasgow, and other places, on the 1st and 15th of November, and would have been continued at the end of every fortnight afterwards, but for the present measure of assembling parliament. The conclusion to which all these things led, and indeed it did not seem that much pains were taken to conceal it, was a general revolution, and a division of property—in which division neither friends nor foes were to be spared: and all this for the virtuous purpose of supporting the liberty of the subject! It was now a fact well known, that the demesnes of the lord-lieutenants of the different counties were to be made the subject of partition, as well as the estate of every other person possessing property. One of those noble lords had written to him on the subject, knowing that he held the highest official situation in Scotland, apprising him of the rapid progress of revolutionary principles, and stating, that unless he received an additional military force, he could not answer for the safety of the county of Lanark. The property of that noble person had like the rest been marked out for appropriation, and though the commander in chief of the forces could bring all that were in the country to bear upon Glasgow in twenty-four hours, it was not considered that the peace of the district was beyond the reach of the rebellious, or its population secured from spoliation. And be it observed, that the letter in question was written after government had, with unexampled rapidity, transported two regiments from the southern parts of this country into Scotland. Having said so much on that side of the question, it was but candid to state that he was not at all afraid but that the means existed in Scotland of resisting the danger by which it was threatened. He founded this proposition upon the good sense and reason of the people. The reformers in England might say that the Scotch never commenced any thing with which they did not go through. This he was ready to admit, but then it was not every Scotchman that had been seduced and led away. There were a great number of the community of that country, and those too of the lowest orders, who he was proud to say were mortal enemies to all wild schemes of anarchy and confusion, and who did not in the slightest degree go along with their promoters. It was the habit of many Scotchmen to look to the men by whom any new measures of reform were submitted as well as to the measures themselves; they inquired whether they were good husbands, good fathers, and good members of society; and if they found that those inquiries did not produce a satisfactory answer, they inferred that those who had not reformed themselves were not likely to reform others. He was also convinced, notwithstanding any partial effects which might have resulted from the promulgation of immoral doctrines, that the people of Scotland in spite of the arts employed to debauch their minds were still a religious people; and when they found political principles allied to the most horrible blasphemy, it would cause them to turn with equal indignation from both. Of their loyalty he was well convinced: it might sometimes have been mistaken in its object, but as a principle it was always sound and devoted. There was likewise a spirit of patriotism in Scotland which it would not be very easy to eradicate. The respectable inhabitants of those districts in which disaffection had shown its detestable front, did not stand with their hands across; they were the first to arm themselves, and to bid defiance to the monster by which they were threatened. This disposition had first manifested itself in Edinburgh, a city which had on all occasions evinced its loyalty. In 1793 a body of volunteers came forward to en-

that the appointment of the committee would inevitably terminate in disappointment and distress. With regard to conciliation, he was persuaded that there was no individual in Scotland, possessing property, who was not willing to come hand-somely forward in aid of those who were really distressed. But this feeling must be met by some other sentiment than a spirit of hostility. That spirit must be put down, and the people must show themselves willing to submit to the power of the law, before they could expect relief. If individuals came forward while the present spirit existed, it would be attributed to fear, and the effect would be productive of evil instead of good consequences. He hoped and trusted, and indeed believed, that the deliberations of parliament would have the effect of opening the eyes of the people to the ill effects of their wild and chimerical schemes; and when once this was effected, he had no doubt that persons of property would come forward in the most liberal manner; and that this circumstance, aided by the admirable measures which had been introduced into parliament, would have the effect of re-establishing peace and tranquillity. He thanked the House for the polite attention with which they had listened to him, and could assure them he would never be prone to abuse their kindness.

Mr. Ellice said, that if he had not accidentally heard the latter part of the speech of the learned lord who had just sat down (having quitted the House for a short time), he should have thought the learned lord had been all along speaking on the report of the bill for the suppression of seditious meetings. The learned lord's speech throughout, in his opinion, had nothing in the world to do with the question before the House. For his own part, he had come down to the House with a determination to bend his mind solely to the subject which was under its consideration, and to that he would address the few observations which the House might allow him to make. He felt, however, that he could scarcely say any thing on the subject, without diminishing the effect of the admirable speech which had been made by his hon. friend near him, in almost every one of whose statements and arguments he cordially concurred; and in nothing more than in his intreaty to the noble lord opposite to review his determination to oppose the appointment of a committee. Still he was free to confess that there were some objections to the motion; especially, if the labours of the committee were to be so restricted as to form a mere delusion,—in that case he would unquestionably rather leave the responsibility of acting, under the present critical circumstances, on the shoulders of government. Nevertheless, there were many points to which the deliberations of the committee might be advantageously applied. We had deviated too widely from the principles of political economy to render it an objection to any proposition that it was hostile to those principles. At present it seemed to him, that while one part of the kingdom was labouring under the greatest distress from an insufficiency of the prices of labour, another part was supported by means of the poor-rates. If something was not done to remedy this, the Scotch manufacturers must be entirely ruined, while the English manufacturer must thrive, because he was supported at the expense of the landholder. He begged to mention to the House an experiment that had been made at Coventry. About the time of the Manchester meeting, there was some disposition to riot in the city of Coventry, without, however, the least mixture of political feeling. Seeing the disposition as it grew, he considered of some means of meeting it; and he had earnestly recommended the manufacturers to meet that disposition, not with rigour, but with a leaning towards the people. The master manufacturers met him in the same spirit, and the very evening of the riot they subscribed 400*l.*, which was applied to the relief of 1,000 poor families. The next consideration was as to the best means of affording a permanent remedy for the evils which existed. It was admitted that the rate of wages was inadequate for the support of the labourer and his family. On conversing with the manufacturers, they confessed that they did not consider the rate of wages sufficiently high; but asked if they increased them, how they should get rid of the superabundant population, which they could not employ. He (Mr. Ellice) advised them to make the experiment, and that he would endeavour to provide a fund for the support of the unemployed. For that purpose he went begging in London, almost from door to door, receiving much aid from some of his hon. friends near him; and in the end collected about 1,500*l.* or 2,000*l.* which he sent down to trustees in Coventry, to be applied, not as part of the wages of the weavers employed, but to the relief of those who were unemployed. Until that hour, however, there had scarcely been a single claim upon the fund; and labour was in much greater demand at the high rate than it had been at the low. What was the consequence of these measures? When Mr. Lewis, who was not a freeman of Coventry, but who combined with the duties of a schoolmaster, the publication of a radical journal, called a meeting of the outskirts of the city, and which meeting he (Mr. Ellis) confessed he should have attended had its object been confined to the proceedings at Manchester, but which involved also the discussion of the question of annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and election by ballot, he was unable to get 200 weavers out of the town of Coventry to attend him. His hon. colleague said there was not one weaver present. It might be so, but he was sure that there were not 200, although about 1,500 persons had been collected from the outskirts of Coventry, from Birmingham, and from different parts of the county of Warwick. Indeed, such was the feeling of the inhabitants of Coventry itself, that those who were sworn in as special constables acted with a zeal against the radicals beyond their duty; but he was persuaded that had not the relief which he had proposed been afforded, instead of 200 there would have been 20,000 weavers present. Was it not desirable that a committee of that House should inquire how far it might be advisable under the existing circumstances, to adopt generally some similar regulation for the purpose of bringing the value of labour nearer its standard? It had been stated, that in all Lancashire and Scotland, wages had been reduced to from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 9*s.* a week. By adhering to this usage, we made a present to foreign countries in our manufactures of the difference between 3*s.* 6*d.* or 9*s.*; and the expence of the maintenance of the weaver. Than this, it would be better that there should be no manufactures. He did not absolutely recommend such a proposition; but he repeated, that it would be a fair object of inquiry by a committee, whether some regulation might not be adopted to prevent the wages of the manufacturer from being so miserably reduced; and he was willing to admit, that some of the evils which existed were, as had been stated on the other side of the House, to be attributed to the speculations which succeeded the declaration of peace, by which the foreign markets had been overstocked. This evil certainly would subside in some degree, but by no means to the extent which had been anticipated. Although we suffered more at present than in all probability we should at a future period, yet we could never again expect to be enabled to export so large a quantity of our manufactures as were annually sent out of the country during the war. To admit of our manufacturers experiencing any relief, the load of taxes on the people must be diminished. A great cause of the present pressure was the approaching resumption of cash payments. For that resumption he had last year voted, because he thought it was an honest proceeding; a proceeding which if the circumstances of the country admitted it, he hoped would be persevered in; but he perfectly agreed with his honourable friend that it increased the debt and the taxes 25 or 30 per cent. But there were other causes for our distress which called more immediately for remedy, and these were to be found in the taxes upon the raw material of manufactures: he alluded particularly to those upon wool and silk. His opposition to the taxes last year did not proceed from any party feeling, but from his conviction that, with the additional weight occasioned by the return to a metallic currency, they could not be sustained. Let the House consider the nature of the wool-tax. If the committee were appointed, and the wool manufacturers of Yorkshire were examined, they would tell the committee that they must give up either the trade or the tax. It was the second attempt of the government to tax the raw material. As to the tax on silk, he had no doubt if that tax were removed, that our manufacturers would be enabled to compete with success against the French. Let the right hon. gentleman opposite take off the tax on silk, and he would consent on the part of his constituents to open the ports for a free trade with France in that article of manufacture. He did not speak unadvisedly; and he was assured that in that case this country would furnish at least as much as it would receive. And why should it not be so? Why could we not in that case compete with the French when it was considered that the French purchased a great part of the raw material from us? He did hope that the right hon. gentleman, (the chancellor of the exchequer,) before he came to press the taxes on these articles, would see the force of these observations. He was persuaded the evils which existed were not of so transient a nature as had been stated, and he had no hesitation in adding that it was impossible to go on enforcing taxation, without the risk of convulsion. He knew it was unpopular to make these declarations. He was the last man in the world to lend himself to the sinister views of designing men, but he thought it his duty to state, openly and fairly, the conviction of his mind. He would say, that the country was not able to meet taxation under the restriction which would take place in our circulating medium. It would be well for the right hon. gentleman (the chancellor of the exchequer,) to consider how much he endangered the public creditor by pressing on taxation. He agreed with Bacon, that the beginning of sedition was generally distress. If the measures recently recommended by government (on which he would not then say any thing) were to fail in their effect, and the present oppressive taxation were to proceed, who would be the first to call out? The manufacturer himself. He would find that he could not sleep safely on his pillow, and he would naturally say, "I'll take my capital abroad; there I shall be quiet, and I shall be protected in my industrious pursuits." He did not, in this, draw an exaggerated picture. Such had been the case with Holland. Holland, like this country, after the revolution, possessed an immense capital. The government, however, went on taxing not alone capital, but every production of industry. What was the consequence? The people became beggars, and at length the prosperity of that great commercial state was destroyed. The same effects were gradually lowering upon this country. There was evidently a very alarming distrust of the public securities of the country, and that not among the middle or lower classes merely; for it was a well known fact, that some noble lords, intimate friends and allies of his majesty's ministers, had recently sold large sums out of our funds, for the purpose of investing them in French securities. That was a transaction which could not pass unnoticed; and he thought it his duty to mention it in the House; and to add, that whatever might be the alarm in the country, it ought not to be manifested in the first instance by those, whose duty it was to support public credit. In his opinion, it had become the imperative duty of parliament to institute an inquiry into the existing distresses of the country; with a view to afford whatever relief the suffering classes of the community might be susceptible of.

Mr. Peel said, he rose to disclaim the sentiment imputed to him by the hon. members for Taunton and Coventry, that parliament had now to make their option between the continuance of British manufacture and the continuance of the British constitution. He had never said any such thing. What he had said was, that while persons were to be found who wished to take advantage of the distresses of trade, for personal objects, he viewed with alarm the state of the manufacturing districts of the country, thus influenced by designing men. He had said that he saw a clear distinction between agriculture and manufactures; that there was a constant demand for food, but not for manufactures; and he had referred to various causes depressive of the working manufacturers, especially the perfection of machinery; but he had never said that which was imputed to him; and indeed it would have been a sentiment coming with a very bad grace from one who was so much indebted to manufactures. As to the motion before the House, he had never experienced greater difficulty than he felt with respect to it when he came down to the House; but that difficulty had been removed by the speech of the hon. mover, who had not, as he expected he would do, confined himself to those topics which his humanity would naturally have suggested to him, and abstained from the introduction of all political questions. At the same time he was bound to say, that had the hon. mover not so acted (he Mr. Peel) should have found great difficulty in entering on the inquiry; as his feelings would have conflicted with his sober judgment on the subject.—What had since occurred in the debate would have confirmed him in the inexpediency of instituting the proposed inquiry; from the conviction of the impossibility of devising any measure calculated to relieve those who were suffering distress. The hon. gentleman who had just sat down, had adverted to two subjects—the tax on wool and the tax on silk—which he recommended to the notice of the proposed committee. To those many others of a similar nature would in the event of its appointment be no doubt added. Now when it was recollected how long the investigation of a single subject—the poor laws, for instance—took a committee, who could suppose that, considering the multifarious topics into which it would be necessary that the proposed committee should enter, such a committee could come to any practical and beneficial decision?—It was not his intention to have trespassed upon the House at such length; but he could not help offering an additional observation or two in answer to what had fallen from some gentlemen on the other side of the House. It was said that some means of relief ought to be afforded to the poor. He admitted this fully, provided any real relief could be afforded; but in several instances attempts at relief only increased the distress. It was proposed that a minimum of wages ought to be fixed. It was impossible to do this with effect, unless an average of human strength could also be regulated. But if a minimum of wages were fixed, how could the manufacturer be compelled to give it, or how could he be compelled to give even the smallest pittance? Legislation of this kind was always dangerous, never beneficial. As to the employment of the poor upon public works, particularly in Ireland, his mind was made up on the impolicy of any such attempt. In the first place, where must the public works be undertaken? In the manufacturing districts, in those parts of the country where the public works already completed had been calculated for a period of greater prosperity than the present. No new work could be carried on without additional taxation; and considering the great want of economy in public works, he would ask if there could be any thing gained by taking money out of the pockets of the people for such a purpose; and by which the poor would be ultimately rendered poorer? He was sorry also to discountenance the hope a few appeared to entertain, that something might be done in the way of a parliamentary grant. It was in his view impossible, and there was in truth no analogy between the cases of foreign sufferers and those of our own nation. Undoubtedly, did we possess the means, our own distressed population had the fairest claim, but from whence were the means to be supplied? Foreign aid was given for some extraordinary and temporary visituation: the situation of our manufacturing districts was not like that of some West Indian islands that had been visited by a hurricane, or like Portugal when devastated by the progress of war. Here we must not only consider the severity of existing distresses, but the causes of them. He was convinced that they were entirely beyond the control of parliament; they were permanent from their nature, and supposing relief could be given by grant to one district, it would be setting a dangerous precedent for the rest of the kingdom, which at a future time might make a similar claim. Besides, it would rather tend to counteract the natural checks of increasing population, which, though affording a tardy remedy, was the only one he could discover of affording effectual and lasting relief.

Mr. J. P. Grant expressed his pleasure that the right hon. gentleman, who had just sat down had had an opportunity of correcting an error into which he (Mr. Grant) had fallen, in common with many others. The sentiment which his hon. friend had supposed the right hon. gentleman to have uttered was certainly most dangerous to the constitution. In reference to the speech of the learned lord advocate he observed, that lamentable distress prevailed in all the manufacturing districts of England and Scotland; that distress had given rise to disaffection, and that both well deserved minute investigation. He maintained, that although a meeting had been held at Dundee it had been very thinly attended, and that discontent had yet reached but a small part of the population. He expressed his surprise that ministers had not themselves brought forward the subject much earlier: it was admitted by them that the people were suffering under a degree of distress that language could scarcely describe, and yet they had been able to assign no rational ground for refusing to investigate. It was asked what plan was to be proposed for adoption if a committee were appointed? But surely it was not necessary to state any specific project. The business of the committee was, to discover a remedy. If a remedy could be found without a committee, it would only occasion needless delay to go through the inquiry. If, however, in the result, no remedy could be pointed out, the country would at least rest satisfied that the utmost had been done, and that in this instance at least parliament was not to blame. A part of the prevailing distress undoubtedly arose from a transition from war to peace, but on all former occasions our wars had been shorter, and our difficulties more evanescent. After a war of twenty-five years' duration, throughout which there had been an extraordinary expenditure of at least 25 millions a year—and after the whole of Europe had been engaged for the same length of time in a similar extraordinary expenditure, it was not remarkable that the increase of population which had been engendered by the increased call which this expenditure had produced during that period on our manufactures, should, on the return of peace, be thrown into a state of distress; but if it was necessary that so many hundred thousands should be suffering starvation in consequence of the line of policy which had been pursued by the government (the propriety of which, however, he had no intention of calling in question), and in which the country had embarked, he thought it now became the duty of that government and the country to direct their attention as to how far it might be possible to contribute relief. The population had been so augmented that it was now found to be too great for the quantity of labour to be performed. All this demanded calm investigation. Some amelioration of things might perhaps, be the result. A scheme might be discovered for levying a tax upon the rich who could afford to pay it for the aid of the poor who had not the means of living. He agreed with his hon. friend in thinking that even 5*l.* a man would be something; and he could not help expressing his extreme surprise that the gentlemen on the opposite side of the question with his hon. friend who had made the present motion, should concur in disapproving of the manner in which that motion was made, and yet not offer any correction of it. Thousands of people were actually in want of food, and perhaps that by employing them on public works, relief might be granted them by a much less sum than could effect so desirable a purpose in any other way. After so long a discussion on this subject, the House was too much fatigued, and were not now disposed to enter into the question. He would therefore say no more upon it. No man was more fully impressed than himself with the extent of the existing danger, and the necessity of adopting some means likely to remove it; and he was convinced that if the inquiry was gone into the good sense of the government and the wisdom of parliament would suggest some eligible means to mitigate the existing evil.

Mr. John Smith alluded to the rapid inroad which machinery had made upon manual labour within only a few years. He did not mean to contend that this was not a great improvement upon the old system, but it was an undoubted fact that it had thrown a great many hands out of employment. He had attended to this point for some years, and he did not think that the attention of a committee could be directed to a more important object. He had listened to the speech of the right hon. member for Oxford with the utmost pain; the conclusion to be drawn from which was, that the wretched sufferers could hope for no relief. He had hoped that some species of compromise would have been effected, in order that so important a subject might have been fairly entered upon; and it gave him great surprise, and not less concern, that ministers refused to inquire at all. He was anxious for some inquiry into the existing evil; because, sooner or later he was convinced it would press itself on the attention of parliament. So many wretched persons in want of food, could not rest contented in a state so deplorable. Some remedy ought, at least, to be sought, if it could not be found; and he would cheerfully vote even for a property tax, if it were so regulated as to fall only on those who could afford to pay for the relief of the poor.

Mr. William Smith observed, that when it was admitted on all hands that distress was the great cause of the prevailing discontents, it was, to say the least of it, ungracious not to inquire into the causes of that distress. On the other hand, he could not but deprecate with his utmost force, holding out to the poor that dismal delusion, that the destruction of machinery would alleviate their sufferings. If the manufacturers were to be relieved by an increase of foreign demand and home consumption, it was the most absolute folly to assert that that object could be accomplished by making manufactures dearer, which would be the inevitable and obvious effect of putting a stop to the use of machinery. It might, indeed, be advantageous for a very transient period, and to a few persons in insulated situations, but it must totally destroy by the roots the whole exportation trade of the kingdom. Regarding the project for fixing a minimum for labour, he was of the same opinion, until an average of human force could be ascertained.

Mr. J. Smith, in explanation, utterly disclaimed any intention of depreciating machinery.

Mr. W. Smith expressed his perfect confidence in the declaration of his hon. friend.

Mr. Mansfield said, after the debate he had heard that evening, he was really at a loss to know on which side to give his vote. It would be a most gratifying thing to his mind if a committee were appointed to consider of the causes of the present distressed state of the country, unaccompanied, however, with any political feeling. He regretted, however, that the hon. gentleman who had opened the debate should have allowed himself to be led away by party feeling. It was impossible for him to support an inquiry which included so many questions of politics as might be embraced by the motion. Were the political part of the proposal separated from that which was purely commercial, a committee to inquire into the latter should receive his hearty concurrence.

Lord Archibald Hamilton admitted the statement of the lord advocate, that a part of Scotland was in a disturbed state, but he denied that disturbance existed to the degree which he pointed out. He was convinced that at least two-thirds of Lanarkshire were sound and loyal. The cause of the discontent was distress, and while that cause continued, the effect must also continue. The people were obliged to work fourteen hours a day, and could obtain only meal and milk for their support. Distress was much more prevalent than disaffection, and he could contemplate no reasonable ground for refusing the motion for inquiry. Ministers ought to apply their minds to prevent as well as to punish, but hitherto the latter only had received their attention. If they had any plan by which they could relieve the distresses of the poor, they ought to bring it forward; if they had not, he could not see why they refused to accede to the motion before the House.

Mr. Davenport trusted that the motion of to-night would be brought forward at some future period in a less general and obnoxious shape. If it had excluded politics, he would have given it his support.

Mr. Tierney promised to trouble the House very shortly. In truth, little or nothing had been offered on the other side which called for an answer. True it was that the noble lord had spoken, and had stated his determination not to allow any inquiry into the distresses of the people. Why? Because the motion for the committee was not worded exactly in his own terms. All gentlemen were satisfied that distress existed—that that distress ought to be inquired into—and that it might possibly be relieved: but the noble lord had put his veto upon it. Investigation was not to be permitted. The other hon. members who followed on the same side, seemed satisfied with the noble lord's reason, and offered not a single syllable of argument against the principle of the question. The very able and eloquent speeches of the two gentlemen behind him were so convincing, that he had nothing to offer in addition to them. The debate had been interesting from the practical light thrown upon the subject, and from the speech of the right hon. gentleman opposite, which contained some important, though not very consolatory truths. His (Mr. Tierney's) principal object in rising, however, was to mark his sense of the conduct of his hon. friend who had moved for the committee. Whatever the House might do, he was well persuaded that the country would thank his hon. friend for the line he had pursued, and which, properly followed up, without the obstructions the noble lord wished to throw in the way, might terminate in important benefits to the country. He utterly denied that the inquiry, narrowed as the noble lord had suggested, would be attended with any advantage. If, indeed, nothing but perfect poverty and complete distress prevailed in the manufacturing districts, then it might be very proper to limit the investigation to the mere means of removing those evils. But was that the real state of the manufacturing districts? Was it not part of the noble lord's case, whenever it suited him to make it so, that something besides poverty and distress existed—something dangerous and prejudicial to the public interest? He put it to the House, whether, when the state of those districts required the five or six bills of coercion now before parliament, inquiry ought to be restricted merely to the distress, without embracing any thing to which those bills referred. The truth, however, was, that any thing and every thing might be investigated which did not come home to ministers; but the moment any thing general was hinted at, then cried the noble lord, "Oh, no! this is a party inquiry, and God forbid that we should mix up any party matters with these questions: mere distress you may inquire into, but you must not go one step further to see how the distress has been occasioned; that would be attended with extreme danger." The noble lord was right; it might be attended with extreme danger, not to the country, but to himself and his colleagues. He firmly believed that ministers were in a great degree responsible for the discontent which existed throughout the country. He believed that there had been a gross and culpable neglect of the public interest and safety, in allowing certain occurrences to take place without interfering to prevent them. Let them look, for instance, at the statement made by the lord advocate of Scotland, who had made a clear and explicit speech on this occasion which did him infinite honour. What did the learned lord say? He told them, that a large proportion of Scotland was in a state of disaffection; that disaffection was working underground, and above ground; and, that for six weeks after this state of things was in operation, ministers had no idea of what was going on. Could they call that a government? What were they to think of the vigilance of those who suffered this dreadful volcano to threaten them underground, whilst disaffection stared them in the face above ground, and yet did not think such dangers were worth inquiring into? He would call the attention of the House to the papers laid on their table. In the first paper, which was dated the 1st July, four Manchester magistrates stated to lord Sidmouth their opinion of the dangerous and alarming feeling which existed in that district. They declared to his lordship the danger which they apprehended; they demanded to know what they were to do; and observed, that if no new laws were enacted, they should not, they were afraid, be able to put down the spirit of disaffection. The House had not the answer of the noble lord before them; but they were acquainted with this fact—that parliament was prorogued on the 13th of July, and that very important business was postponed for that purpose. Indeed, parliament was prorogued with unnecessary haste, at the very time that government was apprised of the danger. What was this but saying to the magistrates, "You may do as you like; but you shall get no advice from us, because there is something we would much rather do at the present moment. Our object is to get rid of the House of Commons." Did he, then, say too much when he thus openly declared, that ministers were responsible for what had passed in the country, because they had not taken steps at an earlier and more proper period to prevent it? He begged leave to ask, would it be satisfactory to the country, under these circumstances, to have a mere inquiry into the state of distress in the manufacturing districts? Would it not be proper to examine, and to show to the country, what were the machinations that led to those disturbances—to develop what the reason was that induced the people to assume this formidable attitude in various parts of the kingdom, always bearing in mind, that the disturbances in the manufacturing districts were pointed out as the ground for the introduction of measures affecting the liberties of the whole population of England, Ireland, and Scotland, by far the greater part of which had not committed any act that called for such coercion? Was it then useful to say, that such and such distress appeared to exist in such and such districts, without at the same time stating, why that distress had assumed so alarming a shape and character as it had done during the latter months? Gentlemen opposite declared, that there was no necessity for going into any inquiry with respect to the business at Manchester, because the House had decided that no investigation should take place. He did not know that they had so decided in terms, but he was certainly ready to admit that, practically, they had done so; that they had shown an evident unwillingness to enter into that question. But then it would be well to inquire, whether the conduct of the magistrates at Manchester had not created and increased the spirit of hostility which was observable there. That would be a proper subject for investigation, and he had no doubt whatever of what the result would be. He believed it would be found, that the conduct of those persons had done much to inflame the minds of the lower orders. Gentlemen opposite had said a great deal about itinerant orators, and of the mischiefs which they had occasioned; but how stood the fact? Those persons had gone through the country, and talked and prosed about annual parliaments and universal suffrage, till the people became tired and weary of them, and sent them home again. But government gave them new life, for it gave them a new subject to speak upon—a subject that came home to men's bosoms—a subject in which all were interested. This question, it was said, had nothing to do with parliamentary reform; perhaps it had not; but would it not be well to inquire whether the people had not imbibed a strong dislike,—a powerful aversion to the House of Commons; and whether something might not be done to remove this unfavourable impression from their minds? Did gentlemen opposite mean to say, that stopping inquiry, that refusing all investigation, was the best mode of putting an end to the distrust and aversion which prevailed in the popular mind? The hon. member for Yorkshire had said, that the more the subject was considered, the greater would be found the necessity for abstaining from any proceeding with respect to it. He (Mr. Tierney), for his own part, had no doubt that the more such motions were refused—motions having investigation for their object—the more loudly and frequently would inquiry be called for. He would confidently ask, whether the debate of that night would not plainly convince every man, that things, as they now stood, were practically wrong? Let the House consider the statement of the right hon. member for Oxford (a statement he feared much too true), of the situation in which the manufacturing interests of this country were placed. The right hon. gentleman was supposed on a former night to have said that the existence of our manufacturing interests was incompatible with a free constitution: but he had since declared that he had used no such expression. Such, however, was certainly his line of argument. The right hon. gentleman was on that occasion defending the propriety of making the bill then before the House, not local and temporary, but general and permanent. His argument was this: "I believe," said he, "that for the next 6 or 7 seven years, such will be the depressed state of the manufactures of this country, that we cannot look to an earlier period for taking those laws away." But he stated also, "If you have an immense manufacturing interest, and that manufacturing interest is liable to great fluctuations, it will be necessary to enact measures which will be at all times sufficient to meet the dangers that may be apprehended from those fluctuations." The inference then was, that they were not to build on any precise period for doing away those measures; they were not to contemplate their duration for a year or two, but ought to make them permanent, in order to meet any fluctuation which might chance to arise! The right hon. gentleman denied that he had said, that the manufacturing interest and the constitution could not exist together. But his argument went to this extent—that while distress, arising from the state of manufactures, pervaded the country, the constitution was in danger: but that when the distress ceased the danger was at an end, and to meet that distress, whenever in consequence of any fluctuation it occurred, he argued that the bill should be permanent. How did the country stand at the present moment? It was affirmed and without fear of contradiction, that for the first time, money was sold out of our funds for the purpose of investing them in those of France. He knew that some years ago persons provided for their families by purchasing annuities in the French funds. That, however, was done to a very trifling extent, as would be seen by a reference to the list of claimants. But it was never before known that large sums were sold out of the English funds in order to strengthen those of France. This however, was not the worst part of the business. What surprised and alarmed him more was, that small sums were transferred in the same manner. If he were wrong some gentleman would contradict him, when he stated that sums of 200*l.* and 300*l.* were of late frequently taken from the hands of country bankers and transferred by the friends of the owners to the French funds. This was a circumstance of a most alarming nature, because it showed that the mischief was extremely prevalent. A large sum might be so employed as a matter of speculation; but when they saw the small streams of capital running in the same course, and working their way to the same reservoir, the danger to the country was manifest and alarming. It was stated by every gentleman who had considered the subject, that the people were over taxed; but not a word in answer fell from the chancellor of the exchequer. Some gentlemen asserted that the evils were caused by a transition from war to peace. The transition it, should be recollected, had occurred some years ago; we had had five years of peace, but the evils had not abated. In the year 1815-1816 it was stated that the transition from war to peace had occasioned the then existing difficulties, and no person could deny the fact, because it evidently must have, more or less, affected the labouring classes of the community. But they came to the end of the transition, and they were told in the speech from the throne at the opening of the last session, that so far from having any thing to complain of on account of the transition, the manufactures, the trade, the agriculture, the commerce of the country were in a most flourishing state. Then, surely, the transition was at an end! Oh no, the transition came back, only with this difference, that it had an alias added to it; and then, instead of a transition, it became a fluctuation. Thus, then, was their pitiable situation held out to the world—that they were taxed to such an extent, that the people could not bear it; that trade was so bad, that individuals could not procure a livelihood for themselves, which they had been accustomed to do; that no remedy could be found for these evils; that ministers proposed none, and thought of none; and finally, that the whole mass of the population were Atheists. Let gentlemen read the whole of this denunciation from top to bottom, and say whether there was ever a state of things more dreadful, or that more loudly called for a full and dispassionate inquiry. The hon. gentleman near him said, that this was a visitation from god, and nothing else. Did that hon. gentleman indeed, believe, and could he gravely state it to the House, that the mischief which had been going on for 25 years was to be attributed to God alone, and not to the restless dispositions of men? He (Mr. Tierney) stated on the first day of the session, and he would repeat it now, that no people were more sincerely disposed to the practice of piety and true religion than the people of this country. Now they were told that a taint appeared amongst them—that the people were demoralized—that money left the country—that trade sunk, and that stocks fell; and no man would say what was the reason of this state of things, because he was afraid to point out the true reason. A visitation from God! God had nothing to do with it. It was the work of the perverted mind of man. It was the defect of twenty-five years misgovernment, which was surely, though silently working on to the ruin of the country. Government had undeviatingly pursued that system which tended more and more to the disadvantage of the empire, and of which the House of Commons daily heard still more and more. And then gentlemen affected to wonder that persons groaning under these unfortunate circumstances, declared that something was wrong in the House of Commons which they conceived ought to be redressed. The debate of this night showed the necessity more than any thing that had occurred for a long time of speedily doing something to check the evil. The conduct of ministers on this occasion would be severely scrutinized. How had they acted? Because an inquiry was moved for on his (the opposition) side of the House, which was accompanied by a speech not palatable to gentlemen opposite, therefore the inquiry was refused. "You shall not have the inquiry," said the noble lord, "because I did not expect that it would be introduced by such a speech." And the gentlemen opposite were all so satisfied with that statement, that not a single word was said by them which bore on the question, except what had been offered by the lord advocate of Scotland. If no inquiry was conceded when parliament was called together under the pressure of circumstances such as every man must deeply feel, for what purpose had they been assembled? The result of their meeting was, that they passed severe laws against the people, that they agreed to coercive measures to keep them down, and when an endeavour was made to learn why the people were in such a situation, they had a short speech from a secretary of state, and were sent about their business, with the consoling reflection that they had destroyed some of the best liberties of the country. In this state of things, if it were the temper of government to refuse entering into an inquiry there was no use to have any argument about it. There was no case that more imperatively called for inquiry than the present state of the country. He should be glad to hear the opinion of the right hon. the president of the board of control on the subject. Perhaps he (although the noble lord did not) would state what remedy he had to propose, and not let gentlemen depart with the idea, that the country was on the very brink of ruin, but that no man could point out a way by which that ruin could be avoided.

Mr. Canning said, although he hoped he was not often guilty of shrinking from a call when openly made upon him, yet he could assure the right hon. gentleman and the House, that he never rose with more reluctance than he did on the present occasion—first, on account of the late period of the night, which made him unwilling to protract the discussion; and, secondly, from a cause personal to himself—severe indisposition, which would have induced him to give a silent vote, rather than enter into any argument on the question. The right hon. gentleman had said, that his (Mr. Canning's) noble friend alleged no reason for not acceding to the motion, except that the hon. mover's speech was not shaped according to his fancy; and that, in the feeling thus expressed, the gentlemen on his (the ministerial) side of the House meant to acquiesce. He could not but think, that if the right hon. gentleman had at all watched the course of the debate, he must have seen, that the feeling which actuated his noble friend, in opposing the motion, was not a feeling of a personal nature; and if his noble friend had expressed the concurrent sense of those who sat near him, he also procured the assent of many gentlemen who came down to the House by no means prepared for such an opposition. Fortunately, the course which his noble friend had meant to pursue, and which many gentlemen would have concurred in, was not a matter of after-thought, or of doubt. He spoke in the presence of many individuals who knew, that so late as four o'clock this day, it was his (Mr. Canning's) intention, however rarely such a circumstance occurred, to have voted with the hon. gentleman who brought forward this proposition. But he was at that time persuaded, that the motion would have been introduced in the same spirit in which the notice had been originally given. He understood that certain private communications which were ordinarily made between gentlemen in that House, had taken place beforehand with the hon. gentleman, and that the motion was to be for a bona fide inquiry into commercial distresses arising from commercial causes, with a view to the discovery of any possible remedy that could be devised for ameliorating the present state of the country. The inquiry, he understood, was to be divested as much as possible of all connexion with those angry topics which had agitated that House for many nights, and on all of which, singularly and collectively, the House had already come to a decision.

But would any body who had heard the opening speech, or any part of that speech, lay his hand on his heart and say, that the motion was brought forward with that abstinence from political hostility, which gave it a chance of a friendly reception, or if carried, of a useful application to the questions which it embraced? It was rather a speech in which all the topics of inflammation had been connected together. It introduced every thing that was calculated to rekindle those animosities which might have subsided. They were, indeed, introduced collaterally, but unfairly—unfairly with respect to the topics themselves, and no less unfairly with reference to the inquiry that was to take place. They were topics, too, he must observe, on which the sense of the House was clearly taken, and on which its decision was intelligibly given. He did not mean to censure the hon. gentleman for the course he had adopted; he had undoubtedly a right to introduce public topics in the way which appeared to him to be most expedient; and he did not doubt that the hon. gentleman thought it was his duty to bring forward the motion as he had done that night. The hon. gentleman, of course, conceived it to be a part of his duty to throw as much obloquy as possible on his majesty's government, an object in which he was well seconded by the right hon. gentleman who had just spoken. If the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman was meant to follow up the idea of the hon. mover, it showed that he had taken a correct view of the object of the motion. If the right hon. gentleman did not mean to follow the course of the hon. mover, if he meant to adopt a different mode of proceeding, it then threw on the right hon. gentleman the onus of showing that he had not defeated a motion, which, if brought forward with common temperance, would have ensured the concurrence of the House. When he came down to the House, he expected that the motion would be brought forward in the spirit to which he had alluded; and if so brought forward, it certainly would have received his concurrence. He did not mean to say, that in making up his mind on the subject, he had not only placed considerable restraint on his feelings, but also on his better judgment. Because, undoubtedly, in entering into a field of inquiry so wide as this must be, if confined to its express objects, without a precise knowledge of what that inquiry would be specifically directed to, they ran the risk of exciting expectations that might be grievously disappointed. If they entered into it with an idea of adopting any remedy that might casually be turned up, blame would attach to them for not having paused until they saw their way clearly before them. The hon. mover told them, in words short and emphatic, which showed the view that he took of the subject, that he would have no committee on cotton-twist, but one in which political topics should be investigated. He had used the words cotton-twist, because he wished to degrade the idea of a commercial inquiry: and his political view embraced the whole state of the county of Lancaster, involved all the Tory principles of the resident magistrates and gentlemen of that county, and all the conflicts of Orange and other societies within its limits. The hon. mover had done him the honour to appeal to him, on account of his connexion with Liverpool, as to certain circumstances which had taken place there. With respect to Orange lodges, and the system connected with them, the hon. mover might know that all that ever passed between him and such of his constituents as belonged to those societies was, that he had asked them for their favour. He had before and after his last visit to that town (and nothing had since occurred to alter his opinions), declared sentiments directly opposite to the great majority of those persons. He was not the person who, intending to go into an inquiry respecting the manufacturing classes, could consider it any necessary part of such inquiry to take up the feuds and quarrels of Lancaster, and set the people one against the other. That, however, was the spirit with which the hon. mover would go to the inquiry, so far as related to the general state of the county of Lancaster. The hon. mover would also introduce the events of the 16th of August. The interminable subject of the Oldham inquest; in short, all those questions, which any man who wished to enter into the main subject itself—who was desirous to strip it of all accidental circumstances, would have carefully avoided. But, as if the hon. mover's speech was not sufficient, at the end of the debate came forward his venerable mentor, who, instead of bringing him back to sobriety and temperance, instead of cooling his mind, and tranquillizing his passions, had encouraged his warmth. He came indeed like Mentor, but it was like Mentor when he stole behind Telemachus, and pushed him into the sea. So did the Mentor of to-night get behind the hon. mover, and force him into the ocean of party politics. The hon. mover wished to inquire into the state of Lancashire, its ancient feuds and present animosities, but that would not satisfy the right hon. gentleman. He wanted a grand coup d'œil. He wanted to investigate the conduct of ministers for 25 years past, in a committee ostensibly formed to inquire into the commercial distresses of the country. This calm, temperate, moderate inquiry into the distresses of the time, was, it appeared, to be indissolubly united with the committee on the state of the nation, (for such it would be)—the good old parliamentary course for turning out one set of ministers, and placing another in their stead. Good would it have been for ministers, good would it have been for the right hon. gentleman and those around him, good for the country at large, if to-day had been a confederal day, and, if, with grounded arms, ceasing from hostility, both sides had agreed to consult the benefit of all; ministers did come down to the House in that disposition, and he was as much vexed as he was disappointed and surprised at the change which appeared to have taken place in the sentiments of the hon. mover since Friday last. The speeches delivered by an hon. gentleman opposite and his right hon. friend, while they did them infinite credit, and showed that their highly gifted minds were improved by practical knowledge—these two speeches were the specimens to which he would refer, as what he thought ought to have been the tone and temper of that debate. If the hon. mover had opened the business in that temperate mode, he would not have opposed the motion—nay, he would venture farther: even after the provoking speech of the hon. mover, if his right hon. friend had adopted the course of those two gentlemen, and thrown the irritating topics of the hon. gentleman a little more into the shade, instead of addressing the House as he had done, they might then have come to terms. But for some reasons inscrutable to him, the right hon. gentleman had thought it better to change that night, which was to have been a neutral night, to one of the most decided political hostility. One consequence was, that they had lost their object. Even on this subject—the subject of sacred misery, which should be hedged round from every feeling of political irritation—even with respect to that question it seemed the country was not to look for fair inquiry and cordial co-operation. He thought the gentlemen opposite had lost themselves a second time. One opportunity occurred at the opening of the session when they might have rendered an essential service to the country. They might have done that, without abating any part of the hostility which they felt towards ministers, which might be brought forward at other times and on other occasions. They had another opportunity to-night—an opportunity of their own choosing. They selected a subject, in bringing forward which they ought to have forgotten their political opinions, and carried the House of Commons into a calm inquiry into circumstances with which the interests of the country were so nearly concerned. But he was sure there was no man, the most unconnected with, and most insensible to, party feeling, who would say that it was possible for any government, valuing its character one straw, to agree to the motion of the hon. gentleman, introduced with such a speech as he had been pleased to deliver. But suppose they had gone into the committee, out of the two speeches to which he had alluded, there arose matter sufficient for an inquiry, the longest and most sedulous that could be imagined. First, the subject of the minimum of wages. He did not mean to say that the hon. gentleman had given any opinion on it; but he had thrown it out as a question which ought to be set at rest. Next came the whole question of our currency, which had occupied that House for two or three sessions in one way or other, and had particularly taken up much of the time of the last session, perhaps the most laborious that ever sat. There was also the question of the poor laws, which was already under consideration; but admitting the industry of those who were employed in that investigation, the result, he must say, had been extremely unsatisfactory. The next was, the question of machinery, which was easily disposed of in principle, but which, if the committee sat, would be brought forward for such an extensive investigation, as would be satisfactory to those persons who were most interested in it. Next was the question of Scotland, and the absence of poor laws in that country. Then, added to these, there was the whole chapter of taxation, every part of which was to be sifted, in order to remove, if possible, what was stated to be a novelty—the tax on raw materials. Even if party politics had been completely banished, here was a field sufficiently wide to occupy the ablest and wisest heads for a long period. He thought the result of this discussion must be, to show the House that, whoever they might be who brought such extensive subjects before them, they were bound to state some outline, to give some description of the course which they wished the legislature to adopt. Nevertheless, if the committee had been proposed in the tone to which he had alluded, he would have agreed to it. No one could suppose that he and his hon. friends could look at these questions lightly. He was prepared to go into that committee with all its difficulties, if party and political feelings had been left out of the question. He felt, on the one hand, that it was not likely to have a satisfactory result; but on the other, though they might not be able to see their way clearly, they were anxious to show that sympathy for the distresses of the country which could only be expressed by such an inquiry. He did think that ministers had a right to complain that the honourable mover had made it impossible for them to accede to his motion. But if a committee were appointed to inquire into the distress of the manufacturing counties, he believed that would be the last and the least point of consideration with the hon. mover, who had introduced all the angry topics, and adverted to all the inflamed passions of the county of Lancaster—who was, besides, to have the assistance of his right hon. friend, who had attempted to trace all the miseries of the country to the conduct of government for the last twenty-five years. Was it likely, with these facts before them—when, in stating their object, the gentlemen opposite could not divest themselves of an ingenuous confession of what they really aimed at if they got into the committee—when one-tenth of their observations were bestowed on topics which at the very commencement showed the feeling they had in their hearts—was it, he would ask, likely that ministers could acquiesce in their demands? He did most earnestly wish that the committee had been moved for, as he understood it would have been; but, being disappointed in his expectation, he was bound to oppose it. He did not mean to do more than to account for the vote which he should give, and to express his sorrow that he was obliged to give it. He had no doubt that the hon. mover had introduced political subjects from a sense of duty; although he did not see any mention of politics in the motion. He regretted that the hon. gentleman had taken such a view of the question as had stripped it of its greatest advantages. He had, however, chosen that particular course, and if the proposition were negatived, he had himself to thank for it. Had this motion excited hopes of any beneficial result in the minds of the people, on the hon. mover and on his friends must rest the disappointment occasioned by its ill success.

Lord Folkestone said, that the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down had observed, that it would have been better for the House and the country, if the motion had not been introduced by his hon. friend in the manner in which he had brought it forward. He, however, anticipated much benefit to the country from this discussion; and he approved entirely of the spirit and manner in which his hon. friend had treated the question. He had thrown a considerable light on the subject, and explained many circumstances that were not known before. The right hon. gentleman had objected, that his hon. friend had taken that opportunity to introduce political matters. Now, in his (lord Folkestone's) view of the question, it was quite impossible to consider the state of the manufacturing districts without adverting to political topics. They had learned in the course of the debate, that the greatest distress existed in the country. That fact, which had been denied over and over again, was now fully admitted, and had indeed rivetted the attention of the House during the whole discussion. The hon. member for Bramber had stated, that the distress of the country had arisen solely from the war; for that it was impossible to suppose, according to their ideas of Divine Providence, that a thing so atrocious as war was, should not be followed by a variety of evils. He begged to remind the hon. gentleman that the late war was, from the beginning to the end, supported by the hon. member himself [Mr. Wilberforce here motioned a dissent]. Two years after the war had commenced, he (lord Folkestone) believed the hon. member had made a proposition for entering into negotiations for peace; but he was sure he was correct, when he stated, that that wicked war (applying the term to all wars) was supported most strenuously by the hon. gentleman himself. The distress which now existed could not have arisen from any war, unless that war had been accompanied by a system of misrule, and as during the last 25 years the country had always been under the government of the same men and the same measures, was there any reasonable ground for hoping that we should obtain any remedy for it from our present rulers? The right hon. gentleman, while he declared that it was entirely owing to the speech of the hon. mover of this debate, that he had not consented to the motion itself, described the object of the motion to be in his opinion, so wide, that no committee could possibly accomplish it; so that, according to the right hon. gentleman himself, it was not upon its merits that this motion was to be negatived. Shortly afterwards the right hon. gentleman found another reason for not entertaining it; it cast considerable obloquy on his majesty's ministers. The noble lord was, however, more frank in his declaration than was the right hon. gentleman. He had confessed that he would not allow the motion to pass, whether obloquy was or was not cast upon the ministry. As the noble lord's declaration preceded the declaration of the right hon. gentleman, he (lord Folkestone) might be permitted to suppose, that the right hon. gentleman's objection to this proposition arose from mere dislike to it, and not from the cause which he pretended—the obloquy cast by it on the advisers of the Crown. For his own part, he was free to confess that he did not conceive the proper place for taking this subject into consideration, to be either a committee of the whole House, or in a committee up stairs: it was a subject that ought long since to have attracted the attention of the government of the country, as was proved by one circumstance which he would mention, as well as by many others. The municipality of Manchester ought long since to have been changed. It was an immense town formed within a few years from a paltry village, and yet its municipality was the same now, when it possessed

96,000 inhabitants, as it had been when it possessed no more than a few hundreds—namely, a boroughreeve, and two constables, elected at a court leet by the tenants of the lord of the manor. Ought not the government then, who knew the unquiet state in which that town had so long been placed, and who also knew that part of its inquietude arose from the constitution of its present municipality, to have formed another, better adapted to its existing circumstances? Another right hon. gentleman (the member for Oxford) had begun his speech of that evening by complaining that a misrepresentation had gone abroad of what he had said on a former evening. If it was a misrepresentation, it must have arisen from misapprehension, for he (lord Folkestone) had certainly understood the right hon. gentleman in the same manner as those who had misrepresented him. The right hon. member had allowed to-night, that the new measures were an infraction of the rights of the people. He did not know whether the right hon. gentleman was still of opinion that they ought to be permanent; but if he allowed them to be an infraction of the liberties of the people, and at the same time contended for their permanency, the question was between an infraction of the people's rights and the support of the manufactures of the country. When gentlemen went home, and considered all the alarm which at present prevailed in the commercial and manufacturing districts; when they considered the measures which they were to pass, in order to diminish that alarm; he did hope that they would come into a resolution to probe to the bottom the source of all our evils. Whether they went into an inquiry into the business at Manchester, or not, he cared little; but there were some inquiries too important to be neglected, and into those inquiries he trusted that, before long, they would all agree to enter.

Mr. Peel, in explanation, declared that he had always considered the measures now proposed to parliament as a diminution of liberty; but there was only the alternative between those measures and anarchy and confusion.

Mr. Bennett could not help thinking that the right hon. gentleman had acted unfairly in charging him with introducing the motion before the House in the shape of a party question. He had set out with declaring it as his intention not to make it a party question; and he had cautiously abstained from dwelling upon subjects that might occasion a difference, where unanimity was so essential. He had not wished to say any thing harsh of ministers, but in looking at the distress, it was impossible to separate it altogether from the discontent of the manufacturing parts of the country. It was in fact the very foundation of the discontent; if he had altogether refrained from touching upon that subject, he should have imitated the conduct of certain physicians, who, on being called in to consult on the case of a patient, talked of any thing but that case; but he was quite sure that in the course of his speech he did not use one inflammatory expression, or if he did, it was not his intention to apply it to his majesty's ministers. His object was, as he had already stated, conciliation; and the best means of attaining that object was a spirit of peace influencing their discussions. Although he had the infirmity of expressing strongly what he felt strongly, he had been perfectly calm and tranquil during the whole of the discussion; his purpose having been one which required that spirit. He thought that the House would do its duty by following that course which would elucidate the cause whence the evil sprung, and thereby restore the shaken confidence between the House and the public. He wished to see that House the living image of the people, but he was persuaded that when the intelligence of that night's debate went forth, and it should be known that the House of Commons had refused inquiry because in the progress of that inquiry it might happen that party politics would be introduced, it would produce great and almost incalculable mischief.

The question was then put and negatived without a division.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—COMPLAINT OF A PAMPHLET INTITLED "A TRIFLING MISTAKE, &c." Mr. Courtenay said, he wished to put a question to the hon member for Yorkshire. It was, whether he intended to take any parliamentary notice of the paragraphs in a pamphlet which he had read in the course of the debate, reflecting so strongly on the character of the House.

Mr. S. Wortley replied, that he had merely referred to them in the course of argument, and did not intend to found any proceeding upon them.

Mr. Courtenay said, that he felt it his duty, as a member of parliament, to take notice of the publication, as the hon. member for Yorkshire declined doing so. He should therefore move that it be declared a breach of privilege.

Mr. Brougham said, that upon a notice so suddenly given, he could not but implore his hon. and learned friend to check his present indignation, and to consult his pillow before he pressed his motion on the House. If it was persisted in, it would compel the House to go into a question of privilege, and then they must notice all the other publications which contained similar misrepresentations of their motives and conduct. The hon. member for Yorkshire had allowed that he had merely read the paragraphs in the way of argument. Were they never, then, to read publications like these to the House, without being under the necessity of dragging the authors to their bar? If they entered into every question of privilege, they would be brought into a distressing situation; they would either be induced to do too much, or would be compelled to do nothing at all. There certainly were occasions on which their privileges ought to be asserted; but the seldomer this was done, the better would it be for themselves and the country.

Mr. Courtenay said, that as the publication had been brought before parliament, he felt himself bound to call upon the House to assert its privileges by summoning the author of it to their bar. He therefore gave notice, that to-morrow evening he should move a resolution to that effect.

Mr. Brougham entreated his hon. and learned friend to reflect well before he determined on such a proceeding. The House had a number of privileges which had been violated at many recent meetings, and some of those violations were infinitely worse than those of which complaint was now made. If they went into this breach of privilege, they must also go into the others; and then he conceived that they must issue warrants, not only against those who moved the resolutions which contained such breach of privileges, but against every man at the meeting who consented to them; for they would not surely contend that those who adopted the resolutions were not as guilty as those who proposed them.

The notice of motion was then entered. After which the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MISDEMEANORS BILL.] The Earl of Shaftesbury reported the bill, intitled "An act to prevent delay in the administration of justice in cases of misdemeanor."

The Lord Chancellor proposed several verbal amendments, which were made on the report being brought up. One related to the granting of copies of indictments to defendants. In certain cases defendants were already allowed copies before appearance; he therefore proposed to insert the word, "after," in order that they might be granted after appearance.

Lord Holland did not rise to oppose any of the alterations suggested. He was glad to find that the noble and learned lord was so readily disposed to amend the bill. He now rose to move an amendment to the effect, that in cases of information ex-officio, filed by the attorney-general, if the defendants were not brought to trial within eighteen months, such information should cease to be of any effect, unless there should be an order issued by the court for further delay. He moved this as a clause in the present bill, because he thought it of importance that in a bill, the object of which was to hasten trials for misdemeanor, by taking away the privilege enjoyed by defendants of traversing a disposition should also be shown to prevent delays through the conduct of the prosecutor, particularly in the case of ex-officio informations, which might be kept interminably hanging over the heads of individuals to the destruction of their peace of mind, and perhaps of their property, without any means, at present existing, of compelling the attorney-general to proceed with them.

The Lord Chancellor admitted the importance of the considerations urged by the noble lord. It was, he believed, true, that there were no means of forcing the attorney-general on to trial. In other cases, the defendants might carry down the record by proviso, but where the attorney-general was prosecutor, the defendant could not carry down the record without a warrant from that officer. He admitted it was of importance to consider whether any means could be adopted of shielding a defendant, under such circumstances, from the effects of unnecessary delay; but he thought that to do it effectually, and with a due regard to all the considerations involved, required more machinery (if he might use the expression) than the clause of the noble lord afforded. In crown cases, where there was what was called a private prosecutor, the defendant, though entitled to carry down the record if the prosecutor did not proceed, yet he must tender himself for trial and abide by the consequences. The noble lord's clause contained nothing on this point, but merely went to enact that the information should cease to be of any effect. In one case in the court of King's Bench, where a motion was made to force the attorney-general on to trial, it was suggested by one of the judges, that the object might be attained by moving for a trial at bar, which, if the court granted, they would fix the day for the trial. He did not, however, mean to say that the subjects of this country ought to be in that state in which, in cases of prosecution by the attorney-general, they, could only force that officer on to trial by moving for a trial at bar. If the noble lord would withdraw his motion, he would endeavour by the third reading to frame some clause that might meet the object in view, or else he would state what he conscientiously felt upon the subject. It was frequently not the fault of attorneys-general that the parties they prosecuted were not brought to trial.

Lord Holland was glad to hear what had fallen from the noble and learned lord. The subject, however, was not new to the House. Five or six years ago he had called the attention of their lordships to it; and two years ago, it had again been brought under the consideration of parliament. His mind was made up on the subject; but if the noble and learned lord would himself introduce a bill to remedy the evil, in case it should not be convenient for him to consider the matter fully before the third reading, he would not press the clause. As the noble and learned lord was of opinion, that to make some alteration in the present practice was a subject worthy the attention of the legislature, he hoped that either by a clause on the third reading, or by the introduction of a new bill, the necessary amendment would be made. Perhaps, by the time the bill was read a third time, the noble and learned lord would be able to come prepared for the consideration of the subject.

to as having been already before the House, differed from the present proposition. He understood that it was intended to move the third reading of the bill to-morrow. Whether a matter of such importance as that suggested by the noble lord could or could not be by that time arranged in his mind, in a state fit to be introduced as a clause, he could not tell; but if no provision should be made on the subject in the present bill, he should certainly think it his duty to give all the assistance in his power to any measure which might be brought forward on this subject if he thought it proper, or conscientiously to oppose it if he thought it wrong; for until he fully considered the proposition which might be made, he would not pledge himself.

The Marquis of Lansdowne expressed a hope that the noble lords opposite would agree to postpone the third reading of the bill till Monday. Their lordships would not, he trusted, allow the inconvenience arising from a short delay to stand in the way of justice. It was of great importance, when, upon grounds some of which he would admit were strong, it was proposed to deprive the subject of valuable privileges, that their lordships should endeavour to redress any grievance which might be discovered in the administration of the law. The noble and learned lord had on this, as on other occasions, evinced his readiness to consider any proposition of that description. It had, with respect to this bill, erroneously gone forth, that the noble and learned lord had laid down the law in the case of the Seven Bishops as the foundation of the measure; whereas he had done no such thing, but in advert- ing to that case, had observed, that the defendants had a right to imparle, and were hardly dealt with when that right was refused. If it appeared that the subject suffered injury by the delay of prosecutions at the suit of the Crown, that injury could only be removed by obliging the attorney-general to bring on the trial within a limited period. It was but justice to furnish the subject with some facilities in return for the privileges which were taken away; and a provision, which would prevent prosecutions from hanging interminably over the head of defendants, was one to which their lordships' attention should be seriously applied. If, by delaying the third reading of this bill for two or three days, the noble and learned lord should have time to make up his mind on the subject, a considerable advantage would be gained; for the provision would form a very appropriate clause in the present bill, and would be better so introduced than if made the subject of a separate measure.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that if his noble and learned friend could be prepared to propose a clause by Monday or Tuesday, he would have no difficulty in postponing the third reading.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his willingness to give the subject every consideration in his power, but still thought it would be better to make it the subject of a separate bill.

The report was then agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] Their lordships proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on this bill.

Lord Holland objected to the bill generally, but thought it right to propose some amendments, with the view of confining its operation to that offence, the prevention of which those who supported the measure professed to have in view. The alterations which he had in view, would apply chiefly to the fixing what was to be understood by seditious libel. As to blasphemous libel, its nature was well understood; and with regard to it, nothing, he thought, had occurred to justify any alteration in the law. The number of publications of that description had been greatly exaggerated; but if they had been as numerous as they were described to be, exceeding every thing known in former times, their lordships ought to recollect, that, in like manner, there had been an increase of publications of every description. It was not, then, the number of blasphemous libels which their lordships ought to take into consideration, but their proportion to other publications. At the same time, whatever the number was, it had not been shown to their lordships, that the existing law had been enforced against them. As the definition of blasphemy was well known, he should not offer any amendment in reference to it. With regard to sedition, it had been declared by the supporters of the bill, that it was their wish to confine it merely to seditious libels. Now, what a seditious libel was, had never been settled. He conceived that those who said they wished to confine the opera-ration of the bill to seditious libels, meant thereby libels exciting to a change in the government of the state. They could therefore have no objection to what he meant to propose. Their lordships must be aware, that very different ideas prevailed in the minds of individuals as to what constituted a seditious libel, and therefore they must see the necessity of removing the uncertainty which existed on the subject. This was the more necessary, when they considered that by a merely accidental connexion with some publications, persons having an interest in them were liable to be punished for the acts of others. It was, indeed, in many cases held, that the master was responsible for the acts of the servant; but whatever objection there might be to this as a general principle, it was not now his intention to bring the law on that subject under consideration. He presumed that it was the wish of those who supported the bill to reach the real offenders, and that they did not intend the punishments it inflicted to apply to any persons except those who wrote libels which had for their object the subversion of the state. The first amendment he should propose would be in the preamble, by introducing into it the words "knowingly, wilfully, and maliciously publishing." In the first clause, which refers to cases in which any verdict or judgment by default shall be had against any person for composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel, and provides for the seizure of the copies, he proposed to introduce the words "knowingly, and maliciously composing, &c., with intent to excite his majesty's subjects to subvert by violence the government as by law established." If any other words could be proposed which would better define the nature of a seditious libel, he would gladly agree to substitute them for those he suggested. But their lordships would consider how necessary it was to have some precise idea on this subject; for, in the vague state of the law there was scarcely any political libel which might not be called seditious. There was another part of the bill to which he wished to apply an amendment. When he observed the introduction of a new punishment for libel, and one which was unknown for that offence in any other part of Europe, he must say, that such a circumstance was calculated to excite no small degree of suspicion. In the conversation which had recently passed, the necessity of considering what effect any alteration of the law in certain cases might have, had been strongly urged. Had their lordships ascertained what effect this punishment of banishment would have upon the property or even the life of defendants? Were their lordships prepared to place subjects of this country under the arbitrary authority of foreign powers, for such offences as that contemplated by the present bill? It was proper they should look well at the policy of a measure which proposed to punish so unequally the same offence; for the severity or leniency of the punishment would depend greatly upon the disposition of the sovereigns to whose dominions the individuals might be banished. In going to Holland, France, or Italy, the fate of the exile might be better than in some other countries; but if the libel should be of a nature to give offence to foreign powers, the author might be denied an asylum. This ought to be a matter of consideration, more especially in the present state of the continent. The person banished might be consigned to the mercy of those who would be disposed to aggravate his sufferings; and when discussions on government and the state of the liberty of the press in other countries were going on, was there not reason to suspect that this measure might have such an effect? He had somewhere read in an old book, though his present recollection did not enable him to refer to it, that much praise was due to the law of England for not having introduced into it the punishment of banishment. The reason assigned, if he recollected right, was, that the English government and laws were peculiarly jealous of foreign influence, and that therefore the punishment of banishment was avoided. In this view he agreed. If men of active spirits were engaged, as was asserted, in designs hostile to the public peace, was it wise or prudent to teach such persons to look to foreign powers for a mitigation of their lot? In this way effects might arise from the introduction of this new punishment, which it would be well for their lordships to consider. If they referred to history, they would find that no free state (he did not allude to the states of antiquity) had adopted the punishment of banishment for political offences. It formed part of the law of Scotland, but only for felonies of the lowest description. This general disinclination to the punishment of banishment was to be attributed to the wish which every country had to prevent foreigners from interfering in their domestic concerns. How far the spirit of vengeance might lead to interference with the concerns of this country, if such a punishment became common, was well worthy of their lordships consideration. But it seemed hard that the onus probandi should always be thrown on those on his side of the House who objected to measures, and not on the ministers who proposed them. How different was the case when any measure was brought forward from the side of the House on which he stood! If an humble individual like himself proposed any thing favourable to the rights of the people, was he not invariably called upon to show the grounds, and the consequences of adopting the measure? Were he or his friends in such cases ever permitted to throw the onus probandi on the noble lords on the other side? A bill had been brought in last session relative to this very punishment of banishment in the law of Scotland. Gentlemen of the law, it appeared, were often condemned to be sent from that country to this. Some Scotch lawyer, however, thought the punishment of banishment not sufficient, and a bill was introduced into the other House to authorize the sending of the banished Scots who might be found in England, out of his majesty's dominions. His noble friend near him (lord Lauderdale), when the bill came before their lordships, moved that it be rejected. That motion was agreed to, and he had a right to infer that it was adopted upon the principle, that the law of banishment being unknown to England, it was not proper to interfere with its execution in regard to Scotland.—He had stated considerations which ought to induce their lordships to hesitate respecting this part of the bill; and until the questions arising out of these considerations were answered, he could not agree to the clause inflicting banishment. Their lordships surely would not consent to render that punishment a permanent part of the code of this country, until they clearly saw what were likely to be the effects of such a change in the law. He would, therefore, move, to strike out the word banishment from the first clause in which it occurred, and if that motion were agreed to, he would make similar alterations in other parts of the bill. Supposing his first amendment agreed to, he would next propose an alteration in the clause respecting the certificate to be given of conviction of a former libel. The clause enacts, that the clerk having the custody of the records of the court where a person has been convicted, shall, on the request of the prosecutor for the king of a new libel, make out a certificate, containing the effect and substance only of the former indictment and conviction, and that this certificate shall be proof of the conviction. He would wish to omit the whole of this clause, and leave the proof to the usual course of law. If any convenience was to be gained by the government by this brief description of proof, then grant the same advantage to others. Either hold by the ancient principles of the law, or if innovation be determined on, let the change be fair and equal to all. The next clause to which he objected was that which limited the period of bringing actions against magistrates or others for what might be done by them under this bill, to three months. There was already an act on the subject of bringing actions against magistrates—he believed the 24th of George 2nd—and he saw no reason for deviating from that general law. He should therefore move to reject that law. These were the amendments he should submit to the consideration of their lordships. He concluded with moving the first amendment.

The Earl of Harrowby rose to express his objection to the amendments of the noble baron. The first amendment attempted to define a seditious libel. The noble baron, however, had at the same time complained, that it could not be accurately defined, and that it was unjust to affix a severe penalty to an undefinable offence. He had maintained, that the offence might be so slight as to require only a slight punishment, and that an heinous punishment ought only to be awarded to a heinous crime. Now, this was precisely the course taken by the law as it now stood: the bill supposed different degrees of guilt, and left it to the discretion of the court to apportion the punishment accordingly, either fine separately, or imprisonment separately, or the two together; or, in case of second conviction, fine and imprisonment, or banishment, or transportation. If, therefore, the words of the clause should stand exactly as they did at present, no injurious consequences, would follow. It was obvious, too, that in cases which the law called seditious, where there was any room for a reasonable doubt, juries were extremely cautious in finding a verdict of guilty; and this caution would of course be increased, when a second conviction was sought; so that the probability was very small, that a man would be convicted on any vague and indefinite grounds. Yet, if it was the opinion of the House that it would be better to make some attempt at a definition of a seditious libel, he would not object, notwithstanding the extreme difficulty of making such definition. Their lordships were not left entirely without a precedent for such an attempt; for in 1796, in a statute passed for the purpose of preserving his majesty's person and government, a description was given of a seditious libeller in the following words:—"Any person who shall maliciously and advisedly, by writing, &c. express or publish words or sentences to excite or stir up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his majesty, or of the government and constitution of this realm, as by law established." Some such words might, if their lordships pleased, be introduced into the bill, and would probably answer the object of the noble baron. As to the other amendment, which went to omit the penalty of banishment on the ground that it was unknown to the law of England, he could show from the same act, that "a person on a second conviction may be adjudged, at the discretion of the court, either to suffer such punishment as is inflicted in cases of high misdemeanor, or be banished the realm, or transported." It was true, that the act in question was not a permanent one: that, however, had nothing to do with the objection, which was, that the punishment was unknown: whereas, this statute showed that it had been the law of the land, and had so continued for three years. But, even if it had not been so, it was still competent for parliament to affix to any offence any punishment which it might think most fitting under the particular case. No man could deny, that if such an atrocious libel as he had described should be published, it ought to be visited with severe punishment; but as the law now stood, the offence might be repeated, so that the life of man could not be sufficient for the punishment which the multiplied guilt might require. And could their lordships figure to themselves any set of men whom it was more fitting to get rid of than those who earned a livelihood by the daily issue of blasphemous and seditious writings? The inequality of which the noble baron complained applied to all descriptions of punishment. Parliament could only look to the nature of the offence, and not to the particular persons committing it. It was true, that to individuals in a certain class of life, transportation might be no terror at all, while to another it might be a source of very great terror indeed. The same inequality belonged to the punishment of imprisonment; so that there was no reason that banishment should be condemned on that ground. It was most necessary that a description of persons such as he had described should not be suffered to prey on the public weal; and it was right that they should be treated like bad humours, which ought always to be removed before they grew sufficiently strong to destroy the constitution.

Lord Ellenborough could not conceive how a man could write a blasphemous or seditious libel ignorantly, or publish one accidentally: but he rose chiefly to state what had occurred to him as a definition of a seditious libel. It was, he would suggest, one calculated to bring his majesty's person, or the government and constitution, or either House of Parliament, into hatred or contempt, or calculated to excite his majesty's subjects to attempt any alteration of any matter in church or state as by law established, otherwise than by lawful means.

The Earl of Liverpool observed across the table, that he had no objection to this amendment, with the addition of the words—"or the person of the Prince Regent."

Lord Erskine, though he felt the utmost abhorrence at the disgusting blasphemies circulated among the lower classes, did not think any additional punishment necessary for their suppression. It was true, that transportation, properly applied, was a useful punishment: impurities, which if suffered to remain, might lead to contagion and death, should be put forth; so should persons dangerously injurious to the country; but was it right to send them forth to a new colony, to poison the hearts and understandings of an infant state? Besides, as far as the offenders themselves were concerned, a greater punishment might be inflicted under the existing law; he might be imprisoned for each fresh offence, and cut off from the comforts of social intercourse, rejected and despised; whereas, if sent abroad, he might find congenial minds to console him, and might do infinite mischief among those growing colonists who were perhaps destined to be a blessing to the mother country.—The noble lord next proceeded to another branch of the subject, relative to the punishment of the publisher under circumstances of ignorance or absence: he stated a case which had occurred in the early part of his own practice, where a printer of a newspaper had been convicted of a libel on an ambassador, and was condemned to the pillory, though he had been in the country and in a state of delirium at the time the libel was published by his agent in London. The punishment, however, was remitted on the production of a proper affidavit. Certainly, if a man maliciously and knowingly published a libel, he was as fit a subject for punishment as the author; but he ought always to be allowed to show circumstances of absence or ignorance to deliver him from the penalties proper only to wilful guilt. He objected particularly to that part of the definition of libel as proposed, which included the mention of either House of Parliament. If any man, feeling a fair objection to any law passed by either House, should proceed, in the heat of argument, to express his disapprobation in strong and nervous language, the law might call him a libeller, and this bill might send him to Botany Bay. To the first part of the definition he must therefore object: to the latter part, which described a libel as a writing calculated to excite the people to alter the constitution in church and state except by lawful means, he had no objection; but if the last clause was adopted, the first was unnecessary. He thought, therefore, that the first part should be struck out; for he had felt convinced through life, and he did not recollect any instance where he had ever expressed a contrary opinion, that the people had a right to discuss in the fullest manner every matter in church and state, provided they wrote nothing tending to revolt or rebellion. But if the present definition stood entire, it would be extremely difficult for any man especially of an ardent mind, to write so as not to incur great risk; and the chance of acquittal by one jury was not so great as not to be counterbalanced by the chance of a conviction by another. With regard to banishment, which was mentioned in this bill, he believed that such a punishment had never been inflicted. Had any man been banished under the act of James 2nd? He believed not. By the present bill, a man for having committed a second offence in publishing a seditious libel, might be driven from his own country, and pursued from state to state with unrelenting vengeance. Banishment was only a mode of punishment by the Scotch laws. His lordship stated, that he himself had been banished into England, exactly 51 years and a few days [A laugh]. Before their lordships proceeded to this new enactment, he would entreat them to consider two points: 1st, Whether the existing laws had been duly enforced and found inefficient. Now there had been only two prosecutions as an experiment of their strength. Why not try more before new laws were demanded? 2ndly, They ought to consider that the penalties in the present bill were so excessive, that it could not be acted upon, nor convictions obtained under it.

Earl Bathurst contended, that the existing law had been found inefficient, as there were instances of repetitions of the same offence after repeated convictions, which could not have happened had the punishment been severe enough to excite sufficient alarm in the mind of the offenders. The noble and learned lord's observations might be arranged under two heads, namely—those that related to blasphemous publications, and those that had a reference to seditious libels. The noble and learned lord objected to the punishment of transportation as applied to the authors or publishers of the former, not on account of its severity, but because the persons so convicted, if sent to the colony of New South Wales, might there commence their blasphemous trade, and corrupt the community into which they were sent. The noble and learned lord added, that robbers and thieves had not the same facilities of repeating the crimes for which they were transported. Now, in his opinion, there was little cause for this apprehension, as publications either of a blasphemous or seditious description were the least likely of all offences that could be committed at Botany Bay. The noble and learned lord had said, that imprisonment for life, which might be awarded by the existing laws, was a more severe punishment than transportation for seven years, and, therefore, that there was no necessity for any change. This might be a very good objection to the bill, provided it fixed upon that punishment alone for every offence. But what did it do? —It left the penalty of fine and imprisonment as before, and superadded that of transportation, at the discretion of the court. But when the noble lord said, that imprisonment by the present law was a more severe penalty than transportation, he destroyed his own argument against the bill; for, in another part of his speech, he had argued, that transportation was so severe a punishment that it would banish every respectable man from the press, and put an end to all free discussion. The second set of libels to which the new punishment of transportation was to apply were seditious libels; and here a noble lord had said, that if a man from ardour of mind were to write a first libel, believing he was doing his country a service, he might be urged by the same ardour to repeat his offence, and thus expose himself to transportation. Now, the libeller here described must be the most unlucky of mankind to write so ardently in the face of what a jury would pronounce a transportable offence. Considering the mischief resulting from publishing either sedition or blasphemous works, he could see no undue severity in punishing a second offence with transportation.

Lord Holland proposed an amendment inserting the words “knowingly and maliciously,” before the words, “composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel;” which was negatived without a division. He then, adverting to the definition of a seditious libel proposed to be inserted in the bill as an amendment of lord Ellenborough immediately after the first time it is mentioned in the first enacting clause, said, he had no objection to the definition, provided the word “and” was used instead of “or,” before the words “excite to any alteration,” &c. The first part of the definition was of a very different character from the latter. To publish “any thing tending to bring into contempt either House of Parliament, was very different from that of exciting to unlawful resistance or violence. If he said, that a sedition prevailed in France, or any other country, it would be immediately understood that he referred to some acts of violence, and not to any attempt to bring the government into hatred and contempt. The same distinction was to be drawn between a direct incitement to rebellion, and a discussion which might tend to bring into hatred and contempt either House of Parliament.” He could not be supposed by any who knew him to be partial to annual parliaments, and no one would suspect him of yielding too easily the recognized privileges of property to new claims; and yet he would allow, that persons who advocated annual elections and universal suffrage, and who, by showing the superiority of a House of Commons elected every year, and by the votes of every individual in the nation, over that House as now constituted, used expressions which tended to bring into hatred and contempt the other House of Parliament, might not be guilty of a seditious libel deserving of transportation. A noble relative of his (the duke of Richmond), a man who loved his country, and deserved as well of it as any man, had not only entertained the doctrines of a reform founded on annual elections and universal suffrage, but had brought a bill into parliament to carry it into effect, and had written pamphlets in its support. Yet, to urge the necessity of universal suffrage and annual parliaments was to bring into hatred and contempt the House of Commons, which was constituted on different principles. The publication of any thing tending to bring into hatred and contempt either House of Parliament, if this reasoning was just, could not be a direct incitement to violence, and therefore did not deserve to be included in the definition of libel along with the latter part of the noble lord’s amendment. He could assure the noble lord that he thought the first words of his definition extended rather than narrowed the original meaning of the phrase—a seditious libel. Any one, by saying that a House of Commons ought to be dissolved for doing such and such things, would use language calculated to bring it into hatred and contempt; while, at the same time, nothing violent or unlawful was recommended. If a pleader of equal eloquence with that of the extraordinary man who sat beside him (lord Erskine) should again rise to grace the English bar, who could say, that he would not convince twelve honest men that this was a libel against the House of Commons? An excitement to change any thing in church or state, as by law established, by unlawful means, or a publication tending to lead to violence or unlawful resistance, was a description of offence that might come within the meaning of a seditious libel. The noble lord who had spoken last had sneered at the idea of a man being impelled to a seditious libel, by an ardent mind; but his sneer would have applied to Burke, to Pope, to Addison, and to other great men. He could read passages from Burke's works, which, according to the present definition of a libel, would come within it. With the latter part of the noble lord's definition he perfectly concurred.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he had no objection to the definition, if the words "seditious libel" were so vague and general as to require any definition. It could never be said, that any thing written against the ministers individually, or against the administration, could be construed into a seditious libel. He was anxious that the public mind should be instructed on this subject. A libel on himself, or on any of his noble friends around him in the administration, was merely a personal libel, and had no reference to sedition. The noble lord had proposed a definition to limit the meaning of the term, of which he approved. There could be no doubt, that if a book was published containing any thing tending to bring into hatred or contempt either House of Parliament, it would be a seditious libel. The only question, therefore, was, not whether the definition included too much, but whether it included all. He was at first willing that the expression "seditious libel" should stand without any definition, because this bill enacted no new law of libel, but merely an additional punishment for suppressing it. The question before them was, whether, if any person was guilty of a seditious libel, the court was to be limited to the old penalties of fine and imprisonment, but should be enabled to superadd that of banishment or transportation. The use of the amendment was to remove that part of the objection against the bill which rested upon the indefinite nature of the offence which it punished.

The Earl of Lauderdale objected to the definition. Many things might be mentioned tending to bring into hatred and contempt either House of Parliament without being a seditious libel. It might be said, for instance, that the House of Commons was obliged to proceed through its business without deliberation, when for one day there stood 54 orders, and when it heaped the floor of the House of Lords with ill-digested bills. The definition appeared to him rather to extend and render more vague than to limit the meaning of the expression.

Lord Holland said, that when he supported the amendment of the noble lord, he did it on the idea that this severity of punishment was only to be applied to an aggravated offence. He had no idea that the present bill swept into itself all the opinions of lawyers, all the contradictory decisions of juries, and in fact, all the inconsistencies of libel-law; but he thought it was to be applied only to publications inciting the people to violence or resistance; and with that view he supported the latter part of the amendment. If every offence of libel, whether malignant or not, was to be included, he had been arguing in vain, and the time spent in debate had been lost.

Lord Ellenborough said, that his amendment was intended to include libels of superior malignity; but he saw he could not give a definition which should include any direct incitement to violence, without omitting what might be equally dangerous; for a libeller might exhort to peace and obedience in various parts of his book, while the tendency was, to bring into hatred and contempt the government and constitution of the country.

The Lord Chancellor said, that general words must be used; otherwise every thing could not be included which ought to be included. If they specified what was to be a seditious libel and left out the first part of the definition, it might then be said, that every thing that was before a libel was now a libel, save and except what tended to bring into hatred and contempt either House of Parliament. Adverting to what lord Holland had said about the duke of Richmond, he said, he would tell what was the opinion of an eminent judge concerning him during the state trials in 1794. He remembered when his noble and learned friend (lord Erskine) had done himself so much credit on that occasion, and had become so great a favourite, that the horses were taken from his noble and learned friend's carriage, and he was drawn home in triumph—without, however, he believed, ever seeing his horses again [A laugh]. On that occasion, when the work of the duke of Richmond was offered in evidence, as a justification of the projects of the prisoners, the chief-justice said, "Can I receive as a justification what appears little less than high-treason?" If that work (continued lord Eldon) was not a libel, he knew not what a libel was. He had forgotten who was the attorney-general of that day, but if he had been then in that situation, he would have brought the highest peer in the realm before a court of justice for it.

Lord Holland said, it appeared, then, that this severe and disgraceful punishment was intended for, or would affect, such men as the duke of Richmond and Mr. Burke, the latter of whom had certainly uttered what would be called in the present day, a seditious libel, when he said, in introducing his plan of economical reform that "kings are naturally fond of low company." He would ask whether these words had not a direct tendency to bring into hatred and contempt the person of his majesty. But these were not the only expressions in his works which might be construed into seditious libel. He could find them in almost every page.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he would have been at first satisfied with the words "seditious libel," as they originally stood in the bill, but as it might go abroad and influence the mind of juries to believe that certain things which were seditious libels were not so, if this amendment were rejected, he would persist in supporting that amendment.

A conversation then ensued, in which lords Darnley, Harrowby, Holland, and Ellenborough, took a part, when the definition in the shape of the amendment proposed by the latter was carried without a division.

Lord Holland, after some verbal amendments, objected to the penalty of banishment, as inconsistent with the laws of England. The earl of Carnarvon moved, as an amendment, to limit the period of banishment to any time not exceeding seven years at the discretion of the judge. This amendment was negatived.

The report was received, and the bill ordered to be read a third time tomorrow.

PROTESTS AGAINST THE BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] The following Protests were entered on the Journals:—It was moved to insert, "with intent to excite his majesty's subjects to subvert by violence the government by law established." It was resolved in the negative.

"Dissentient,

"1st. Because the crime of publishing unlawful libels has, according to the practice of English law, embraced various offences, differing in their nature, as well as their degrees of criminality, from the wilful and predetermined guilt of the actual writer and publisher, to the negligence, and sometimes even to the inevitable ignorance of the party who has been deemed guilty by construction, in respect of his pecuniary interest in the publication, or his mere civil relation to the actual publisher; and it therefore seems just and necessary, that where a discretionary punishment of increased severity is to be enacted, it should be confined to that species of libel, which, both in its natural tendency, and in the motive of the publisher, exhibits the highest degree of malignity.

"2dly. Because the most effectual, if not the only mode of accomplishing this object, is to introduce into the statute, and consequently into the indictment or informations proceeding upon it, a precise definition of the crime which it is intended to prevent by the extension and alteration of the punishment.—By such means alone can juries, in the first instance, be apprized of the particular character of the offence imputed to the defendant, or can the judge have a certain rule to distinguish the cases in which his discretionary power is to be exercised.

3dly. Because without such exact definition as has been rejected, it is possible that judges as well as juries, may, upon different occasions differ very widely as to the meaning of the word seditious, and thereby introduce into the administration of a penal law an uncertainty which is at all times an evil, but which is particularly mischievous when the law is very severe.

It was moved to leave out the word "banished." It was resolved in the negative.

"Dissentient,

"1st. Because the introduction of banishment in the present bill seems to us a wanton and dangerous experiment. That punishment has been hitherto unknown to the law of England, and on the present occasion there has been no proof shown of its necessity, nor due examination had of its consequences. So material an innovation on a system of usages, statutes, and maxims, established without reference to any such punishment, may, by analogies and inferences of law, affect the rights of the exiles and their descendants in a manner not foreseen by the authors of the bill, nor in the contemplation of the legislature that enacts it.

"2dly. Because banishment, from its very nature a punishment of unequal severity in different cases, may be rendered doubly so by the favour or enmity of the sovereigns, to whose dominions the exiles would most naturally resort. We doubt the justice of subjecting an Englishman, even when convicted of a political offence against the rulers of his own country, to the capricious will or arbitrary laws of a foreign government; and we question the policy of teaching men of active spirits and turbulent designs, to look to foreign favour for the mitigation of their lot, on the miscarriage of their enterprises at home. Observation of what is going on around us—reflection on what has taken place in past times—strengthen these considerations. The present situation of Europe affords us no assurance that the power of one sovereign may not be rendered subservient to the vengeance of another; and the history of free states, modern as well as ancient, admonishes us that nothing has a more direct tendency to introduce foreign influence and foreign interference in the internal affairs of a country than the banishment of state delinquents.

STATE OF THE DISTURBED DISTRICTS.] The Earl of Strathmore, in the absence of a noble earl (Grey), had to state, that a letter had been received from the north of England, from the hon. and rev. brother of that noble earl, in answer to some statements which he had himself felt it his duty to make upon a former occasion. The letter stated, that the hon. and rev. gentleman was now in his own house in the proper discharge of his duty, and that he had written to prevent any misconstruction or misconception; he was at his post, and had no intention of removing from it. The noble earl said, he had certainly stated that there had been a considerable alarm in the county of Durham, and had mentioned that two magistrates of that county had removed to the town of Newcastle; and he believed he had made use of the term "refugees." This was correspondent to the statement he had received, that they had gone to Newcastle for the sake of taking refuge. The noble earl read a letter from one of the magistrates alluded to, which stated, that understanding what was the impression upon the public mind, he trusted justice would be done him by stating, that he was at home in the discharge of his proper duty, and that he had no thoughts of leaving home. The circumstance of his being at Newcastle for a single day had perhaps given rise to the report that, on the apprehension of danger, he had thought it right to provide for the safety of his family; but he was not easily driven from his home, nor would easily forsake his public duty. The noble lord then read another letter from the hon. and rev. Mr. Grey, which stated briefly to a friend what he had detailed to his noble brother. It was dated Saville-row, Newcastle, December 7, 1819, and desired the person to whom it was written to inform him (lord Strathmore) that he had returned that day to Wickham, with Mrs. Grey and his children, under no apprehension whatever of the safety of himself or his flock, and that it was nothing but his having engaged lodgings, that had induced him to keep his family at Newcastle. The noble earl then observed, that he would make no comments, but would congratulate the parish upon the return of their worthy pastor, who, he hoped, would acquire fresh confidence, and find the alarm unfounded. He would address to their lordships a few words with regard to the statement he had made concerning the population of this district, which was supposed to be disaffected. He understood that a letter had been written to the mayor of Newcastle by an hon. baronet, inquiring whether the statement which he had made to their lordships was correct. The mayor of Newcastle had returned for answer, that his statement was not exaggerated. He was happy to say, that the disaffection was confined to the persons engaged in the iron-manufactories and the collieries, which, however, composed the great mass of the population. He certainly had said nothing against the agricultural part of the community, for he believed the greater part of the agricultural classes were perfectly well-affected. From all the information he had been enabled to procure, he could take upon himself to say, that the statement he had formerly made, was rather underrated than exaggerated.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, December 10.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] Lord Sidmouth moved the third reading of this bill. The bill was accordingly read a third time, and the question being put, "That this bill do pass,"

The Earl of Carnarvon rose to move the amendment, of which he had given notice. The principle of the bill had been already so fully discussed, that nothing which might be said by him on that subject was likely to alter their lordships' determination. He must, however, observe, that this bill was now arrived at its last stage, without its being known whether the ground on which it was recommended to their lordships adoption was well founded or not. It had not been ascertained in what degree the laws were deficient in the power to punish blasphemous and seditious libels, or whether they were deficient at all. On that point, the most important for their lordships consideration, they had heard nothing which bore out the assertions of the supporters of the bill. Blasphemous and seditious libels had been allowed to circulate to a great extent within these two or three years; but it was with astonishment he heard the necessity of passing new laws asserted, on the ground of the insufficiency of those which now existed to check such publications. In order to see what foundation there was for this assertion, their lordships had only to look at the return on the table of the number of prosecutions. By that paper it appeared, that the whole of the prosecutions by information, of blasphemous and seditious libels, during the year 1818, amounted to nil! In turning to see what had been the number by indictment, he thought that a proper regard to the constitution had induced the law officers of the Crown to adopt a mode of action which was justly more popular than information; but when he had turned to that head, there he found nil also! That the government and the officers of the Crown should not think it necessary to institute prosecutions, when the evil of which they complained was at its height, and should now come to parliament for a new law, without having tried the old, was most extraordinary. Having made this observation, which the paper on the table naturally suggested, he had now to state the principle which induced him to propose an amendment to the bill. That principle was, that in time of alarm, great caution ought to be exercised, before any permanent change in the law was adopted. At the beginning of the session those who opposed the measures introduced were willing to give ministers temporary powers to enable them to repress any disaffection which might be found really to exist; but they protested against making local dangers a ground for passing permanently restrictive laws. The same consideration had induced him to make one attempt before the bill was finally adopted, to prevail on their lordships to do that which ought always to be done in such cases; namely, to give only a temporary power to ministers, and to reserve for future consideration the question, whether the law was fit to be rendered permanent. Last night the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, whose mind possessed the richest stores of legal knowledge, had hesitated to apply to a bill, a clause the principle of which he admitted, until he had time for further inquiry, and was not satisfied that the postponement of the bill till Tuesday would afford sufficient opportunities for his research. If that noble and learned person could not by Tuesday make up his mind on a subject with which he was so well acquainted, how could the few days in which their lordships had been occupied in the consideration of this bill be sufficient to satisfy them that it ought to be made permanent? He believed that to make a wise law on the subject of libel, one that should equally protect the liberty of the subject and the security of the government, was one of the most difficult tasks a legislative assembly could undertake; and yet, upon a proposition made last night, their lordships were called upon to make such a law permanent. He could not but regret that no satisfactory reason had been given for altering the law.

He must therefore resist so great and permanent a change in the constitution. Before the last clause authorizing the alteration of the act in the present session, he would propose to introduce a clause declaring that it should continue in force two years and no longer.

Lord Sidmouth could not admit that this bill was a violation of the constitution for a temporary purpose. The noble earl had stated, that he and his friends had been ready to co-operate in temporary measures of restriction. He certainly did not understand that to be the case; but if it had, such co-operation could not have been accepted by his majesty's ministers with respect to the present bill. Was the danger to be guarded against one of a local description, or one the legislation against which ought to be temporary? That danger was the circulation of blasphemous and seditious libels; and it was their lordships duty to mark their opinion of the importance of putting down such crimes by passing permanent laws for that purpose. In estimating the nature of this bill, their lordships should consider what the law on the subject of libel had been previously to the act which an hon. and learned gentleman introduced in another place. The punishment for libel was then fine, imprisonment, or the pillory, or all three. It was not, however, proposed by the present bill to make the punishment in the first instance so severe. Only fine and imprisonment attached to a first libel; on a second conviction, banishment and transportation were added. He would ask their lordships, whether, considering the great increase of the crime of libel, these could be regarded as too heavy punishments? Whether the framers of the bill had shown a disposition to push the law to a severity beyond what the exigency of the case required? But the noble earl had referred to the papers on the table; and it was unquestionably true, that no prosecutions had been instituted during the year 1818 for blasphemous and seditious libels. But their lordships could not doubt that the attorney and solicitor-general had reasons to assign for this forbearance. Whether their reasons would appear satisfactory to the noble lords opposite, he could not pretend to say. He could, however, assure their lordships, that the subject had been fully considered by two of the most able men in the profession of the law; and the course which had been adopted was by them considered the most advisable. When he mentioned to their lordships the name of sir Samuel Shepherd, they would be sensible that he could refer to no public character more distinguished for transcendent talents and private worth. After what took place in the court of King's-bench in the course of the year 1817, particularly after the remarkable acquittal on a prosecution for blasphemous libel, a very strong impression was produced, that the existing law could not be successfully enforced. But with regard to the year 1818, the fact was, that public libels had during that year become less numerous, and a hope was entertained, which unfortunately proved fallacious, that the temptation to publish had decreased with the disposition to purchase such poison. When it was found that the expectation formed in 1818 had been disappointed, and that libels again increased, it was thought necessary to look to a sufficient remedy. All the arguments, and all the conduct of the noble lords on the other side, formed the very counterpart of what he recollected to have passed in 1792. When his majesty's proclamation was issued against libels, then loud charges were made against the government for not prosecuting. The instruction given to the magistrates to perform their duty was described to be the holding out encouragement for spies. When an association was formed, in which were to be found the names of the late Mr. Windham, Mr. Perceval, and other distinguished persons, and subscriptions entered into for the prosecution of libels, these proceedings were called oppressive and unconstitutional, and were held up to opprobrium as an attack on the liberty of the press. On the 18th of September in the subsequent year, Paine was convicted of publishing his seditious libel; but still the same conduct was pursued by those who opposed his majesty's government. Now, what had happened within the last two or three years showed that the same course was still followed. Seeing the difficulty which had arisen in prosecuting, and the art with which some libels were framed, he had addressed a letter to the magistrates, recommending a course which appeared best adapted to the case. Before he had done this, he had taken the opinion of the highest legal authorities, and the answer he received from them was, that the magistrates had the right of holding to bail for libel. The measure he had described was however no sooner adopted, than it was stigmatized as a violation on his part of official duty, and an undue interference with the law of the land. It was not, therefore, from quarters in which this conduct had been pursued, that complaints of the neglect of prosecution ought to come. With respect to the motion of the noble lord, it was one to which he could not agree. He had already stated the difference between the law of libel as it formerly stood, and that which at present existed; and if he were to give his opinion as to any imperfection in the bill now before their lordships, he should say that it was deficient in not enacting some punishment for libel in the first instance equivalent to that which had been recently repealed.

The Earl of Rosslyn thought, that before this bill passed, ministers ought to show that the present law was inadequate to the object in view, and what prosecution for a right object, and rightly conducted, had failed. The noble viscount had alluded to the proceedings against Mr. Hone, as a reason why the officers of the crown were unwilling to prosecute. But what had been the effect of that prosecution? Why, according to the noble viscount's admission, it was followed by a decrease in the number of libels published, being the consequence of a decrease in the disposition to buy. Now, if such an alteration had taken place after the trial of Mr. Hone, it was rather odd to make his acquittal a ground for the present measure? But who had been acquitted in the year 1819 for blasphemous libel, that the noble viscount thought it necessary to propose this measure? The argument, that Mr. Hone's acquittal had caused an increase of libellous publications, was now swept away. If their lordships looked at the papers on the table, they would find that no steps had been taken towards enforcing the law in the present year, until July. It seemed as if prosecutions had been abstained from purposely—as if it had been expected that an increase of the crime would take place, to justify the imposing of heavy and extraordinary penalties unknown to the constitution.

Lord Erskine said, that when he formerly spoke against the bill before the House, he had not then seen the papers now upon the table, which greatly increased his objection to it. He did not then know that in 1818 there had been no prosecutions, and in the last year only one. How then could a measure so perfectly new in principle be possibly supported. The noble viscount ought not to suppose that they who opposed it, condemned ministers for not prosecuting.—What they had said was only this—"If there has been such an increase of blasphemous libels, as to justify the enactment of new laws to suppress them, why have you not prosecuted them. We do not pretend to blame your inactivity, because we have no proof of the truth of your assertion, but when you call upon us to consent to new laws, and of greater severity, we have a right to retort that no use had been made of the old ones."—It had been justly observed by his noble friend (lord Holland) that the matter to be considered was not the number of the writings which alarmed his majesty's ministers, but the proportion to the antidotes of religious publications. Only 3,000 copies of the Age of Reason had been shown to have been circulated, whilst printing in all its branches had increased to an uncalculable extent, and particularly in tracts periodically circulated by the zeal of sincere supporters of the Christian faith. Lord E. said he had reason to believe that the numbers alone of the Methodist and Evangelical Magazines, taking the circulation of each at 25,000 per month, amounted to above 500,000 in a year, and there were very many others of the same character so widely circulated, as to make religious enthusiasm rather than infidelity, the national characteristic. At the same time he was most desirous that the infamous traffic in writings of that description should be put down, and the ancient laws had always been found sufficient to effect it. His objection to the bill, however, would have been greatly lessened, if the second punishment had applied alone to blasphemous publications, because booksellers might then easily discover the kind of books or pamphlets they were selling; but when it was extended to writings upon the daily measures of government, which the people by the best principles of the constitution have a right to consider, and even a duty with freedom to animadvert on, it was a scandalous and frightful abuse to require from every general bookseller carrying on an extensive trade in books, such an accurate scrutiny into every work he sent forth from an immense library as to protect him against the ruin of transportation if he made a mistaken estimate of every writing on political subjects which he had sold, more especially when the libellous characters of such publications depended upon opinions which might differ, and not upon any plain rule of law. It was manifest, therefore, that by extending the bill to other objects, blasphemy was made a mere stalking horse to justify, and by imposition to render popular the new projected fetters on the press, so as to deter men from examining and publishing the acts of government, dreading every public scrutiny into the vices or errors of its administration. Lord Erskine said, that his noble friend (lord Holland) had alluded to a passage in the works of Mr. Burke, exposing the corruption of an addressing parliament, and a petitioning and complaining people. There were many other most eloquent ones of the same description, one of which he repeated, and said, that coming from the pen of some obscure author instead of Mr. Burke, whose character was established and out of reach, it might have been prosecuted, and the terrors of transportation might have been made use of to suppress such valuable works. He should therefore support the amendment.

The Duke of Wellington thought his noble and learned friend who had just sat down had completely mistaken the question. What their lordships had to consider was, not whether the present law of libel was sufficient with regard to a first offence, or whether the government ought to have instituted more prosecutions; but whether it was proper now to pass a law for inflicting a severer punishment on persons convicted a second time of the same offence. What had given occasion to the introduction of the present measure was, as he understood, the case of Carlile. That person had not only continued the sale of the libel for which he was prosecuted, after conviction, but had published other libels, and had also published the same libel for which he was tried in another form, before sentence was passed upon him. No person who considered the circumstances of that case could avoid seeing that the law was not strong enough to prevent the repetition of the offence. The question therefore was, whether their lordships would enable the judges to inflict an additional punishment in such a case—whether they would not adopt a measure which had for its object to prevent the repetition of so atrocious an offence.

Lord Holland, though the grounds on which this measure had been defended had often varied, did not expect at this period of the discussion to hear it stated, that it had been brought forward for the reason the noble duke assigned. It seemed now, that all that had been stated in support of the bill was unfounded—that it was not a general increase of libels that had given it origin, but a desire to apply punishment to a particular repetition of the offence, because one man had after conviction continued to publish: but it was a pity the noble duke did not think it necessary to go one step farther, and to show that the court was not able to punish this offender. If he did publish fresh libels, did not every separate publication afford a ground for further punishment? If their lordships were to go on to punish on such grounds, they must next apply the penalty of death to this offence, for nothing else remained. When the discussion of the present measure first commenced, it was stated that libellous publications had greatly increased, and that the acquittal of Mr. Hone had been a great cause of that increase. A return of the number of prosecutions, embracing that period having been moved for and produced, it was to be expected that this assertion would have been confirmed; but on referring to it to see what prosecutions had been instituted during the year after Mr. Hone's acquittal, what was the number returned? None. The noble viscount, in answer to the observation of his noble friend on this subject, says, that during that period the fact was, that the number of libels published did actually decrease. This was contrary to every thing that had been stated before. For his part, he had no inclination to look after libels; but he must say, that the most blasphemous and seditious he had ever met with were published in that very year 1819, when, according to the noble viscount, the taste for that sort of publication had so much declined; and yet no prosecution had been instituted in that year. Here, he observed, he must repeat the observation of his noble and learned friend, that fault was not found with ministers for not prosecuting, if prosecutions were unnecessary. That was not made a charge against them; but when they proposed new laws, on the ground that the present were inefficient, it was fit that they should be called upon to prove that inefficiency, by its failure when applied to cases which deserved to be prosecuted. At the beginning of the session it was proposed by a noble friend of his, that their lordships, before they proceeded to any enactment, should institute an inquiry, in order to ascertain whether the evil complained of existed; but then it was never conceived that it lay in so narrow a compass as that assigned to it by the noble duke. Now it appeared that all we had heard respecting the great increase of blasphemous and seditious libels, after the acquittal of Mr. Hone, was unfounded; that on the contrary they had decreased, and consequently no prosecutions had been instituted. He confessed that, had he heard from any of his friends on his side of the House, that the return of the number of prosecutions would have been what it turned out to be, he should have deemed it a hasty assertion; but the manner in which it had been accounted for was one of the most extraordinary circumstances which had occurred during the discussion of the measures proposed by ministers.

The Earl of Westmoreland said, that as the bill had gone through all its stages, and as their lordships had already agreed to the increase of punishment, that increase could not be brought again into discussion. If the measure were now under discussion, he should be prepared to contend, that the alteration of the punishment by the present bill did not render it more severe than it was when pillory was in use. This, however, was not now the question. The question was, whether the bill enacting this increased punishment was to be a permanent or temporary measure. He had no hesitation in saying that he thought it ought to be permanent, as he could not conceive a time in which he or their lordships would be disposed to consider the blasphemous and seditious libels described in the bill too severely punished by the penalties awarded. Some noble lords had represented this measure as dangerous to the liberties of the people, and an inroad on the constitution. He was of opinion, that it would tend to preserve their liberties and constitution; and as it was desirable that these blessings should be perpetual, so he thought that this measure should be perpetuated as their support and protection.

Earl Grosvenor said, that as the bill had not yet passed, it became their lordships to consider now, whether it ought to be made temporary or permanent. He besought their lordships to reflect on the danger of the measure to public liberty. He could not believe, from the temper displayed by his majesty's ministers, that they would accede to the proposition now made; but he called upon those noble lords who had not become the slaves of administration, who had not so much prostrated their understandings to the views of government, as not sometimes to decide for themselves, and to support measures proposed by his side of the House—he called upon the noble lords on the cross-benches, to consider the inroad which this act would make on the constitution, and therefore not to sanction its perpetuity. He knew it might be said, that the law, if found unnecessary or injurious, might be repealed; but it was difficult to get a law repealed on which the courts had been acting as permanent. Under a tyrannical law, the public mind might acquire a death-like torpor, which might render it insensible to the despotism under which it laboured, and thus learn to make no difference between the thick atmosphere of oppression, and the free air of liberty. The noble earl said, that he should have wished to have entered more at large into the subject of the new measures, had he not been prevented by indisposition. He then proceeded, but evidently labouring under the indisposition to which he alluded, to state grounds for believing that the alarms in the northern counties, and particularly in that part of the country with which he was connected, were false, or much exaggerated. The disturbances among the miners and colliers of Flintshire had no political object: they were merely disputes about wages, which had been since adjusted. He had alluded to these circumstances, because he was confident that in many other instances where disturbances prevailed, they arose from causes connected with the state of trade or the rate of wages, and did not indicate any disposition of resistance or rebellion against the government. Reverting to the bill before the House, the noble earl observed, that it would have been a great satisfaction to his mind if an instruction had been given to the committee to divide it into two, and to separate that part of it which related to blasphemy from the enactments for checking seditious libels. The blasphemous libels intended to be put down were so disgusting in their nature, that there would have been little objection to greater severity of punishment. Seditious libels, as the word was understood, might be of a very different description, and might not deserve the same punishment. He had observed with regret, that the noble lords opposite, in supporting their measures of severity, had, in their speeches, universally joined blasphemous to seditious libels, as if for the purpose of inflaming the public abhorrence of the one by the infamy attached to the other. He always lamented when he saw religious and secular matters mixed, but more particularly when he saw religious men engage in secular subjects, for by so doing they uniformly lost that respect and reverence which ought to belong to their sacred character. He should not, however, find fault with them, if, when they did interfere in secular matters, they followed the example of the present bishop of London, who met these blasphemous publications by the only proper means—the distribution of religious and moral lessons. Such were the means most effectual for controlling the evil complained of—such the means for acquiring respect and esteem for the individual who would so conduct himself—and such the surest and most effectual weapon for combating the enemies of the church, by drawing out for the sacred fabric the best wishes of the generous and the good throughout the kingdom. [Hear, hear!].

The Bishop of Landaff said, that in the few observations which he had to make, he would confine himself to that part of the bill which related to the suppression of blasphemous libels. He did not understand the noble duke as supporting the necessity of the present bill only on the difficulty of punishing or checking an offence in one particular instance. The offence of blasphemy was one of long standing. It had, during the last century, appeared under different shapes of infidelity and irreligion, but it had lately assumed an entirely new aspect. It was formerly limited to books of infidelity and free-thinking, which fell into the hands only of persons of education, who could resist their influence or refute their errors. In the present times, blasphemous and infidel productions were brought down to the level of the meanest capacity—learning and argument and reason were discarded, and the meanest understanding joined to the grossest ignorance assumed the privilege of abusing what the most cultivated and sublimest minds had defended and venerated. There was no reason in that called the “Age of Reason.” Considering the character of the irreligious works in circulation, it was vain to suppose that they could be put down by legitimate reasoning or fair argument, or that their authors could be silenced by any effort of wise and solemn minded men to refute their errors. Some attempt therefore ought to be made to try whether the terrors of the law could not put down publications against which neither the reasonings of the wise, nor the researches of the learned, nor the force of truth, offered an immediate defence to those classes of society among which they diffused their poison. The noble earl had eulogized the distribution of moral and religious tracts to counteract this alarming evil. This might be done; but it was not alone sufficient. The ministers of religion should be seconded in their efforts, and inspired with confidence in the success of their labours, by the countenance of their lordships, and of all the respectable part of society, who should testify their abhorrence of those attempts now making to unsettle all the principles of mankind. After the discussion which the bill now before the House had already undergone, the reverend prelate declared that he should think any observations of his an intrusion. He could not, however, but allude to one remark made by a noble lord, who asked—was transportation a fit punishment for a wrong direction of intellectual labour? Now, there was no effort of mind, no intellectual operation, in blasphemy. It was a crime that the meanest capacity could commit; and the persons who had lately published their pestiferous doctrines had evinced so much of the felon’s character that they deserved to share the felon’s fate. He therefore gave his support to the bill, which, in his opinion, would be duly executed by juries, and give confidence to all orders of the community.

Lord Lilford, who spoke from the crossbenches, said, in reply to an observation of earl Grosvenor’s, that he did not see why those who supported government on the present occasion could be considered as having prostrated their understandings to the administration. The noble lord at some length defended the bill.

The amendment was negatived without a division, and the bill passed.

PROTEST AGAINST PASSING THE BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] The following protest was entered on the journals:

"Dissentient,

"For the reasons assigned in the protest on the second reading of this bill.

"And because, feeling, as I do, a just abhorrence of the mischief of circulating blasphemous writings, I am persuaded that the prevalence of such libels will not be diminished by the provisions of this bill.

"Because I consider, also, that in the present disturbed and distracted state of the country, measures of extreme severity are little calculated to restore confidence to an irritated and suffering people, and that the increased measure of punishment for the repetition of the offence, of "composing, printing, or publishing" what are termed seditious libels, is inconsistent with the genuine spirit of the English constitution, and inefficient for the object which it professes to have in view. BEDFORD."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, December 10.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—COMPLAINT OF A PAMPHLET INTITLED "A TRIFLING MISTAKE," &c.] Mr. Courtenay rose, in pursuance of his notice, to make a complaint of a pamphlet, an extract from which had been read during the debate of yesterday. The task which he had now undertaken was of the most painful nature, and nothing but a strong conscientious feeling of its necessity could have led him to undertake it. He should, however, have been wanting to himself, and to those privileges which he, as a member of parliament, was bound to defend, if he had not, after what had passed yesterday evening, called the notice of the House to the gross and wanton attack which had been made upon it. Having satisfied his mind that it deserved the notice of the House, he would shortly state the reasons which had induced him to put himself forward on this occasion. One reason was, that he had heard the obnoxious paragraph more distinctly than any other member in the House from his proximity to the hon. member who read it. Another reason was, that he was totally unacquainted with the party to whom the pamphlet was imputed, and not at all implicated in any of the topics which its pages contained. He therefore trusted, that the House would agree, that he had not undertaken an improper, though he might have undertaken an unpleasant duty. He fully agreed with an honourable and learned friend of his, who had spoken last night, that cases might arise in which it would be imprudent to take notice of breaches of privilege: but this certainly could not be classed among them. There was this difference between this publication and all those other publications to which his hon. and learned friend had alluded, namely—that it had been read by an hon. member to the House, and had afterwards been commented on by him in the course of his speech. For his own part, he must say, that he had never in the whole course of his life perused a work which contained a more direct libel on the House; or which gave more direct advice to the people, to abrogate its powers, to resume the rights which they had intrusted to it, and to make, by brute force, that reform in it which they deemed advisable. Honourable members could not but be aware, that for some time past, publications of the most seditious nature had been generally circulated; that language of the most inflammatory description had been employed to decry all our most sacred institutions; and that upon no subject had more inflammatory language been used than upon the House of Commons. As yet, they had not chosen to mark the opinion which they entertained of these calumnies, by punishing those who propagated them; but now, as a paragraph which reflected most grossly on the character of the House had been brought before them in the course of debate, it became them to bring the author of it to punishment, if they valued their privileges, and wished to prevent the neglect of vindicating them on the present occasion from being drawn into a dangerous precedent against themselves at a future period. He was sure that he need not take up the time of the House by referring to precedents, in which the House had vindicated its privileges by proceeding against authors who had aspersed its character: such cases were very numerous, and in many instances the proceedings had even been set in motion by those who were generally accounted the guardians and assertors of the people's rights. Mr. Fox and Mr.

Sheridan had both said, that the best way to uphold the dignity of the people, was to uphold the dignity of the Commons' House of Parliament. It was not merely to uphold its dignity, but also to preserve its very existence, that he now came forward in defence of its privileges. Not merely had the language of menace been used by the author of the pamphlet of which he now complained, but also language advising and recommending the people to use their physical force, in order to obtain reform in parliament. He did not know whether any members were now present who had not heard the extracts from this pamphlet read by his honourable friend last night. If there were any, he would state to them the nature of the libellous publication. After saying a great deal of the reform which, according to the writer was essential for the preservation of the people's rights, and after complaining of the departure from some of his former principles, which had marked the recent conduct of the individual (lord Erskine) to whom the pamphlet was addressed, the writer expressed himself as follows, on the state of that House:—

“What prevents the people from walking down to the House and pulling out the members by the ears, locking up their doors, and flinging the key into the Thames? Is it any majesty which hedges in the members of that assembly? Do we love them? Not at all—we have an instinctive horror and disgust at the very abstract idea of a boroughmonger. Do we respect them?—Not in the least. Do we regard them as endowed with any superior qualities? On the contrary, individually there is scarcely a poorer creature than your mere member of parliament, though in his corporate capacity the earth furnishes not so absolute a bully. Their true practical protectors, then, the real efficient anti-reformers are to be found at the Horse-Guards, and at Knightsbridge barracks. As long as the House of Commons majorities are backed by the regimental muster-roll, so long may those who have got the tax-power keep it, and hang those who resist.”

He collected from the partial cheers which had been raised during the reading of this paragraph, that there were some gentlemen in the House who entertained opinions similar to those of the author of it. He was sorry for it.—Abusive, violently abusive as it was, he did not know whether he should have called the express notice of the House to it, if it had been unaccompanied by others of a similar description. He had no objection to any man expressing as strongly as he pleased his conviction of the necessity of parliamentary reform; but he must insist upon his not directing the people to seek it by physical force; he must insist upon his not leading them to think, that such a remedy was the only remedy left them, and therefore the only course which they ought to adopt. The paragraph which he had just read to them, when considered along with the context, evidently expressed the opinion of the writer, that it was by force alone that parliamentary reform could be accomplished; for, after stating how impossible it was for the House to reform itself, he proceeded to say, in page 51, that “nothing but brute force, or the pressing fear of it, would reform the parliament.” Would any man be found to say that two meanings could be put upon this passage? If there were no other passage in the book but this, the House would not do its duty, if it did not institute proceedings upon it: for in what situation might it be placed, if it did not take some notice of this pamphlet? Supposing that any practical effects were to result from the advice given in it (and the following of such advice could lead to nothing else but scenes of confusion and ruin, which no man could contemplate without horror), with what conscience could the House proceed to punish the miserable wretches who had been deluded by this work, when it had not declared its opinion upon the work itself, though brought before its notice, or shown that it had the power to punish the sophistical writer of it? In such a case, would not any person, involved in the guilt of rebellion from following the recommendation of this pamphlet, have a right to say to the House, “You have yourselves assisted to mislead me; you are now pouring your vengeance upon me, and yet you have taken no notice of the person whose advice led me into that course of crime for which you now punish me.” He had no means of ascertaining by whom this pamphlet was written; but from whatever quarter it came, it was clearly the production of a person who filled no mean situation in life, who had received no common education, and who was endowed with considerable talent.—

When, then, every party in the state was calling for the punishment of the twopenny and threepenny publishers of treason, was it fitting that they should show any thing like a fear of this author, because he enjoyed a more exalted rank in society than those wretched scribblers. After ascertaining the author of this pamphlet, the House could proceed to further measures. He would now state what he thought the proper course for the House to adopt. He was desirous that the House should proceed in the most cautious and most deliberate manner; and that whatever should be done might appear not to arise from sudden indignation or individual feeling, but to be the result of reflection and mature consideration. The first step which he proposed to be adopted was, to call to the bar of the House, the individual whose name appeared upon the face of the publication, in order that they might get at the real offender. He thought it in no case proper to proceed against the printer or publisher, when the real offender could be traced. He should therefore move, that Robert Stoddart be called to the bar of the House. There were cases in which the House had immediately come to a resolution declaring that the paper complained of was of a particular character, and then called the party before them. There were other cases in which they called the party before them without having come to any resolution. Upon the precedent furnished by the latter class of cases he proceeded, because it did appear to him more reasonable, first to inquire after the person who wrote the publication, and then to pass a resolution, expressing whether it was or was not a breach of privilege. In making this motion, he hoped that no other motive would be imputed to him but a common sense of the authority of the House, and a common feeling of the respect with which it ought to be regarded throughout the country.

The Speaker.—Does the hon. member wish the title of the publication, and the particular passages to which he has referred, to be read?

Mr. Courtenay assented, and handed the pamphlet to the clerk, who read from it the passages quoted by Mr. Courtenay in his speech, and also the title-page, which is as follows:—"A Trifling Mistake in Thomas Lord Erskine's recent Preface shortly noticed, and respectfully corrected, in a Letter to his Lordship, by the Author of "The Defence of the People." London, published by Robert Stoddart, 81, Strand." He then moved that Robert Stoddart be ordered to attend the House on Monday next. On the question being put,

Sir Francis Burdett said, it appeared to him, that the House never appeared in a more odious view, than when it exercised its privileges in a manner repugnant to the general feelings of the country, and in a manner by no means calculated to satisfy justice. If the present motion was agreed to, that House must appear to the public at large in a very extraordinary view. A few nights since, an inquiry which the whole country demanded, an inquiry undeniably within the inquisitorial functions of the House, was refused, as not suited to the character and powers of that House. But now, all allowed that this was within the province of the House—this invidious, judicial, exercise of its functions. When the real inquisitorial functions of the House were to be exercised, at the desire and for the protection of the people, the House was voted to be an unfit place, and it was so voted by those who on the present occasion would vote the House into a court of justice. It must appear extraordinary, that the House should be now called upon to exert functions which they had been lately told could never be judiciously or usefully exerted. The House had been told, that they were not qualified to sift truth; that they could not stir one step in a judicial inquiry without covering themselves with disgrace; that no public benefit could result from the exercise of such functions. Such was the reply, when the whole country called for the exercise of functions which could be constitutionally and beneficially exercised. But now it was thought proper to institute a judicial proceeding, although no evidence was before them, no evidence could be fairly before them, and truth could not be investigated. Now it was proposed to assume the power of defining laws, and the most difficult and vague of all laws—the law of libel, without giving the accused any possibility of equal trial, or any possibility of obtaining justice. He thought the doing of such an act as this would excite the greatest feeling of disgust throughout the country, and the strongest sense of injustice. Even supposing, for the sake of argument—and it was only for the sake of argument he could suppose it—that the passages cited were a libel, still the mode of proceeding now proposed was unjust and repugnant to every man of just and honest feelings in the country. The House was to be the judge in its own cause, and to punish at its pleasure. Whether the charge was true or not, was not the question; but any proceeding against this publication in the mode proposed, could only lower (if lower it could be) and disgrace the House in the eyes of the country. He was surprised that the hon. and learned member should have chosen such a strange mode of proceeding, and should not before proposing to ascertain the offender, have called upon the House to say whether any offence was committed. From the reading of a passage, no one could say whether it was a libel or not. It might be borne out by the context. He believed it to be exceedingly true, that a borough-monger was as despicable, as low, as any human being could be. But if detached and unconnected passages were taken from any writer, they might appear libels or breaches of privilege. Mr. Burke had written many passages more degrading to that House than the passage now quoted. Lord Chatham had said, that that was a corrupt House, subversive of all law and order, and of liberty of every kind. Indeed, there had not been a great or eminent man for many ages, who had not characterized that House in worse terms than those now in question. The privileges of that House had been originally granted for the purpose of enabling members to maintain the rights of the people. They had been intended for the protection of members against the officers of the crown, and against being called before the privy council to answer for doing their duty in that House. But to exercise their privileges in this way, was a monstrous perversion of their nature and object. Selden, generally distinguished as the learned Selden, said, that “members of parliament were as great princes as any in the world. Privilege of parliament was, no man knew what; but under this they could exercise all power. The doge and senate of Venice exercised no power over their own people, which parliament could not exercise over all classes of people.” Thus Selden pronounced the power of parliament worse than the greatest, and proverbially the most odious, tyranny which existed in the world. Having read the pamphlet, he could by no means agree with the hon. and learned gentleman in the construction he put upon particular passages. It contained nothing which recommended the subversion of that House. The passage now brought under the notice of the House, instead of being a breach of privilege, admitted of the very contrary construction. What did prevent the people from pulling out the members by the ears? The passage quoted said, it was “force” that prevented them. What did the House say it was that prevented them? What did the bills say, which were now passing to the general disgust of the country? [Hear.] Did they not say, that it was absolutely necessary to have recourse to brute force? [Hear, hear!] This was the very argument used by the House itself. If this was so—and he believed it was—they must admit that it was more through fear than any attachment to them, that they were protected. This was no more than what was said by every advocate for the present measures. This was the argument founded upon the papers upon the table; and by coercive measures alone was it proposed to make the people yield to their authority. Yet the House would now consider it highly penal to say so! The House had declared their conviction that force alone protected them, in so many ways, that they could not be misunderstood. The author of this pamphlet, whoever he might be, had said no more. He should content himself at present with opposing the motion for calling the printer to the bar, till they had themselves determined whether the passage was or was not a breach of privilege. He protested against the House turning itself into a court of justice, as it was most unfit to decide in its own cause, by which proceeding it would take the law into its own hands, and preclude all means of defence or fair trial.

Mr. Banks said, he had heard the hon. baronet's speech with considerable pain, and had felt doubtful whether it was not his duty to have interposed in the course of it. He could not conceive how they could be a House of Commons, how they could act as representatives, or how they could perform their part in the legislature, if they did not protect themselves from libel and insult. The hon. baronet had referred to the demand for inquiry lately made, at least by a part of the people of England, and to the refusal of inquiry. The House upon that occasion had exercised a discretionary power. No argument could, in the present case, be founded upon that. Whether the House had done right or wrong then, their conduct afforded no argument now. He had taken no part in that discussion, more from accident than any other cause; but the House had the power of instituting an inquiry if it chose to exert it. Its powers were less adequate to the purpose than those of any of the courts below; but it might have exercised its powers. It had been said by those who were for inquiry, that it might be conducted at the bar; that it might be referred to a committee, or that the attorney-general might be instructed to prosecute. He knew not what course the hon. gentlemen meant to adopt: whether he proposed that the House should be judge in its own case, than which nothing was more common in the best times; or that the attorney-general should be instructed to prosecute, which was also common: whatever course might be adopted, he would ask even the hon. baronet, whether the House were not fit to judge of the merits of this case. He had never read a grosser libel. It was a libel tending to produce revolution and anarchy [Hear, hear!] tending to excite physical, or, as the writer called it, "brute force." It was a direct incentive to pull the members out by the ears, to lock the door, and to throw the key into the Thames. The hon. baronet said, the House would be guilty of great injustice, if it adopted the proposed proceeding, and assumed such powers. But the privileges of the House existed for the defence of the people, and for the protection of the people. That House could not exist without maintaining its power and authority. The hon. baronet and his friends thought the present constitution bad, and wished to new-model it. God forbid that they should have any hand in the new-modelling of the constitution. It should be his object, while he had a seat in that House, to resist the new modelling of it by such hands. That constitution, under which we had grown up and flourished, was said by the hon. baronet to be inconsistent with justice: but he must say, that if the public mind was to be worked upon by such gross and seditious libels, that House, the constitution, and the administration of justice, would soon be overthrown. His best endeavours should be always exerted to avert such a crisis. Libels like that now before them endangered not only the usefulness, but also the existence of the House: but the greatness and the dignity of the House had been maintained, ought to be maintained, and, he trusted, would still be maintained, against the new sect which had risen up amongst us, and whose object was anarchy and desolation.

Lord John Russell thought the question now brought before the House the most ill-advised, and the most imprudent that could possibly have been brought before them. When there were so many seditious libels throughout the country—when in the papers on their table was found a resolution, that after the 1st of January 1820, no obedience ought to be paid to parliament, why should this passage be selected for the judgment of the House? If notice was to be taken of every libel, why was there no notice of the resolution he had mentioned, of similar resolutions at other meetings, of the "Medusa" and the "Republican," every one of which was an offence against the privileges of the House? But the House had the power of prosecuting all libels, either by itself or by the attorney-general; and it had the power of passing laws to prevent or to punish the repetition of those libels. But, to cull out one of the many seditious libellers, and to be satisfied with passing bills respecting the rest, was a measure which did not become the justice of that House. The privileges of the House had been intended, as the hon. baronet had truly said, to protect members against violations of justice which might be committed by the officers of the crown. But cases of privilege were now little else than complaints of libels in newspapers. Extraordinary cases might call for the notice of the House; but they ought never to be noticed unless they should be such as the House could not pass over. The passage now brought forward had appeared in a publication out of doors, among many others at least as objectionable. To save time, he would move as an amendment, that Robert Stoddart be called to the bar on the 18th of January next.

Mr. Douglas Kinnaird said, that as only an isolated passage had been read from the pamphlet, doubts might reasonably arise in the minds of hon. members, who had not read the tract from which it had been taken, as to whether it was or was not libellous [A laugh]. Having read the whole of the pamphlet himself, he should take the liberty of stating, that he was satisfied in his own mind, that, looking at the entire context of the passage complained of, any conclusion might be drawn from it, rather than that come to by the hon. member on the floor; namely, that it was meant as an excitement to rebellion, and that its object was, to instigate the people to pull out the members by the ears, lock up their doors, and fling the key of the House into the Thames. What was the real meaning of the passage? That fear of the laws, and not love, restrained the people. It was a proposition that might be stated of any law that was not mild, but coercive. That was his impression. If that impression—namely, that fear, not love, restrained the people—was not supported by reasons and arguments, it was only an unfounded conclusion, not a libel.

Lord Nugent begged to say three words in explanation of the vote he meant to give. He should vote for the original motion. He concurred so far with his noble friend behind him, as to think that his majesty's ministers had criminally neglected their duty, in not instructing the attorney-general to prosecute other libels perhaps more atrocious. But that was no reason why he should not vote for the present motion, when he saw the privileges of the House so outrageously attacked in the face of the country. The hon. member who had last night mentioned this publication had ascribed it to a particular individual. He would not do so, but he would say that it bore internal proofs, in its style and mode of reasoning, that it proceeded from the pen of a person who was a worthy victim for the House to strike. The motion was not for committing to the custody of the sergeant at arms, or to Newgate. The spirit of the object was, after ascertaining from the printer who the author was, to direct the attorney-general to lay both the law and the facts before a jury of the country. He was not willing to give up the privileges of the House, connected, as he believed them to be, with the rights and liberties of the people. These were not times in which those privileges ought to be surrendered or qualified. He was aware of the obloquy and misrepresentation to which he should be exposed by his conduct on this occasion; but if he were not prepared to suffer obloquy and misrepresentation in the discharge of his duty, he was not qualified to do that duty. So long as they were there, in a House constituted as that was—he would that some of them were there on other terms—but so long as they were there, they must support their dignity and their privileges.

Mr. Courtenay said, that his sole object at present was, to call the publisher to the bar. He did not pledge himself afterwards to any particular line of conduct,

Mr. Wilberforce said, that although he had been many years a member of that House, he was not well acquainted with privileges or precedents, but he was led by instinctive feelings to join in censuring what attacked the substance of dignity and authority in parliament. The passage now read appeared to him a gross and scandalous libel, not only against the privileges, but against the existence of the House. He had seldom been more surprised than when he heard an hon. member say that any person might doubt whether this passage was a libel or not. It was the nature of the moral faculty, as well as of our natural feeling, to doubt the existence of a weaker ingredient, when accustomed to a stronger ingredient. It might be so with the hon. member, who was perhaps so much accustomed to strong libels, that he doubted whether this was a libel. The hon. member had explained his meaning by saying, that it was only an assertion that fear restrained the people more than love. Mr. Hume, in one of his celebrated essays, had remarked, that "all government was founded on opinion, opinion of interest or opinion of right." It would have been absurd to suppose that Mr. Hume should have been called to the bar of the House for that expression. But all depended on the terms used, and the tendency of the language. If it were said, that the passage contained nothing but the truth, it must at least be admitted that the truth had been very boldly expressed. The expression was, that the members of that House might, on a certain supposition, be dragged out by the ears. He could not conceive a more plain and open incitement, couched in grosser language; he could imagine no words more likely to produce the effect of carrying the doctrine which they imported into execution. A disposition to insult the House was too easily infused, and if it was treated with mildness, would only gain strength and become inveterate. He had, indeed, heard of a story which represented that a threat to kick a person down stairs ought to be understood only as a hint of disapprobation. It certainly appeared to him, that there were strong grounds for the House animadverting on this subject, though he was by no means decided as to the most eligible course of proceeding. It evidently was not a case with regard to which the House ought to recede from the vindication of its dignity: for no distinction in favour of this particular case could, he thought, be made out. The hon. member had, in fact, conceded that the publication was libellous. Now, what difference was there between a prosecution, and a carrying of the law into effect? Still it was uncertain which was the most expedient mode by which the House ought to maintain its authority, and assert those privileges which were not established for its own sake, but for the interests of those whom it represented. But wherever it was possible consistently with those privileges, he deemed it more advisable to address the Crown, praying that it would direct the attorney-general to institute a prosecution. The only question with him was, whether this case was within that general rule, or whether it did not call upon the House to mark its displeasure, by the exertion of its own powers. He was sure that he was influenced by no personal feelings in what he now said; and he was equally sure that a great part of the people took an interest in the credit of that House. This was at least the impression made on his mind by all he had seen and heard; and he recollected that at the time when he represented the county of York, and was known to entertain sentiments favourable to a moderate reform, the majority of his constituents differed from him on that subject. They did not, however, wish him to defer implicitly to their opinions; for they knew that he would not be a slave; no, not even to the county of York. No doubt could exist in his mind upon this point—that it was the duty of the House to vindicate itself from contumely and outrage. He was willing to distinguish between loose and unguarded expressions, and those which appeared to convey an advised and deliberate meaning. He would not refer to the name of the supposed author; but when he heard it said that the context might lead to another construction of the passage, he could not help observing, that the hon. member who urged this consideration would hardly have been so wanting to the defence which he undertook, as not to read that context, if he thought it would really assist his argument. His not doing so was, in fact, a presumption against him. It gave him sincere regret to find language of the same kind addressed almost every day to those who had no means of avoiding the delusion, and principles disseminated which would tend to the overthrow of all that was venerable amongst us. They who so addressed themselves to the public had no intention of becoming martyrs to their own doctrines: their love of liberty was not so ardent as to expose them to any serious peril; but, whilst they kept themselves within the boundaries of safety, they inflamed and incited others to give a loose to the worst of passions, exhibiting all that was contemptible for baseness, with all that was odious for wickedness, and trifling with the security as well as the greatness and renown of their country.

Mr. Douglas Kinnaird said, that the reason he had abstained from reading any part of the pamphlet was, because he would not presume to read the whole of it to the House, without which a fair judgment of its object could not be formed. The passage which had made such an impression on the House was only an incidental one, not contributing to the author's main or professed object. He did not profess to institute an express examination into the state of the House of Commons, but only entitled his pamphlet "A Trifling Mistake," &c.—The hon. member was prevented from continuing by cries of "Spoke, spoke!"

Mr. Hume rose, amidst continued calls of "question!" and symptoms of impatience. He said, he was sorry to differ from many hon. members as to the best mode of proceeding in this case. In the case of the complaint made last session, by the right hon. the president of the board of control against an individual for misrepresentation, the House passed a resolution declaratory of the offence, before they called the printer to the bar. He was aware that he was addressing an impatient House, and should therefore merely add, that he thought the course which the House seemed disposed to pursue was erroneous.

Mr. Wynn was perfectly ready to agree to the original resolution, and at once to state his opinion that the language in question was a gross and glaring libel, and a direct incitement to the use of violence against the House. He should not follow the hon. baronet through all that reasoning which consisted in a denial of their privileges, and the reiteration of an argument which the hon. baronet had already carried into the courts below, and subsequently into the other House of parliament. The House of Lords had confirmed those privileges though he did not mean to admit that they had not before stood on ground sufficiently firm. With regard to the relation of this passage to the context, he must say, that having read the pamphlet, he thought the farther that context was examined, the more necessary would it appear that the dignity of the House and the authority of the law should be vindicated in this instance. He would now merely read part of the concluding passage, which seemed to him to contain an open incitement to violence and to a resistance of the law.—The hon. member then read the following extract from page 52:—"My determination, for one, is fixed: if those who have the power attempt to deprive me of the inalienable right of meeting my fellow countrymen, by letting loose a soldier at me, without the warning of an act of parliament, I will resist him if I can; if they do give me the warning of an act of parliament, I will break it if I can. I consider the object exactly the same, the injustice equally calling for resistance; the mere additional ceremony is not worth the statute-paper; the time, the means, the occasion, must of course make part of the prudential question, which every man must determine for himself, and concerning which I do not wish to be his prompter." Could any man of common sense doubt the import and meaning of this passage? He must confess he could not concur with the argument in favour of a prosecution. Upon this subject he adhered to the principle maintained both by Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke, whom he regarded as the greatest authorities on all points of constitutional law—that the House lowered its tone, and weakened its authority, whenever it sought assistance from other courts. As to the objection, of the House acting both as accuser and judge, what was there strange in that? Was not every court invested with an authority to issue process, and if not obeyed, to treat it as a contempt? Had they not power to compel a party in such a case to answer interrogatories? and was a power exercised by all the minor courts in the kingdom to be denied to the supreme court of parliament? He knew that some persons thought it better to let such offences pass unnoticed; but, for his own part, he doubted the policy of thus manifesting their contempt. If the courts of law were charged with injustice and partiality, or if the judges were openly accused of acting with no other motive than that of currying favour with the court, would not the libellers be punished? Could their functions be discharged, or their authority maintained, if such attacks were suffered to be made with impunity? Why, then, should the privileges of that House, which were held on behalf of the people, be alone subjected to insult and invasion? The House must recollect the many errors and atrocities to which a breach of their privileges had led. How often had parliament been misled by giving way to an influence out of doors. The attainder of lord Strafford was procured by means of placards distributed about the streets. He agreed that they ought now to put out of view the individual reputed to be the author. But his supposed rank and situation might become important matters to be considered. The offence had, it was clear, not been committed unadvisedly, and the circumstances to which he had just referred constituted a strong ground for separating this from the great majority of such cases.

Lord Nugent observed, that he had been misconceived by his hon. relation who had just sat down. What he had said was, that he did not think it always expedient to pursue the same course, and that there might be cases in which the House might act incautiously in trusting to the Crown for directing a prosecution.

The question was then put, and the original resolution being carried, Robert Stodart was ordered to be in attendance on Monday next.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] Lord Castlereagh having moved the order of the day for the second reading of this bill,

Mr. Tierney said, he had no intention whatever to provoke a debate in the present stage of the measure. His objection was not so much to the principle of the bill, which was local and temporary, as to certain provisions of it. Therefore he thought it most advisable to let it pass the second reading and go into the committee, where perhaps the amendments might be adopted, which he thought requisite. If not, there were two subsequent stages at which it might be opposed. A clause to which he most strongly objected was one empowering one justice, on any information, to grant his warrant for entering into the House of any man by night.

Mr. Bennet hoped the whole of the county of Northumberland would not be put under the operation of the bill. All its purposes would be answered by making it act on certain parts thereof.

Mr. Lambton hoped the noble lord would feel it his duty to state to the House whether he had made the inquiry he promised, in consequence of what had passed in the House last night. He now again asked the noble lord whether he had seen any communication from the deputy-lieutenant of the county of Durham to any of his colleagues, containing a representation at the end of the peaceable state of the county?

Lord Castlereagh said, he had read the communication referred to by the hon. member. But the evidence it afforded did not go the length that the hon. member seemed to imagine. It merely stated that the county was not in a state of tumult at that time, without venturing to assert that tranquillity would be permanent. Now, it had never been alleged, that the county was in a state of actual tumult, but only in such a state as might lead to tumult. The letter was written to lord Sidmouth, in consequence of an application to certain magistrates to call out the yeomanry, by the commanding officer at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, he considering an additional military force necessary for the security of the county. The letter conveyed intelligence of this application, and added what he had before mentioned, as the opinion of the writer. The South Tyne corps had in fact been put on duty in consequence of the commanding officer's wish. This was the only document he had seen.

Mr. Wharton declared that his information was of the most alarming kind. A system of communication had been established throughout extensive districts in Durham and Yorkshire, and the spirit of disaffection was on the point of exhibiting itself in armed force. The colliers and pit-men were thoroughly organized, and assembled every day in parties of twenty, their leaders assembling every week. A letter which he had received from a gentleman in that part of the country, and one not easily alarmed, stated, that without some commanding military force, there was an end to all security—that arms were provided, and the landed property already parcelled out [a laugh]. An hon. member opposite might be more interested than he was aware of, and if he knew the source of this information as well as he did, would come to the same judgment. At many of these meetings reform was, indeed, the professed object, but not any reform of that House, even upon the wild scheme of universal suffrage. The reform contemplated, and for which they seemed to entertain an enthusiastic desire, was a transfer of property from those who now enjoyed it to those who did not.

Mr. Lambton said, that were it not for the disagreeable nature of the subject, he should have been extremely amused at some of the observations of the hon. gentleman, but the subject was too serious for mirth. Yet he thought it a little extraordinary that a gentleman who had not been for some years in the county of Durham, and who, when he did reside there, lived some miles distant from the people against whom he had preferred such heavy charges, should come down to the House and make assertions concerning persons exactly opposite to what he (Mr. L.) had stated, who lived amongst them, and had caused the most diligent inquiry to be made into their conduct. He then described the contents of a letter he had received from a person who had a few days before been present at a meeting of owners of coal-mines, where the fact of the colliers having arms happened to be discussed, but not one among them could affirm the fact of his own knowledge. He stated, however, that the colliers had been pretty generally classed, but that that practice was very much abating, and that it had prevailed among the colliers only, and not among the smiths, or any other description of workmen. He never recollected any year in which the men were more anxious to work—he did not remember one idle day among them, but that of the meeting at Newcastle. He had also seen a gentleman from one of the villages to which he had before alluded, who represented every thing there as perfectly quiet. This intelligence had been confirmed by another gentleman from that county, with whom he had recently had a conversation. He had informed him, that many of the persons classed as radicals had left the classes. An hon. friend had suggested that he ought to explain what that classing meant. It only implied, that persons formed themselves into parties of twenty, who chose a leader to read a newspaper to them, purchased in common. He could not allow the fact of classification to be any evidence against these persons; he believed in his heart it was done for no other purpose but that of reform, and not to pass Agrarian laws; and that they were as quiet and peaceably disposed as any description of his majesty's subjects. Accordingly, he still adhered to his intention of proposing in the committee, that the county of Durham should not be within the operation of the act. He assured the noble lord, that in making these inquiries, he had been actuated solely by a desire of dissipating what he conceived a false alarm.

Lord Milton said, he believed there was no connexion whatever between the colliers in Northumberland and those in Durham. He lamented extremely, that a bill like the present should be proposed to be continued for two or three years, when it was in fact totally uncalled for by the state of the country.

Mr. H. Clive mentioned a report from the mayor of Newcastle, which was in the Secretary of state's office for home affairs. It contained the depositions of four respectable individuals, on the subject of the meeting near that place on the 12th October. The hon. gentleman read the substance of three of these depositions. The first stated, that the deponent had no doubt but that the parties marching to the meeting were secretly armed; the second, that the radicals were armed with pikes; and the third, that the deponent believed that upwards of 1,000 had arms in their pockets.

Lord Castlereagh rose merely to mention a matter to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lambton), not that the statements of the hon. gentleman would, even if accurate, alter his view of the expediency of the extended measure; but he wished the hon. gentleman to inquire into the truth of the fact which had been stated to him last night, namely, that the agent of the hon. gentleman had discharged from his mines the leaders of these classes. If this was the case, it was curious that so excellent a reformer as the hon. gentleman should have so indifferent an opinion of these reformers as not to trust them even in his coal-mines.

Mr. Lambton rose, with considerable warmth, to repel the conjunction of his name with radical reformers. He had often been attacked for his opposition to their principles, and it was too much for gentlemen who had never ventured to meet them face to face, to taunt him in this way with a sympathy in their doctrines.

Lord Castlereagh, with much good temper, assured the hon. gentleman that he called him an excellent reformer in a constitutional sense, and never meant to class him with the radicals. He knew he was not a radical, for he had read the hon. gentleman's speech, delivered at the Newcastle meeting, with all that open manliness which marked his conduct in every other respect. He only thought the hon. gentleman was more disposed to place confidence in those persons than he should be, and mentioned the subject entirely that the hon. gentleman, if not acquainted with it, should ascertain whether his agent had thought so ill of the leading reformers as to dismiss them from his service.

Mr. Lambton said, the noble lord having, with that conciliating manner which no one knew better how to display, disclaimed the intention of imputing those violent principles to him, he of course could not for a moment retain the idea that any thing personal was meant. If his agent had dismissed these men, he was not implicated; and, to be good for any thing, it must be shown that they were discharged on account of their political principles, and for no other cause.

Sir C. Monck said, he hoped the noble lord, when the bill was considered in the committee, would consent to limit the operation of the bill to three wards in the county of Northumberland, they being the only parts of that county where symptoms of disturbance had manifested themselves.

The bill was then read a second time.

MISDEMEANORS BILL.] The Lord Chancellor having moved the order of the day, the bill for preventing delay in the administration of justice in cases of Misdemeanor was read a third time. His lordship then observed, with reference to what had been said on the subject of informations ex-officio, that he had framed a clause which he intended to move, to add to the bill. In criminal cases, at the suit of a private prosecutor, the term allowed to the latter was twelve months, and if he did not bring the case on to trial within that period, the defendant might carry down the record by proviso, and tender himself for trial; he had thought it right to apply the same rule as to time, to informations ex-officio filed by the attorney general, and to informations and indictments in which the attorney-general was the prosecutor; and he proposed to enact, that in every case of such prosecution, where the defendant had pleaded not guilty, and the attorney general did not, within a year, bring on the case for trial, the defendant might give a notice of twenty days to the attorney-general of his intention to apply to the court either to order a trial, or to set aside the prosecution. Either the Court could then make an order, or the period of the notice would give the attorney-general an opportunity of entering a noli prosequi.

Lord Holland hoped the House would excuse him if he should rise to make his personal acknowledgments to the noble and learned lord, for the clause which he had submitted to their consideration. The clause went as far as any thing which he could suggest, and carried its object into effect in a much better manner. He could not say that the clause had indeed done all which he could have desired, but it did much more than he had ever expected. This and another clause which the noble and learned lord had introduced, had effected an improvement so material in the bill, that he did not deny that the measure would operate a very considerable improvement in the law of the country. He therefore should for one say, "content" to the motion for passing the bill.

The clause was then read, and the bill passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE—COMPLAINT AGAINST A PAMPHLET INTITLED "A TRIFLING MISTAKE," &c.] Mr. Courtenay having moved the order of the day, the House proceeded to take into consideration the complaint, which upon Friday, was made to the House of a printed pamphlet, intituled, A "Trifling Mistake in Lord Erskine's recent Preface."

(VOL. XLI.)

Mr. Ellice immediately rose, and said, that in order to save the time of the House, and that no unmerited punishment might fall upon the publisher of the pamphlet in question, he had been instructed by its author to avow his name, and to add, that he would readily obey any order of the House requiring his attendance. The author was a particular friend of his, and his name was John Cam Hobhouse.

Mr. Courtenay did not wish to give unnecessary trouble, but he apprehended that what had already occurred on a former day would impose upon the House the necessity of having the publisher brought to the bar: an order had been made for the attendance of Robert Stodart, and he felt it right, therefore, to move that he be examined, although unquestionably what had fallen from the hon. gentleman, afforded the House sufficient knowledge of the author of the libel.

The order of the day was then read, and the Speaker inquired whether Robert Stodart was in attendance. The Serjeant at Arms reported in the affirmative, and it was ordered that he should be called in. He was put to the bar accordingly, and interrogated by the Speaker.

What is your name?—Robert Stodart.

Look at that pamphlet, and state whether it was published by you?—It was.

Do you know the author?—I do.

State at length the names of Mr. Hobhouse; his christian as well as surname.—John Cam Hobhouse.—The witness was then ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Courtenay observed, that after what had passed, it was undoubtedly not consistent with his view of the case to visit the printer or publisher of the libel with any punishment. It was the duty of the House to take notice of such a publication, and the gentleman who was the author of it had avowed himself. He would move, therefore, in the first instance, that Robert Stodart be discharged, and next, that Mr. John Cam Hobhouse be ordered to attend.

Mr. Ellice said, that Mr. Hobhouse was not in town at the present moment; he was in the country with his father, who was ill, but he would readily attend if an order were made out for that purpose: he would be able to attend to-morrow.

Mr. Courtenay was desirous that every reasonable accommodation should be afforded to the individual: he had been made acquainted with the domestic call made upon Mr. Hobhouse, and it would be sufficient if he could attend to-morrow. He moved accordingly to that effect.

Mr. Tierney wished the hon. member just to state the purpose he had in view in requiring the attendance of Mr. Hobhouse.

The Speaker apprehended that the hon. mover was mistaken in the situation in which the publisher was placed: Robert Stodart was not in custody, as he had only been ordered to attend the House to-day. As to the necessity of the attendance of Mr. Hobhouse himself, if it had depended merely upon the information of the publisher, it would be fit, according to all the precedents, that Mr. Hobhouse himself should be called before the House, that he might, if he were able, disprove the assertion, and show that he was not the author of the libel. Here, however, a declaration had been made through an hon. member by Mr. Hobhouse, admitting that he was the author, and it seemed therefore unnecessary that he should be called upon to attend at the bar. Such was the ordinary course of proceeding; but, in the particular case, the House would judge for itself.

Mr. Courtenay thanked the chair for the information supplied. As it now appeared, from the highest authority, that after an avowal of the author, such as had been made, it was not necessary that the House should order his attendance; the course he had to pursue was extremely plain and simple. He would, therefore, advert very shortly to the nature of the offence that had been committed, and to the manner in which he conceived it ought to be visited. He hoped the view he had taken of the subject would meet with the general feeling and concurrence of the House. He had no difficulty in stating, that it had been a matter of very anxious consideration with him how to make up his mind as to the particular mode in which the House ought to punish an offence of this kind. He could assure the House, that he had consulted with his hon. friend opposite (Mr. Wynn), and after the fullest inquiry, he was persuaded, that the question would not be met properly if the House did not proceed to take the punishment into its own hands, by ordering the commitment of the offender. He would not waste the time of the House by arguing upon the existence of the right of commitment, which all honourable members, with a single exception, admitted [Hear.] He would, however, for his own satisfaction, and perhaps for the satisfaction of the House, or of those members who had not given the subject the same degree of attention that he had bestowed upon it, read a single passage from the report of a committee appointed to examine the question, and the result of whose labours was most conclusive: the report was terminated as follows:—"This power is in truth part of the fundamental law of parliament: the law of parliament is the law of the land—part of the lex terræ mentioned in Magna Charta, where it is declared that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned but by the judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land, and is as much within the meaning of those words, the law of the land, as the universally acknowledged power of commitment for contempt by courts of justice in Westminster-hall, which courts have a summary power of punishing the offender. Your committee are, therefore, of opinion, that this power is founded on the clearest principles of right, is proved by immemorial usage, and is recognized and sanctioned by the highest legal authorities; that it grew up with our constitution; that it is established and confirmed as clearly and incontrovertibly as any part of the law of the land, and is one of the most important safe-guards of the rights and liberties of the people." This decision of the committee had been confirmed by the opinions of individuals entitled to the utmost weight, and who were some of the firmest friends of the liberty of the press, and of the constitutional rights of the people. He would not fatigue the House by going through them, but he would just advert to the manner in which Mr. Fox had expressed himself on this subject: he had said that it never could be intended that an offender should escape with impunity; and with regard to ordering a prosecution to be commenced by the attorney-general, his words were—"It does not appear to me that this is the just mode of proceeding in cases of this nature: courts of justice have never, or at least very seldom, adopted the practice of ordering prosecutions for contempt; and, therefore, if a libel be written against the House of Commons, the author ought more properly to be punished by the House; and it is by no means advisable to send it to such a mode of trial as has been alluded to." Mr. Fox was quite clear that the offence resembled contempts of court; and that, as such, it ought to be punished by the House. It was impossible that the case on which the above opinion was given, or, indeed, any that could be pointed out in the history of parliament could be so strong as that which was under consideration: it was not a constructive, but an actual contempt of the House; and no doubt, he believed, would be entertained of the absolute necessity of committing the offender. As to libels attacking the government of the country, and incidentally touching either branch of the legislature, he could make great allowance for the irritated feelings of distressed mechanics suffering under temporary pressure; he could make great allowance for the editor of a daily paper, who in the hurry of business had allowed a paragraph to appear to which, in his cooler moments he would be loth to give publicity; but he could hardly make any allowance for the deliberate act of an individual, who had ventured to give currency and general circulation to sentiments like those contained in the pamphlet now before the House, and who could scarcely, without the greatest remorse, he should suppose, have contemplated the consequences that might have followed the incitement he had thus given to the ignorant. [Hear.] He did not wish to press the case at all beyond what the House might fairly think it would bear; for his object only was to carry into effect the general feeling of those who heard him. If the majority of honourable members differed from him, which he did not believe, as to the course of punishment he ought to suggest, he would willingly acquiesce in any amendment. He had stated his own view of the question, as he conceived his duty required, and he should conclude, in order to lay a foundation for future proceedings, by calling upon the House to pass a resolution, expressive of the character which, in his opinion, belonged to the publication he had brought before it. He then moved "that the said pamphlet is a scandalous libel, containing matter calculated to inflame the people into acts of violence against the legislature, and against this House in particular; and that it is a high contempt of the privileges and constitutional authority of the House."

The question was then put upon the resolution, and it was carried, the voice of Sir F. Burdett only being heard in the negative. Mr. Courtenay also moved, "That John Cam Hobhouse, esq., having acknowledged himself to be the author of the said pamphlet, has been guilty of an high contempt of the privileges and of the constitutional authority of the House."—This resolution was carried as the former, Sir F. Burdett persisting in his dissent.

Mr. Courtenay then observed, that some particular circumstances had been stated to him, that made it desirable at the present moment not to decide upon the ultimate place of punishment, whether it should or should not be Newgate. He apprehended that the proper motion would now be, that Mr. Hobhouse be committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, and it could subsequently be determined whether it would be fit to send him to Newgate or elsewhere.

Mr. Brougham said, that before the question was put, he wished to be informed of the necessity under the circumstances for the previous and intermediate punishment. The hon. gentleman was no doubt aware of the consequences of such a proceeding, namely, that the individual must be brought to the bar, besides being exposed to the inconvenience of having heavy fees to pay. At any rate, the circumstances mentioned by his hon. friend (Mr. Ellice) would be enough to warrant the House in sending Mr. Hobhouse to Newgate to-morrow, or to whatever other place of confinement the House might think expedient. It had been stated by the hon. member for Coventry, that the individual in question had left town to perform an office of filial piety—to visit his father, who was in a dangerous state of health, as it was of consequence that he should see him before he submitted to the punishment the House might determine to inflict. He did not mean to say any thing against the mode of proceeding recommended; on the contrary, it was the only way in which the House could properly proceed on a question of this kind [Hear, hear!]. For one, he should always protest against that anomalous process of sending a question of parliamentary privilege to be tried by any other court than itself [Hear, hear!]. He was decidedly in favour of the more immediate and direct course; and however grave the offence might be, the House he was sure would not inflict a double punishment, or at-except to deprive the person accused of the means of visiting and conferring with his father.

Mr. Courtenay immediately rose and stated, that he had never been more surprised than by what he had just heard.—Unquestionably he had been prepared to make the ordinary and regular motion for the commitment of Mr. Hobhouse to Newgate; but an hon. friend of his and of Mr. Hobhouse (Mr. Ellice), had previously stated some circumstances which made him particularly wish that the previous and intermediate course, now reprobated, should be pursued for the convenience of the offender. In return for this anxiety to accommodate, he had been treated with the tirade just delivered, imputing to him an intention to aggravate the punishment: he was convinced that the House would acquit him of any such purpose. [Hear!]. He was now left, therefore, without any alternative; he must make his first motion for commitment to Newgate; though if any amendment were offered for changing the place of confinement, he should be happy to acquiesce on the statement of sufficient grounds. He then moved, "That John Cam Hobhouse, esq., be for his said offence, committed to his majesty's gaol of Newgate."

Mr. Brougham added, in explanation, that he found it difficult to conceive how any other man but the hon. member opposite, and the hon. gentleman who had made the suggestion, could think that it would be Mr. Hobhouse's wish to be taken into custody forthwith, that he might thus be exposed to two sorts of punishment.—He was not to be blamed for supposing that it must be the wish of the party accused that the ordinary course should be adopted, though if Mr. Hobhouse really was desirous of being taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, he could have no possible objection.

Mr. Ellice observed, that before he came down to the House he had seen Mr. Hobhouse, who was anxious to make a frank avowal that he was the author of the pamphlet, both to save the time of the House and to prevent the punishment of any other person but himself. Knowing pretty accurately what the consequences of such an acknowledgment would be, he had felt it his duty, feeling a very warm friendship for Mr. Hobhouse, to inquire into the state of the place where it was most likely it would be ordered that the offender should be confined, and he found that it would be almost impossible for Mr. Hobhouse to be received in Newgate, unless he were to be put into the same room with a convicted felon. The House would, therefore, see his reason for wishing that in the first instance Mr. Hobhouse should be placed in the charge of the serjeant-at-arms. He did not suppose that on this account he would be exposed to any additional punishment, by fine or fees; and it was at his instance that the hon. member had moved for the intermediate commitment which would require the attendance of Mr. Hobhouse to-morrow. If blame was imputable to any body, he must certainly remove it from the shoulders of the hon. member who had made the motion.

Mr. Wynn could not help thinking that some difficulty might arise in point of regularity of proceeding; he did not see how the motion, that Mr. Hobhouse be sent to Newgate in the first instance, could be executed without a commitment to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms.—The only persons who could take him were the serjeant-at-arms or his deputy, who were the officers of the House. There were, undoubtedly, cases where the order of commitment to the serjeant-at-arms was not preceded by an order of commitment to Newgate, but then the party had been summoned to appear at the bar, and was actually in the possession of the House. Unless a previous motion for commitment to the serjeant were made, he did not see how Mr. Hobhouse was to get to Newgate, unless, which was not to be expected, he should voluntarily go to the keeper of the prison, requiring to be put into a place of security. He therefore thought that the original motion was the proper one; but he did not on that ground apprehend that the necessary consequence would be that he should be brought to the bar. The course would be that at the next, or the next sitting but one, the serjeant at arms should report that he had taken Mr. Hobhouse into custody, and then would follow an order for his commitment to Newgate. Of this, repeated instances might be pointed out; but one of the most recent was that of general Clavering, who had been guilty of prevarication, and the serjeant was directed to take him into custody. The serjeant reported that he had obeyed the order, and a vote was passed immediately that he should be committed to Newgate.

The Speaker thought it necessary to say a few words in point of form. In many instances where the ulterior destination had been Newgate, a previous order had been made for committing the offender to the custody of the serjeant: other cases could be shown where a direct order had been given that the party be committed to Newgate. He apprehended that the difficulty suggested was not the reason which led to the double motion; the reason was, where the individual so ordered to be taken was not known, or where it could not be ascertained whether he could be found—for it was first necessary to find him, before the order could be executed: if he were known, and his address, no such difficulty could arise, and the order for sending him to Newgate was followed up by a direction to the speaker to issue his warrants, one of them to the serjeant-at-arms to take the offender, and the other to the gaoler of Newgate, or of any other person determined upon to receive him and detain him. Thus much he could assert with confidence, that instances enough could be found to support the regularity of the proceeding now suggested.

Sir C. Burrell observed, that the gaoler could have no power to take a prisoner unless delivered with a proper warrant.—It appeared that the gentleman must go and deliver himself up. [No, no.]

The Speaker interposed, and again explained what he had before stated regarding the issue of his two warrants. The warrants were entrusted to the serjeant-at-arms, as the officer of the House, and on delivery of one of them to the gaoler, any refusal to receive and detain would be treated by the House instantaneously as a gross contempt of its order.

Sir C. Burrell continued, that he was happy to have been set right, and he would make but one further observation. An hon. gentleman had stated, that he had visited Newgate, and found that Mr. Hobhouse, if confined there, must be placed with common felons. Would the House, then, commit the party to a gaol where he must be exposed to such a situation? [Hear!] In common kindness therefore, time for further consideration ought to be allowed; and for this purpose he would move as an amendment, "That Mr. Hobhouse be taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms."

The amendment having been seconded, the question was put upon it.

Mr. Courtenay said, that this amendment exactly brought back the question to what he had himself suggested. He had been actuated precisely by the same feeling that had influenced the hon. baronet, and it was his anxious desire not to subject Mr. Hobhouse to confinement in a place wholly unfit for the purpose the House had in view.

Sir C. Burrell added, that his object merely was to afford the House time to deliberate as to the most proper place of confinement.

Mr. Courtenay said, that if Mr. Hobhouse were first taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, that object would be accomplished, and he did not conceive that it would be any intermediate punishment.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, that the state of the gaol of Newgate was at present such that the House would not think it right to commit to it any gentleman of respectability for an offence of this kind. At present there were not less than 300 prisoners within the walls, and it was not possible to give Mr. Hobhouse a separate apartment. He had however no hesitation in saying, that accommodation might be afforded, although perhaps he was not exactly at liberty to say where, but in a situation which all the law-officers of the crown admitted was legally within the walls. Of course, time must be allowed to make the necessary arrangements, and at most, a day or two might be required for that purpose.

Mr. R. Martin, although he would be the last man to propose any aggravation of punishment, yet having attended when persons had been committed for similar offences, he saw no reason why the House should be more lenient or considerate of the individual now before it, unless it was because he was infinitely richer or better informed. If the House proceeded in the manner now suggested with Mr. Hobhouse, it might be imputed that it was afraid to deal with him as it had dealt with others. If the prison of Newgate was in the condition represented, was not that a reason for not sending thither other persons who had, notwithstanding, been committed to that prison? If Mr. Hobhouse, after having been confined there, should complain that his health was injured by the mode and place of imprisonment, that application ought to receive attention. He would infinitely rather adopt a resolution that the attorney-general should be directed to prosecute, than, in times like the present, proceed in the manner recommended, and for such unsatisfactory reasons as had been alleged.

Sir F. Burdett rose amidst cries of "Question," and proceeded to make some observations in support of the matter contained in the pamphlet, when he was interrupted by

The Speaker, who said, he was quite satisfied, that, on a little reflection, the hon. baronet would perceive the course he was taking was not the proper one, since it impeached the opinion of the House at large.

Sir F. Burdett said, the plain and intelligible mode was that which he wished to adopt—a mode that would enable him to express his opinion on the whole of the matter under consideration. The present, as it appeared to him, was an unusually hard case. In the first place, he did not think the House had given sufficient attention to the publication which they had been called on to vote a breach of their privileges. He had read the pamphlet since it had been taken notice of by the House, and, however gross the language might be—language which he certainly did not mean to defend—he denied that any such intention, as that which was imputed to him, existed in the mind of the writer, namely, the desire of exciting a strong popular feeling, which might break out into acts of force and violence against the members of that House. It was the opinion of the writer, and that opinion he had freely expressed, that this House did not possess legitimate authority; that it was not alone supported, as it should be, by the affection and respect of the people, but by means of practices the most corrupt and objectionable.

Lord Castlereagh rose to order. He put it to the Speaker, whether the hon. baronet could regularly proceed in this course of argument? He apprehended that it was not competent to the hon. baronet to state his sentiments on the nature of the publication. He might have discussed that question when the resolution defining the nature of the publication was before the House; but that period having gone by, the hon. baronet was not now at liberty to address himself to that part of the question. The point immediately under consideration was the place of commitment to which the author of the publication was to be sent; and, in discussing that question, the hon. baronet could not go into a general statement of the nature of the libel.

Mr. Brougham said, it was now undoubtedly too late for his hon. friend to go into the question of libel or no libel. He ought to have argued that question before, when the declaratory resolution was proposed. But it appeared to him, that though they had pronounced this publication to be a libel, still, when the question of the quantum of punishment came to be considered, it was competent for his hon. friend to urge every matter that went to the extenuation of that punishment. He must admit, on the one hand, that it was a libel; it was too late to assert the contrary, since the House had so decided; but, on the other hand, he was at liberty to say every thing short of that. His hon. friend stood in the situation of a person in a court of law speaking in mitigation of punishment, and advancing all the favourable topics which he could recollect.

Sir F. Burdett said, he was going to prove that the House had no right to decide in this case. It was evident, however, that there was no great inclination to hear him. This was the justice administered by Rhadamanthus—or rather worse: for Rhadamanthus punished first, and heard afterwards; but the House awarded punishment, and would not hear at all [Order, order!]. He objected entirely to the motion, which he did not the more approve of, because it had the sanction of the noble lord opposite. The punishment arising out of so strange and extraordinary a trial ought to be viewed with the most scrupulous jealousy, and the House ought to hear every thing in favour of the accused party. It was one very strong ground of extenuation, that other persons were suffered to go at large, and to commit with impunity breaches of the privileges of that House, without animadversion from any quarter whatsoever. In proof of this, he would read a passage from a newspaper which he held in his hand—a print connected with that part of the press which was more immediately under the control of government—which, he contended, presented a more unjust, a more mischievous, a more improper comment on the conduct of the members of that House, than any thing contained in the book which had been brought under their consideration. He held in his hand "The Morning Post" of Friday last, from which he would read an extract.

Mr. Wynn rose to order. He submitted whether it was not impossible, consistently with the usage of the House, to superadd, on one breach of privilege, another of a grosser character? When the breach of privilege which at present occupied the House was heard and disposed of, the hon. baronet might proceed to call their attention to any similar case. He objected to the reading of any newspaper for such a purpose as the hon. baronet had stated. It was, he apprehended, distinctly contrary to the orders and regulations of that House, to read, in mitigation of the sentence which that House was about to pronounce on one who had been convicted of a high breach of privilege, another breach of privilege of a more offensive nature. The newspaper, he contended, could not be read in that House for any other purpose but to complain of it as containing a breach of privilege.

Sir F. Burdett said, notwithstanding all that had fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman, he was not aware that he was out of order in the course he was pursuing. Considering different cases of this nature, it did appear to him that a very strong ground of extenuation was made out, when it was proved that impunity was extended to some, while punishment was awarded to others, for the like offence. He should be placed in a very awkward situation—his mouth would be completely stopped, if the House adopted the principle laid down by the hon. and learned gentleman. In that case, he should be placed in this predicament, that he could not read an extract from the paper to which he had alluded, because he did not mean to complain of any breach of privilege. Indeed, he held that the writing then under consideration was not a breach of the privilege of that House [Hear, hear!]. For the fair and necessary privileges and regulations of the House of Commons no man was more willing to stand up; but that which was complained of was a mere constructive breach of privilege. Interrupting the proceedings of that House, interfering with its officers, or preventing the execution of a process emanating from it—these he considered breaches of privilege; but the present was a wholly different question. He should now proceed to read an extract from "The Morning Post," which was couched in these terms:—"In the House of Commons last night, Mr. Bennett brought forward his promised motion, ostensibly for an inquiry into the present state of the manufacturing districts, but really for the promotion of party and mischievous views."

Mr. Bankes rose to order. He submitted that it was impossible for the hon. baronet or any other gentleman, to be allowed to read a paper of that kind within the walls of the House of Commons.

The Speaker and Mr. Brougham rose at the same moment, and the latter gentleman seeming determined to deliver his sentiments, the Speaker gave way.

Mr. Brougham said, they all knew that no individual bowed to the sentiments delivered from the chair with greater reverence, on this and every other important and delicate question, than he did. He could not, however, so far abdicate his functions, as a member of that House, as not to throw out what occurred to him, on this occasion, before that decision was pronounced, which, coming from the chair, would of course be final. He meant no disrespect when he said, that, in his opinion, the hon. and learned gentleman had been a little hasty in forming his judgment on this question. It had always been allowed to introduce the notoriety of publications of this nature as a proper topic to be advanced in extenuation of punishment. As a proof of this, he called on the House to look to the case of Mr. Reeves; but more particularly to examine the view which Mr. Pitt took of another breach of privilege, which was one of the latest that occurred before the present administration came into power. It would be found, he believed, that the printer of a newspaper called "The True Briton" was brought to the bar of the House, for publishing reflections on the impeachment of lord Melville. The notoriety of the fact, that many observations of a similar kind had been published with impunity, was justly viewed by the House as matter of extenuation, and the printer was dismissed with a reprimand. If there was any impropriety in reading the passage to which the hon. baronet adverted, there was an equal impropriety in reading the pamphlet which had been complained of. Then, why did they not, on a former night, stop the hon. member for Yorkshire, when he read the pamphlet, without meaning to found any motion on it? He asked this, because there was no rule with respect to a newspaper that would not apply with equal force to a pamphlet. The hon. member for Yorkshire read a pamphlet without molestation. No one called him to order; no one exclaimed, "Down with your pamphlet?" and it was not till the reading was over, till the debate (a part of the matter of that pamphlet having been used as an argument in the course of it, and having, for aught he knew, influenced the decision which the House came to)—then, for the first time, was the hon. member for Yorkshire requested to inform the House, whether he intended to make that pamphlet the ground of complaint for a breach of privilege. No one stopped him, no one suggested the propriety of interrupting him, as he proceeded reading various extracts from the publication [Hear!]. It appeared to him, that what was justice and reason in one case, must also be justice and reason in another. With that feeling he could see no reason whatsoever for preventing the hon. baronet from reading the passage to which he wished to draw their attention.

Mr. Banks said, it was for the House to proceed according to its regular and established practice. He recollected, generally, the debate to which the hon. and learned member alluded, and, he believed the House decided not on any particular instance, such as the hon. baronet wished to introduce, but on the general notoriety of the fact, that libellous or disrespectful matter, treating that House with contempt, had been suffered to pass with impunity. If the hon. baronet pleased to take that line of argument, generally, he thought he had a right to do so. All that he and his learned friend objected to was the reading a paragraph out of a newspaper, the very first word of which constituted a breach of the privilege of that House. The hon. baronet could not do this unless he meant to found a complaint on it. The distinction was clear between proceeding in a general line of argument, and adverting to a particular paragraph, which, he repeated, could not be introduced except for the purpose of making a formal complaint.

The Speaker said, that the House would perhaps excuse him for endeavouring, under their judgment and correction, to state what occurred to him with respect to the two principles that had been alluded to, and the ordinary course of proceeding in debates of this nature. He took it to be quite clear, that the House having decided that an offence was committed, and that that offence was a breach of their privileges, it was too late now to advance any argument to disprove the correctness of the decision. But he thought it was equally clear, when the question before the House was the quan- tum of punishment with which the offence should be visited, that it was open to any hon. gentleman to state that which, in his opinion, might be adduced in favour of lightening the punishment. The House would, he believed, go thus far with him. But the House must be aware, that to say matter might be urged in extenuation, was a very wide expression, and it was desirable that such vague terms should be defined. What occurred to his mind with respect to reading any paper (for he confessed he saw no difference between quoting a pamphlet and a newspaper), was, that the reading of words stronger and more offensive than those which had been adjudged libel by the House, could not be done for the purpose of extenuation, but only where the person introducing them meant to advance them as a breach of privilege [Hear!]. He thought, if any honourable member brought forward that which he conceived to be a breach of privilege, he was bound to do so for the purpose of preferring a complaint, and not otherwise. He did not know whether he had made himself intelligible, but he would endeavour to explain his meaning fully. It did appear to him that the line of argument adopted by the hon. baronet would have stood in a very different situation, if it had been urged before the House had found the publication complained of to be a libel, and not subsequently to that decision; because it would have been open for him to have stated, that certain words, which he could produce, were stronger than those which had been brought under the consideration of the House; he might then go on to prove, that those stronger words did not constitute a libel, and consequently, that the weaker were not libellous. But the House having decided, it was not competent for any gentleman to argue that the publication was not a libel. Therefore, if this paragraph were read at all in extenuation, it could only be urged, as not being a libel, because if it were, no member could state it, unless he meant to make a complaint. If it were adduced as not libellous, it evidently would not bear on the question, because the House had already decided, that the publication to which their attention had been called, was a libel. If he were right in this position, he felt that the adducing any quotations, and stating them to contain libels of a grosser nature than that complained of, was liable to two objections—1st, because they would not be applicable to the point of libel or not libel, because that point had already been decided by the House; and next, they were not applicable generally, because non constat, if those quotations had been brought before the House, that they would be deemed libels. Having said this, he begged to observe, that it was matter of importance, for the character of the House, that hon. members should feel, individually, a desire not to stretch to any excess those privileges, which were given, not for the purpose of working injustice and injury, but in order to produce great public benefit.

Mr. Wynn wished to know, whether it was not ordained amongst the first orders of that House that no member whatsoever should be at liberty to read any printed paper, except with the permission of the House, unless he meant to make a complaint? If that was not amongst the orders of the House, he had only to state that he had heard it so laid down, and acquiesced in, by very competent authorities many years ago.

The Speaker said, he was very much mistaken if any thing that had fallen from him tended to invalidate the statement of the hon. and learned gentleman. But he certainly could not draw any distinction between one sort of publication and another. The order, as it was stated by the hon. and learned gentleman, was quite correct. But, in the ordinary course of debate, nothing was more common than to read extracts from papers as part of a speech. The practice and order of the House were perfectly consistent with each other. The practice was for general convenience; the order was to prevent it from being carried to abuse. The strict order, if he were called on for his opinion, did, he believed, prohibit the reading of extracts from any publication.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, in answer to what had fallen from Mr. Brougham, that the material difference between the proceeding adopted by him, and that pursued by the hon. baronet, appeared to be, that, though he (Mr. Wortley) did not found on the publication he quoted a complaint of a breach of the privileges of the House; he animadverted on it as an improper publication; whilst the hon. baronet stated as a reason for his quotation, that though the publication before the House was a libel, he could produce still greater libels which had not been punished. This, was contrary to the practice of the House.

(VOL. XLI.)

Sir F. Burdett said, he thought it was his duty to take the line he had done, although unsuccessfully. He perceived it was very useless to oppose the motion then before the House. He would not, therefore, trouble them farther on this occasion; but when at a future time the question came before them, whether this gentleman should or should not be committed to Newgate, he would then state his opinion at length.

The Speaker. That is the question now before the House.

Sir C. Burrell said, as it appeared that the sense of the House was against his amendment, he was unwilling to press it. [Cries of "No, no."]

The House then divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be left out, namely, "his majesty's gaol of Newgate," remain part of the question. For the motion, 198: Against it, 65; Majority, 133.

On our re-admission to the gallery, we found lord Nugent on his legs. He was suggesting the propriety of sending Mr. Hobhouse to some other prison, in consequence of what had been said with respect to the crowded state of Newgate.

The Speaker said, the question just decided in the affirmative was, whether particular words should stand part of the question or not? Amongst these, was found the word, "Newgate." As it had been decided that it should stand part of the question, it could not be altered by any amendment. An alteration could alone be effected by negating the whole motion. The main question which he had now to put was—"That John Cam Hobhouse, Esq., be for his said offence, committed to his majesty's gaol of Newgate."

This motion was agreed to without a division. Mr. Courtenay then moved, "That the Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly."—Agreed to.

SOUTHWARK PETITION RESPECTING THE MEASURES FOR PRESERVING PUBLIC TRANQUILLITY.] Mr. C. Calvert rose to present a petition against the coercive measures now in progress through parliament, from the inhabitant householders of the borough of Southwark. It was signed by 900 individuals out of 6,000, and would have received many more signatures if a longer time had been allowed. Indeed, many persons applied to.

sign it after it had been placed in his hands. Not having had an opportunity of delivering his sentiments on several late occasions, (a circumstance easily accounted for, when they considered that the House consisted of 658 members, some of whom were not content with speaking once on the same subject), he would now take the opportunity of expressing his opinion on recent events. He viewed with abhorrence the affair that took place at Manchester, and he thought the measures proposed by ministers were rigorous in the extreme, and at the same time unnecessary. If that meeting, large as it was said to be, could be dispersed in a few minutes; if a body of from 50,000 to 70,000 persons, as they had been described, were dispersed, under the existing laws, in a quarter of an hour, he would ask, where was the necessity for enacting severe measures? What was the course government ought to pursue? If he did not receive an answer, he would give an answer himself. They ought to act, not with vigour, but with clemency. A little more allowance ought to be made for the distresses of the manufacturers, all of whom ought not to be looked on as radical reformers.

Sir R. Wilson said, the petition was signed by a number of persons, who, whilst they were friends to peace and good order, were, at the same time, lovers of the law and constitution. Whatever sacrifices might be called for, they were determined to defend that constitution which gave to Lords and Commons their power, and also to the people the legitimate source of that power, their sacred and inalienable rights. The people saw, in the bills now before the House, a new revolution in the frame of government—powers calculated to abolish their rights, to endanger their safety, and to outrage the feelings, and even the decencies of society. They saw a code, possessing all the characteristics of that despotism which some persons thought necessary for the proper government of man, but which, he thanked God, never had prevailed, and he hoped never would prevail, in this country. They saw, in three of those measures, a spirit foreign to British legislation. In the Libel bill they perceived a determination, not to remove the reasons which gave rise to sedition, but to fix an enormous penalty on the vague and undefined offence of libel. In another bill, they saw a power to abolish the right of meeting when and where the people pleased, for the purpose of discussing their grievances. Lastly, they deplored those domiciliary visits, which no just plan of government ever tolerated, which formed the most atrocious features of the reign of terror, and which were never introduced into any country without causing the most melancholy effects. He trusted his hon. friend the member for Cork who would that night make his motion to exclude Ireland from the operation of the bill, would state some of the abuses which were perpetrated in that unhappy country when a similar bill was in force there. Heretofore, the maxim was "That an Englishman's house was his castle;" the elements might whistle round it—the elements might enter it—but the king could not, and dare not. What would be the fact, after the passing of this bill? On mere suspicion, an officer might force a man's bolts; he might break his rest, and expose every female in his family to the rude gaze, indecent violence, and brutal lust of nocturnal invaders. Whatever amendments might accompany this bill, he never would submit to have the peace of his family interrupted by such nocturnal violence. The petitioners hoped that ministers would be declared unworthy the confidence of the Prince Regent for their conduct; but, if that House gave them its confidence, they had two consolations; first, that the fetters which were forged for them would fret, chafe, and gall the people, so that they never would be reconciled to them; and next, that the effect must be a great and successful stand against the duration of such measures.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for the third reading of this bill.

Lord Archibald Hamilton said, it had not originally been his intention to address the House upon this subject, but as he was about to vote for this measure, and as he never gave a vote with so much reluctance, he was desirous of offering a few words in explanation. He was sure that it must be obvious to many honourable members, that he was not likely to entertain an opinion upon any great public question different from that of his honourable friends near him without painful sensations, and without the utmost diffidence. It gave him, indeed, sincere regret that this difference should occur, with regard to a point affecting the general liberties of the country. His own particular impression was formed, however, upon facts and circumstances which had come within his knowledge. The principle as to the subject's right to meet and discuss public grievances, he fully admitted; but it was the notorious abuse of this right, and the exercise of it in such a manner as to invade the rights of others, that made it necessary for the legislature to interfere and to bring that right itself into question. The vote, however, which he should give in support of this measure did not incline him to view with less regard all the other rights and liberties of the people. To him, indeed, it appeared that this very right itself would be more permanently upheld by a temporary suspension. He wished that the time of suspension might be short, and he had already voted for the period of three years rather than that of five; but he was convinced, that to suspend the right at this moment, and in the present state of men's minds, was the best guarantee that could be adopted for its future security. It was more particularly necessary, perhaps, in that part of the country with which he was connected. But he did not on this account acquiesce in those measures which were brought forward, or confide in those representations as to what had occurred in other places, and upon which representations alone these measures were defended by his majesty's ministers. He was sorry that the House had refused to inquire into the lamentable occurrences at Manchester, where, his opinion was, that the rights of the subject had been seriously invaded. After all the discussion which it had undergone, the question remained precisely where it was when parliament assembled. Whether the meeting at Manchester was or was not a legal meeting, might admit of controversy; but there could be no doubt as to the illegality of its dispersion. He did not therefore assent to any of the proceedings which the House had taken relative to that transaction and with respect to the late motion for an inquiry into the distress which now prevailed in the manufacturing districts, he conceived that the House would have done itself credit by acceding to it. For his own part he might fairly say, that he had given the motion his support without any reference to political or party questions. If he had seen more than his hon. friends to justify him in voting for some coercion, he had also, perhaps seen more of severe and grinding distress. Whilst he acted, therefore, on this occasion in opposition to the sentiments of those with whom he was accustomed to agree and to co-operate, he wished it to be understood that it arose from no general difference of opinion, nor from any approbation of the general conduct of his majesty's ministers. If the influence of his hon. friends over his mind could have induced him to sacrifice his own view of this subject, still it would have been due to the county which he had the honour to represent, to state that its opinion was widely different. His principal object in now rising was, to guard himself from being implicated by any of those suppositions to which he had alluded, and to state the peculiar ground on which he voted for the present bill. He was sensible of the various objections to which it was liable, but in the actual state of the manufacturing districts, he could see no alternative.

Mr. Hutchinson said, he could not, with the noble lord who had just sat down, consider it to be his duty to support the bill before the House. His noble friend, no doubt, acted from the best motives; it was impossible from his high character to doubt the rectitude of his intention; but having taken quite a different view of the question, he had no hesitation in opposing the third reading of this obnoxious bill, with the intention, should he fail in preventing this, of moving the clause as to the exemption, of Ireland.—This bill he considered as forming the main pillar of that code of pains, penalties, and coercion, which the noble secretary for foreign affairs and his colleagues now introduced, in direct hostility to the whole system of the British constitution, though in direct accordance with the plan formed by ministers for a long series of years, which had in view the destruction of the liberties of mankind. It was in order to register his abhorrence of this system of tyranny, that he was urged to rise on the present occasion. The hostile disposition of the noble lord and his colleagues to the first principles of freedom had been amply demonstrated in other countries, and what they had attempted, and in some cases succeeded in, abroad they were now resolved to establish at home. They and those whose political principles it had been their boast implicitly to follow, had, with a very short interruption, governed the empire for upwards of half a century, in which period, deaf to the voice of reason, they had attempted to enslave the western hemisphere happily without success—had possessed themselves of the dominions of all the sovereigns of India presuming to dictate there to 100 millions of people.—They had erased Ireland from among the nations of the earth, and wherever they had found a people any where struggling for liberty, as in France 25 years ago, and now in the Spanish American provinces, they had invariably laboured to impede their success. With the cry of liberty perpetually in their mouths, in their hearts they felt nothing but the most deadly hatred to it.—They had carried on a twenty-five years war, as they said, in defence of rights and property, and against tyranny and oppression; but how little they had practised what they so loudly professed, their conduct every where had proved. They had betrayed several, and had consented to the spoliation of others, of the states of Europe, by which conduct they had lowered the name and tarnished the glory of England, rendering the policy of the British cabinet as much reprobated abroad, as the naval and military achievements of the empire had been generally and deservedly extolled; and now, with a shameless effrontery, and, as it were to complete their political career, they had turned upon the people of this formerly free country, after that this very people had, at their call, too, made the most extraordinary efforts and sacrifices, but whom these ministers now stigmatize as so many slaves and rebels, because, in the fifth year of peace, when suffering under a severity of taxation unknown in any other country and even not in this till lately, they had been, in some of the manufacturing districts, driven to acts of violence, and every where had become clamorous in their demands for protection from a system of extravagance and corruption, which had reduced them to the utmost misery.—But the principle of the measures before the House had been so ably argued, that he felt he could now only run the chance of weakening; what had been already urged with so much force in every point of view; he, therefore, had said only thus much, that he might have the satisfaction of publicly declaring and registering his entire dissent, and to answer the challenge of coming to “close quarters” with the noble lord and his colleagues, which he did, by accusing them, in the face of the country, of a systematic attempt, in conjunction with the ministers of other courts to annihilate liberty every where. As to danger he had no doubt the only danger really apprehended by the ministers, was, that of being unmasked, of losing their power. He was convinced they did not feel the panic which they were so anxious to create in the breasts of others; theirs was an apprehension of a different kind. He deprecated nothing so much as their continuance in office, being convinced that they would at last drive the people wild, and ruin the country. When he said this, he must add that he felt indifferent who succeeded to them, provided they did their duty. He was as averse as any man to countenance violence on the part of the people, however deeply he commiserated their sufferings, which he believed in many of the manufacturing districts, at least, to be very great indeed. This he had declared on a former night, but he would as anxiously endeavour to prevent the ministers and the crown from insulting and oppressing the people, whom they could not or would not relieve. On the subject of these bills he begged leave to add, that he did not consider ministers as having made out a sufficient case. The papers produced to the House contained no evidence to justify parliament in enacting this highly penal code. They had themselves acknowledged that they had not submitted the whole of the case, and at the same time refused farther inquiry, though the speech from the throne had promised “the necessary information.” The evidence too, they had furnished themselves, and, in their own cause; for they were a party accused before the public. In that speech also, they had asserted what was not correct, namely, an increasing revenue, and that the difficulties of the country, which had given rise to these meetings (and which it was the object of these bills to restrain) were owing to temporary causes, and to the embarrassments of other states. That other states laboured under temporary difficulties, could not be denied; but that the national miseries were solely attributable to foreign causes, he could not admit. Ministers reminded the House, that, other nations were looking to their conduct. Let us (said Mr. H.) give them an example worthy of imitation an example of firmness! and integrity! They had talked of the French Revolution; had they themselves learned no useful lesson from that great event? They had talked of a revolutionary spirit in this country, by which they mean—opposition to their own system! and when they call for “loyalty to the throne,” they thereby mean treason to the people! On the subject of the clause as to Ireland, which he should ask leave to bring up, should this bill be read a third time, he earnestly entreated the House to recollect the manner in which the noble lord, when he first proposed these measures, spoke of the tranquil state of Ireland; a state which, he said, he “hoped she would long enjoy, and which would not only diffuse comfort and happiness throughout the land, but would place the national character in a brighter light than that in which it had ever been contemplated.”

The House could not but remember the pains taken, in moving the address to the throne, to impress upon it the alarming and disturbed state of several parts of Great Britain, especially the manufacturing districts;—the general anxiety which the events in these parts during the last few months had occasioned in the country—the attempts which had been made to undermine the principles of loyalty and good faith, and diffuse among particular classes principles of sedition and licentiousness,—the repeated meetings for reform, accompanied by symptoms of riot, nay rebellion;—that such meetings had been held even in the capital—that there existed a notoriously regular organization;—that thousands of men, had been seen marching in military array from two or more points, bearing flags with devices and inscriptions in order to attend such meetings;—that they had even gone the length of assembling at night to practise military training and exercise, to the great terror and alarm of the loyal, peaceable, and well-disposed of his majesty's subjects;—that this system had commenced in this country as early as 1816. The House would recollect further, that the speech from the throne, in closing the last session (1819) had stated, “that attempts had been made in the manufacturing districts to take advantage of circumstances of local distress to excite a spirit of disaffection.” That the speech, on calling the parliament together now, assigned as the reason for their assembling at so unusual a period. “The increased activity, the seditious practices so long prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts, which had led to proceedings incompatible with the public tranquillity, and which, if not effectually checked must bring confusion and ruin on the nation.” The noble lord (Castlereagh) in his speech in support of the address, declared that “such was the state of the country, that had ministers longer delayed convening parliament, they would have compromised their duty to the crown, and to the country; that it was not to be concealed that a deliberate conspiracy had been formed for overturning the government and that there prevailed in many places a disposition to second this design;” and almost in the same breath, he excepted Ireland from the charge of this conspiracy by asserting the tranquillity which prevailed there: while the minister for that country bore testimony to the peaceable disposition, the virtue and loyalty of the people; and the member for the university of Oxford had explained the meaning of the “awful and dangerous situation of the country,” alluded to by ministers, by adverting to the nature and constitution of society in the manufacturing districts, which he stated as “a growing evil of twenty years.” In addition to all this, many members from various parts of Great Britain had corroborated the statement of ministers, adding their own apprehensions for the safety of their families and property, and even requested the interference of government declaring their willingness to support the noble lord's measures. But what Irish members, asked Mr. H. have as yet come forward to demand these measures as necessary for the tranquillity and security of persons and property in Ireland? What tumultuary meetings have they stated to have been held there? What flags? what devices exhibited? What marching and training? What meetings dispersed? What leaders arrested? how many of the people maimed or killed? What magistrates accused of having actuated ferociously? What troops assembled, and where, to resist the machinations of the rebellious, protect the habitations of the loyal, and prevent the horrors of a civil war? What part of the evidence on the table applied to Ireland? She is not once mentioned or alluded to.

He had indeed in private been answered, when complaining of the extension of these bills to Ireland, "that they could add but little to the severity of her penal code, it being already so severe; and that so much of misery existed in that country, the laws could scarcely be too rigid there!" The House would recollect the weight the opinion of the member for the university of Dublin had had on a former debate, when he came forward to declare the law as to these meetings which had held in Great Britain. Mr. H. could be not conceal from the House his deep regret at the part which the right hon. member had taken, doubtless from a sense of duty; but he would be glad to hear his opinion as to the necessity of extending these bills, especially the present, to Ireland; would the right hon. gentleman state what those circumstances were which, in his opinion, could justify such extension? Would he, with the other Irish members who supported these bills, deny the correctness of the noble lord's assertion as to the "tranquillity" of that country? But if unfortunately that right hon. gentleman, and those from Ireland, who with him had supported ministers on this occasion, should be disposed to inflict these measures on their unhappy country, he should appeal from their apathy to the justice of the members for England, Wales, and Scotland—to their impartiality and enlightened wisdom, from which, at the period of the Union, the noble lord when advocating that measure, had solemnly and repeatedly assured the people of Ireland, that they might expect the most efficient support and protection against all conflicting and local interests, in their own country, which would, he assured them, be shielded against weakness, ignorance, corruption, and little passions when found operating among Irishmen to the detriment of Ireland. Mr. H. requested that the British members, whose attention and aid he earnestly solicited, would bear in mind the nature of the question he called upon them to assist him in. He did not wish them to do any thing by which any of their own rights or interests could be compromised, or injured in the least. There was no clashing or contrariety of interest here as between Ireland and Great Britain; but as they were about to legislate for Ireland, he called upon them to look at the evidence on the table, and to recollect the speeches they had heard during these debates, and then to pronounce whether one particle of it applied to Ireland, or whether she appeared implicated in the remotest degree in the disturbances, to quell which these bills had been framed? With regard to the Manchester proceedings, Ireland had observed, altogether the most perfect neutrality; there had not been an expression of sentiment any where in Ireland as to the event of the 16th of August, and this he stated without any feeling of national pride, but for the purpose of his present argument. Instead of presenting Ireland with these insulting bills, Mr. H. would be happy to see the noble lord evince a disposition to assist and relieve the distresses and miseries of his native soil, by proposing something calculated not to inflame and disgust, but to soothe and improve. Where, asked (Mr. H.) were the noble lord's plans for cultivating the Irish mountains, and for draining some of her bogs?—for relieving the poor from the oppression of tythes, at the same time protecting the Protestant clergy?—for emancipating the population and for "planting the peasantry in the soil," by at last giving them an interest therein?—for compelling the wealthy proprietor and great landholder from draining that country of its last shilling in order to expend it any where but there? Let the noble lord prove the sincerity of his attachment for his country in some such way as this, not in mere empty words, much less by such regular system of coercion and penalty, which he now presents to her, doubtless as a reward for the state of perfect "tranquillity," in which he has reported her to this House to be! Perhaps, said Mr. Hutchinson, the most novel and singular circumstance attending the debate, was, the conspicuous lead the Irish gentlemen had taken on the occasion. The member for the university of Dublin, one of the first legal characters in that country, had come over to declare the law, to strengthen and to shield the minister. The president of the board of control (Mr. Canning) also an Irishman, had exhausted all the powers of his extraordinary eloquence, in a three hours' speech, in order to guide or rather beguile the House into an adoption of these measures. The noble lord, the author of this notable system, himself an Irishman, seventy other Irish members, crowding the ranks of ministers, and making their victory decisive—an noble duke, the first, the great captain of the age, one of Erin's most favoured sons, covered with honours and with glory, forming one of the cabinet where these measures were devised, and prepared no doubt to lead the armies of the empire, if necessary even against the people of Great Britain, should they in their despair and madness, unhappily be goaded on to violence and to mischief. One felt disposed, said Mr. Hutchinson, to ask whether this be revenge?—revenge for the injuries inflicted by Great Britain on that country for so many centuries?—whether it was the hand of Providence interfering to punish, through Irish agency, the sufferings of millions, though thus tardily? He asked whether those gentlemen he had mentioned, now wished to give chains to Great Britain, in return for the misery and desolation inflicted on their own country by the barbarous policy of British cabinets. No man in the House or in the country could be a more enthusiastic admirer of the noble duke to whom he had alluded than himself, nor was it now, when he was at the head of everything that he had, for the first time, declared in that House, the high opinion he entertained of his military achievements and his sense of the obligation he conceived the empire to be under to him for the ever-memorable and eminent services he had performed in war; but he confessed he would be well pleased to find that great captain prove himself

Mild as the setting sun in peace.”

He confessed that the union of his countrymen, at this moment, and, for such a purpose, appeared to him as not a little ominous and strange. It had been said by one of these gentlemen in debate, that these Irish members had hurried from their houses and their families, to ward off from this favoured land those convulsions, the misery of which had been experienced in their own. He (Mr. H.) had also hurried from his family and home, but it was for the purpose of opposing those measures which they supported, and to defend the liberties of the people which he conceived to be attacked, and to be in the most imminent danger, and also to protect Great Britain from those very calamities, from those very measures of violence and cruelty, to which the hon. member for the county of Armagh had alluded,—measures of violence and cruelty, the eternal disgrace of the rulers of that country, and which caused the desolation and ruin of the people. For himself, he was sincerely desirous to protect Great Britain from what he had seen his own country suffer. He would seriously ask these gentlemen from Ireland, and the noble lord, whether they entertained no apprehension of the effect they were about to produce there, by the extension of these bills to that country, in its present forlorn, but “tranquil” condition, where, notwithstanding the pompous speeches, as to its “prosperity,” by the noble secretary for foreign affairs, no trade flourished but contraband; and misery was no where more conspicuous. The people suffered there more privations than perhaps in any other part of Europe, but with a resignation and patience above all praise. If they cannot (continued Mr. H.) introduce trade, manufactures, and capital, at least they might refrain from inflicting this wanton and unfeeling insult upon their country. Was this meant and offered as a return for the silent contempt with which that people had received the invitation from Great Britain, to make common cause with the reformers and manufacturers? Was this the reward for that decorum and loyal conduct during the last summer, notwithstanding a state of the most abject poverty, and with but gloomy and distant prospects of an improved condition: a state of privation to which, perhaps, even the severest sufferings of the most distressed of the manufacturing districts of Great Britain is, by comparison, luxury! But does the noble lord imagine that, because in pompous language he has represented her to be in a prosperous state, that this declaration has rendered her so? Prosperity and Ireland!! where are the proofs? A want of trade and manufactures; a greatly accumulated debt, a decreased revenue, and a bankrupt treasury; a capital deserted by rank and wealth, absentees draining the country of her very heart's blood, protecting duties, itinerant legislators; a naked, half-fed, half-clothed, wretchedly-housed, broken-hearted population,—and this the noble lord calls prosperity!! Insult and mockery! Had the noble lord seen any of the letters from the reformers in England, which had been carefully distributed through Ireland during the summer? Does he know the fact? Will any one deny it? The noble lord had reminded the House of his experience in Ireland, with what view? as a threat? or to gain confidence, as an enlightened and successful statesman? If the latter, look (said Mr.

H.,) to Ireland, and then pronounce upon the noble lord's merits. See how she "prosper" after twenty years of "union," and, with the exception of a few months during that period, managed and governed by his lordship. But if this information to the House of the noble lord's experience, be meant as a threat, he acknowledged its weight. As to the exemption of Ireland from the operation of a law about to be passed for Great Britain, or of exempting Great Britain from the operation of a law affecting Ireland, there were the precedents of 1803, when the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, and the enactment of martial law in Ireland were passed in one night, but not extended to Great Britain. These acts were renewed in 1804, with the same exceptions. In 1816 the Habeas Corpus act was suspended in Great Britain, but not extended to Ireland, and upon the proposition of the noble lord. Let the noble lord (said Mr. H.) place confidence in his countrymen, and try the effect of a system of conciliation and kindness. He owed them much, and professed much, when, in order to prevail upon them to degrade themselves, he held out every hope of an improved condition to a persecuted, insulted, and bleeding people. But in what have these hopes ended? In a total and absolute disappointment, increased distress, and in an addition now, of new pains and penalties to their already most severe penal code; at a moment too, when the noble lord asserts that Ireland was never more "tranquil" or "prosperous;" and at the same instant that he presents her with these coercive measures as a reward for her "tranquillity," he ventures to talk of even-handed "justice"! Mr. H. asked, whether he flattered himself, that the people of Ireland had become so dull and so insensible all at once, as not to feel and complain of this treatment. There had not yet been sufficient time to hear from the distant parts of that country, since the noble lord's intention has been avowed; but the accounts from Dublin, received that morning, announced the greatest astonishment and indignation. Mr. H. desired, that the bill now proposed to be read a third time, be compared with the bills when first presented to the House; and gentlemen would instantly be convinced, that it had never been the first intention to include Ireland, which was never once named in the first bill, and only introduced by amendments in the committee, after he (Mr. H.) had stirred the question in the House.

He was at a loss to comprehend what the noble lord meant by the words in his first speech on the address, "if they persisted in dealing out justice, even handed justice, and were resolved to interfere in the internal administration of justice no more than this interference was absolutely necessary." How was he about to carry into effect this, his own principle, as to Ireland? Was there any "absolute necessity," or any necessity whatever, to interfere there, to extend there these bills? He had also stated, that, "he only desired parliament to adopt a policy suited to the present exigency, and to evince firmness calculated to meet the danger which threatened the state," adding in almost the same breath, "that he had an individual pride as connected by birth and education with that part of the empire, in stating that, as far as Ireland was concerned, she had never, with some local exceptions, experienced greater tranquillity and prosperity." Where then was the danger (asked Mr. H.) that threatened the state as coming from Ireland? All accounts agreed in stating the danger, if any (which Mr. H. repeated his conviction, that ministers did not believe to be imminent), to exist chiefly, if not entirely, in the manufacturing districts, which the noble lord had stated to contain a full third of British population, as a reason for making these bills general, not local, in Great Britain. But how did this apply to Ireland? Where were her manufacturers? Where was the connexion of any part of her population with the manufacturers of Great Britain? none whatever; whereas every county, city, and town in Great Britain, though not strictly manufacturing, had in many cases a direct and intimate, and, in all a remote connexion with the manufacturing districts; nature had also connected them. It was all the same land, and each part of it connected by innumerable common ties. It was scarcely possible that the great manufacturing portions of Great Britain could be seriously convulsed, and the other part remain quiet. Gentlemen (observed Mr. H.) would understand that he did not say this in order to injure any part of this country. The question of including all parts of Great Britain had been already decided, but he would intreat them to be cautious how they disgusted the people of Ireland with the character of British legislation. It was his duty, by his own country, to show that her situation totally differed from that of any part of Great Britain. She was, besides, sea-girt—the noble lord had indeed enacted her to be a province of this empire, though Providence seemed to have decided otherwise. Mr. Hutchinson concluded by opposing the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Leslie Foster expressed himself anxious to offer a few observations in answer to the speech which his hon. friend had made—a speech which, from the tone he assumed, was calculated to convey very wrong impressions to Ireland. — Many persons in that country, who, from that speech would think themselves aggrieved, would not, but for such a statement, be aware of the existence of the measure. If hon. members would allow him to explain himself further, they would see no reason for their cheers; as he meant to state, that large masses in Ireland, but for the warning in that speech, would have perhaps remained ignorant of the existence of the measure, because it was probable that there would be no reason in that country for its practical operation. He had never known but one instance of a public meeting in that country which was not held within some house, and which was not therefore exempt from the provisions of this measure. The one to which he alluded was an imitation of the meeting in Spa-fields, but it led to nothing. With respect to the claims of the Catholics, though he differed from the hon. gentleman as to the propriety of conceding them, he was as anxious as he could be to allow a full and fair opportunity of petitioning the legislature on that subject. But he asked his hon. friend, whether he ever heard of any of those meetings of Roman Catholics out of doors? In Dublin, where the aggregate Roman Catholic meetings were held, they were always in large rooms, capable of holding thousands of persons; and, in other parts of Ireland, they generally took place in chapels. He wished it, then, to be understood, that the present bill would have no practical effect against meetings in Ireland. But it was asked, “Why extend this bill to Ireland? Where is its necessity?” To this he answered, that the House had already decided that it should be of general operation; and if Ireland were exempted from it on the ground of its present tranquillity, why should not the gentlemen of Wales call for the exemption of that part of the country; and if Wales were also exempted, why might not Devonshire and Kent be so likewise?—for these exemptions would undoubtedly be sought for if the first were once admitted. He contended that it was necessary as a measure of precaution in those places where its immediate operation would not be required. There was one subject to which he wished to allude, and which his hon. friend had not noticed. They grossly deceived themselves, who, in the event of any considerable commotion in England, would speculate on the peace of Ireland. It was well known that ambassadors had been sent from the radicals of Manchester and its neighbourhood to Ireland; and though he was happy to say that hitherto they had not produced any effect, yet it could not be denied, that if this country were thrown into a state of violent commotion, Ireland would not long continue tranquil. It was on these grounds that, as an Irish member, he should give his vote for the extension of the bill to Ireland.

Mr. Plunkett trusted the House would indulge him for a short time, while he expressed his sentiments on the measure then before them. He did not intend to have occupied their attention at this stage of the debate, nor should he have offered himself, but for the very pointed manner in which he had been alluded to by his hon. and learned friend who had spoken last but one. He held it to be rather unusual to call particularly upon any member for his opinion upon what was passing before the House, and perhaps he might, with a full sense of duty, decline to comply with the demand; but he confessed he had so much of the Irishman in him as not to refuse the challenge. He thanked his hon. and learned friend for the compliments which he had paid him in the course of his speech; but he conceived the allusion made to his character, as affected by the vote which he had given or might give on this subject, was wholly uncalled for. He must say that he did not think that character was likely to sustain any injury or diminution from the course of conduct, which he had felt it his duty in that House to follow. He thought that his character could never be implicated by the conscientious expression of a conscientious opinion. His hon. and learned friend, in what he had expressed, was not inconsistent with his politics; and he (Mr. Plunkett) maintained, that he, in what he had said, was not inconsistent with those politics which he had always supported. In the course of his parliamentary experience, he had frequently been compelled to differ from his hon. and learned friend, and he had never seen occasion since to regret that difference. He had heard a great deal of the claim set up to exclusive loyalty by the gentlemen on the other side; but he considered the claim to exclusive patriotism, which was set up by some gentlemen equally as arrogant and unfounded. His hon. and learned friend had talked a great deal of liberty, and of the inroads which had been made upon it. He should be glad to learn from him what that liberty was, and what were those attacks which were so much to be feared. That liberty would not, he was certain, be defined to mean the unlimited power of each individual to do whatever he pleased. He should rather define it to be "Protestas faciendi quicquid per leges licit." It was not the unbridled licence of disturbing the community at the caprice of all who sought only for confusion. The outcry of the present day was not in support of any enjoyment—it was not to uphold a legal and recognized right, but the uproar was shouted to secure the power of disturbance, to perpetuate an abuse with whose existence constitutional freedom was incompatible. Could such a misapplication of right be called liberty? Was that liberty which was preached up as such in so many parts of the country? No, it was a screaming harpy, an obscene bird of prey, that polluted every social and every natural enjoyment, and sought only to poison all those who allowed themselves to be brought within its influence. He had heard many assertions on the subject on that side of the House, and though he was certain that any thing which fell from his hon. and learned friend was not said with any evil intention, yet it should be recollected, that in the present state of the country the slightest assertion might be sufficient to unsheath the sword of civil discord, which unhappily was already half drawn from its scabbard. Many gentlemen talked of the introduction of military power and the substitution of a government of force for a government of law. He could not participate in such apprehensions—he read the answer to such fears in the application to parliament for the wholesome laws in the passing of which the House was then engaged. He had made those few observations, from having been so pointedly called upon by his hon. and learned friend, but he trusted the House would excuse him if he went a little farther into the subject than he originally intended; for he was anxious to state what his reasons were for giving his support to the present measures. That support was not founded on any suggestions of temporary policy—nor on the information which was disclosed in the papers before the House, but with the conviction that the proposed measures did not infringe on the constitution; while they were essential to its conservation. The state of society in this country, every man who reflected on the subject must admit, had within the last twenty or thirty years undergone a greater change than from the period of the conquest until the time of which he spoke. Within that interval the public attention had been called to the consideration of every measure connected with the administration of the government, in a degree hitherto unprecedented. There had been an intensity of light shed upon all subjects, civil, political, and religious; so that measures were now scanned with minuteness, which were scarcely looked into, or at most, but generally known before. Did he complain of that change, or of the means by which it had been produced? No; he rejoiced at it. The freedom of the public press, directing its efforts under the institutions of the constitution, was the most effectual security of public freedom. He was persuaded that where every action of every man connected with public affairs was laid before the public in the fullest manner, and most strictly canvassed and examined; where the press exercised this kind of guardianship, we had the best guarantee of all our rights. Then why did he allude to the public press? Because there was under the same title, another description, a blasphemous, seditious, mischievous, press, of which the members of that House knew but little, but which had been unremittingly at work in destroying every honest and good feeling in the heart of man, and in loosening all those moral and social ties, without which civilization could not exist. It was not against the respectable press, but against this under current, which, setting with great force, was drifting the great mass of the humbler classes of the community into sedition, atheism, and revolution, that the House sought to guard. It was for the consummation of such atrocious objects that this battery was brought to play upon their passions and their ignorance. Did he mean to say, that the lower class of the people had no right to be informed on public transactions? Did he mean to say that the lower orders of the people had not a right to inquire into and discuss subjects of a political nature? No such thing. Did he mean to say, that they ought not to have the power of expressing their sense of any grievance under which they might think themselves to suffer? Far from it; but when he was willing to allow to them the enjoyment of every constitutional privilege, which they were entitled to possess, he never could consider that nice discussions on the very frame of the constitution—on the most essential changes in the institutions and fundamental laws of the country, were calculated for minds of such intelligence and cultivation. They ought rather to be protected from the mischiefs which such a misapplication of their minds must entail. Every capacity was capable of understanding the nature and the extent of the restrictions which government, from the purport of its institution, necessarily imposed on the natural freedom of man; but to the task of contemplating the more than usurious repayment which in long and various succession was received for that surrender, the generality of persons were not quite so adequate. The penalties of government stood at the threshold, but its benefits were to be traced through a long interval of ages—in the distribution of equal laws—in the control of public wisdom, producing, even through apparent contradiction, the grand harmony of the social system—these he conceived were subjects which could not be well discussed by men whose time was chiefly devoted to daily labour. It had been wisely said that “a little learning was a dangerous thing.” It was true in literature, in religion, in politics. In literature, superficial reading too frequently formed the babbling critic. In religion the poor man, who, unsettled as to his faith, became curious upon his evidences, and who, if he possessed the capacity, and had time and means to extend his inquiries, would in the end reach the moral demonstration which religion unfolded—shaken, but not instructed, became a shallow infidel. It was equally so in politics; men who indulged in the perusal of every species of invective against the institutions of their country, who read on their shopboard of all the evils, and did not comprehend the blessings of the system of government under which they lived, these men, the nature of whose employment and whose education disallowed them to be statesmen, might however learn enough to become turbulent and discontented subjects. Was not this the case in France, where persons were called from their daily labour to give opinions upon the most difficult points of legislation? But he heard from his hon. and learned friend, and from other hon. members, a great deal about overturning the constitution of the country; and the wish that the practices of the good old times should be restored. He should be glad if the persons who made these observations would prove their present applicability. If it were said that the measures now introduced were against the practice of the good old times, he should only state, that before he could agree to the proposition, he must unlearn all that he had known of those good old times, and all that he had read in history respecting them. He should be glad to know when had such meetings as it was now attempted to control been considered as the ordinary exercise of the constitution? Why, until the present reign had far advanced, there were no such meetings known, and the reason why such laws as the present were not before thought of, was, that no grounds ever before existed for their necessity. Where a spirit of disaffection existed, some restrictive measure should be passed to check its operation. The House were called upon to provide against an evil not of ancient, but of recent origin, and, in the wise spirit of the constitution, it proceeded to apply new remedies to a new mischief. Let any man who read the bill contradict him. Did it in its enactments interfere with any right of the subject according to the spirit of the constitution? It was, and he said it with sincerity, a remedial measure. He appealed to the common sense of every man who heard him, whether the expression of the public voice was possible to be obtained at these screaming, howling, hallooing meetings which the measure went to suppress [Hear, hear!]? Could any discussion, any deliberation, any fair, impartial decision, result from such assemblages? Let him ask, whether, if ever there came a question of deep importance, on which it was of the greatest moment to procure the authoritative expression of the public opinion, that opinion would not be better ascertained, and its influence more powerfully felt at a hundred meetings, held in apartments, where every man would be allowed to deliver his sentiments and to hear distinctly those of others, than at a meeting of 10,000 persons assembled together in the open streets, and where what was said by one could not be heard by hundreds? Why, the spirit of the constitution was more likely to be preserved in those meetings than in the large and tumultuous ones. He would admit that it was of importance, that the public voice should be frequently expressed; but then he would not sanction meetings where, under the mask of expressing that opinion, the use of physical force was recommended in bringing about alterations not only of the law but the constitution. He would agree with what had fallen from an hon. baronet, that perhaps the opinions of lawyers might not be the best on these subjects, but he would ask, whether the first step from barbarism was not this—to prevent the elements of society from being let loose against those laws which were enacted for the benefit of all; and thus throwing mankind back into a state of nature; in which the institutions of government possessed neither respect nor power. The first principle of society was, that care should be taken to prevent the exercise of physical force from bearing down those bounds which that society had placed to human action in particular cases. He would admit that there were states of society where those bounds were broken, but then they were states of revolution, and never existed without the destruction, for the time, of all order and harmony in the country where they rose. In conclusion he begged to state his opinion, that the same reason which existed for the extension of the bill to all parts of England, also existed for its extension to Ireland. His hon. and learned friend had, on this occasion, mixed up the question of the Roman Catholic claims with this bill. In his opinion there was no connexion between them. No doubt his hon. and learned friend was a warm and sincere advocate for the question in which the Roman Catholics were concerned; but he (Mr. Plunkett) should say, that any man who could mix up their question with such measures as the present, was not, in effect, acting the part of a friend to them. His hon. and learned friend must admit, that most, if not all the meetings which were held on the subject of the Roman Catholic question, were held within doors, and therefore the present bill could not affect their assembling to petition; and he knew his Catholic countrymen so well as to feel that even, if under the present circumstances they were to suffer some privations, they would freely acquiesce in them, in the hope that the time was not far distant when they might be enabled to participate in the benefits of that constitution, which they were ever ready to support and defend.

Lord Milton declared, that after the observations which had fallen from his right hon. and learned friend, he could not avoid offering a few remarks. Some of the opinions of his right hon. and learned friend had astonished him, and he was the more surprised at hearing them from such a quarter. He understood his learned friend to argue, that because in the present day an intensity of light was thrown upon all subjects, therefore the progress of knowledge was to be stopped. If his right hon. and learned friend had not meant this, his words could convey no meaning at all. His right hon. and learned friend had contended, that because knowledge was so general, it should be restricted. Why, if that argument had always been in force, what would have become of the exertions of a Luther and a Calvin, who had contributed to take from our religion that veil of error in which it had so long been hid? He should be glad to know how knowledge was improved or increased but by slow steps. His right hon. and learned friend had advanced one proposition which utterly astonished him. It was, that in the last 20 or 30 years, we had improved more in knowledge than in some centuries preceding. What! would his right honourable and learned friend say, that the accumulated wisdom of six or seven centuries; that the Magna Charta, the bill of rights, the Habeas Corpus, and other measures, securing the liberty of the subject, were outweighed in their importance by the increased knowledge of the last 20 or 30 years? Surely his right hon. and learned friend must have lost sight of those great bulwarks of our liberty, when he used such an argument. He would admit that there were very many, who (whether their opinion was well or ill founded he would not then inquire) were in favour of the present bill; but he would say, that that in itself was no argument in its support; for there were not wanting instances of whole nations surrendering up their liberties, and willingly embracing an absolute government; and on one occasion it was seen, that a great nation did voluntarily surrender up its liberties, into the hands of a single individual; but would such a circumstance be taken as a justification of a surrender of any portion of our liberties at the present day? He did admit, that in consequence of some things which had occurred in the country, there were some persons disposed to give up many of their invaluable rights, through fear of a supposed danger. But he maintained, that there existed no such danger as to call for this surrender. His right hon. and learned friend had said, that the present application to parliament proved in itself that a military despotism was not thought of. Why, he asked, had parliament been now assembled 3 weeks, and not one word spoken by ministers of the great increase of 12,000 men which they had made in the army of the country? He professed himself so much a friend to old laws and old customs, as to doubt the legality of such an increase. The bill of rights said that there should be no standing army without the consent of parliament, and the mutiny act regulated them in such a manner as to bring them under immediate parliamentary control. With these acts then before him, he should, until he heard some strong proof to the contrary, doubt that such an increase as had been made to our army was lawful. But, he asked, did this increase accompanied as it was, by strong coercive laws, show a disposition to respect the liberties of the people? The army so raised was, however, not considered a sufficient safeguard, and the present bill was introduced. Was that bill founded upon the ancient practice of the constitution? When a similar measure was first introduced in 1795, there were great discontents in the country—treasonable societies in England—a convention sitting at Edinburgh, arrogating to itself the powers of the legislature, actual convictions having taken place—the country at war with an enemy, whose malignity was only exceeded by its industry in disseminating its principles. Such was the state of things in 1795; and yet instead of a remedy, as his right hon. and learned friend had called it, the measure was characterized, even by its advocates, as a great, though a necessary infringement of the constitution. The same occurred in 1817. The measure was then also looked upon by all as an infringement of the constitution. It was enacted at both those periods, and suffered after each to expire; but he maintained that, by the frequent repetition of such coercive acts, the people would in time be brought to think little of their rights, and would at some future period, through some such fears for their security as were now disseminated, be brought to surrender their liberties altogether. He contended, that if the safety of the country was brought to depend on military force alone, it could not be long secured. The people would not be content to be so coerced, and if the expression of their opinions through the medium of public meetings were restricted, ministers would lay open a ground for secret associations, and conspiracies, and for a crime which he would not trust himself to name, as being so repugnant to the feelings and character of Englishmen. What was the reason why so marked a difference existed between the large assemblies, vulgarly called mobs, in this country and in those of others? Ought it not to be attributed to the free constitution, which recognized the right of a free expression of opinion? He allowed that the bill had been much amended in the House. It had no doubt been rendered more palatable to a number of persons; but it did not, therefore, seem to him to be more desirable, as, when he considered that circumstance, and the tone of his majesty's government on the subject, he was persuaded that at the end of the five years the continuation of the bill would be proposed. The popularity which the bill might acquire with some persons in the country, was, therefore, in his opinion, one of the greatest dangers attending it. The tendency of the bill was not only to produce arbitrary power, but to take away the means of resisting arbitrary power. He did not say that it was the intention of his majesty's ministers to do this; but they could not be so blind as not to be aware that such was the tendency of the measure. It would stop the free communication of sentiment among the population of the country. It would prevent that congregation of the people, so consonant to the principles of the constitution; at which the mutual expression of opinion was fairly indulged in; and at which all the ill blood generated by political differences had the opportunity of evaporating. But the principal grounds of his opposition to the measure were, that the enactment of the bill would make it difficult, if not almost impossible, to return to a wholesome state of liberty—that state, which, if not wholly annihilated by the measures which had been introduced by his majesty's government, had at least been severely impaired.

Mr. Robinson allowed, that if he entertained an opinion of the state of the country similar to that expressed by those who opposed the measure, if he could by any course of reasoning come to the conclusion at which the noble lord who had just sat down had arrived—if he thought the existing disaffection were of recent origin—if he thought that by some sudden and unaccountable accident, the country was exposed to an ebullition of popular feeling—if he thought that the attempts to disturb the tranquillity of the country had no defined object—if he thought that that object was [not pursued with systematic and unremitting activity, he should then perhaps be of opinion that the proposed measures ought not to be adopted. Although no man was more slow than himself to see any danger in an ebullition of popular feeling and prejudice, or to interfere with it, yet he was convinced that the country was not at present in a state of mere ebullition. There were not many hon. gentlemen present who recollected the events which took place at the commencement of the French Revolution. But they were matter of history; and it was impossible for any one who was duly informed respecting them, to say, that the reception which the mischievous doctrines promulgated at that time, met in England, was fostered by distress; for there never was a time when trade was more flourishing, or the general prosperity more assured. That, however, was the period when the pestilent doctrines by which we had ever since been more or less infected, were first sown in this happy country. A noble lord opposite had contended, that that was a time of greater danger than the present. To him the fact appeared precisely the reverse.—The evil commenced at the beginning of the French Revolution. It had since made great progress. It had assumed by turns every shade and disguise; and now its gigantic form threatened destruction to all the elements of civil society. It had occasionally been more or less active; but never had it been wholly extinguished. What was the sort of danger to which the country was at present exposed? He appreciated it, not so much from the representation of any individuals in that House, as from the avowed and declared objects of the parties themselves. The first of the meetings to which he should advert, was that at Birmingham, in which the most audacious attempt was made to attack the majesty, honour and constitution of parliament, that had ever entered into the mind of the most audacious Reformer. The resolutions of that meeting had been treated, forsooth, as ridiculous. For his part, he believed that at every period when revolution was contemplated, there was a mixture of the ridiculous and the terrifying. But not at that meeting alone; at the meeting at Hunslet Moor, a resolution was adopted similar in substance, manifesting the same disposition and intention to attack the privileges of parliament. In this resolution the persons assembled declared in plain terms (for to that it was now come; there was no affectation of concealment), that they wished "to form a national union, the object of which was to obtain an overwhelming majority of the male population, to present such a petition as could not fail to have the desired effect." An overwhelming majority of the male population for the purpose of presenting a petition! And then the resolutions proceeded to state, that the persons adopting them would resort to "such other constitutional measures as may be deemed most expedient to procure the redress of their manifold grievances." A tolerable notion of the constitution persons must have, who talked of giving effect to a petition by "an overwhelming majority of the male population!" Then came the proposition for a meeting at Manchester, on the abandonment of which so much stress had been laid. But why had it been abandoned? Because, as the individual announcing that abandonment asserted, "although the object was one of absolute right, the persons intending to assemble were not strong enough to resist the power that was to be opposed to them." What followed? Training by night, and all those other means which were calculated to give strength to the individuals by whom they were adopted. On these, and a thousand other considerations with which he would not trouble the House, he could not but contemplate the existing danger as infinitely greater than any that had ever yet menaced the country. But was there no danger to liberty itself in the proceedings in question? To endeavour to carry any political purpose by a vast accumulation of persons, was pronounced by well informed individuals of all parties to be wrong. No such meetings could be held without the necessary collection of all the civil and military force in the neighbourhood. Was it not dangerous to liberty thus perpetually to contemplate the parade of force, which circumstances rendered necessarily attendant on the expression of public opinion? No man denied the right of the people to assemble for the purpose of expressing their opinion. But in all well-constituted societies, what right was there which was not liable to regulation, in order to prevent its abuse? He had said enough to show the reasons on which, in his opinion, parliament was driven to the adoption of the proposed measures. As to the asserted disposition of government to use those measures for the subversion of the constitution, it was a charge easily made. For himself, he never more sincerely and heartily regretted any thing than he did the necessity for such proceedings; but he could not shut his eyes to the danger; he could not look to the circumstances in which the evil had originated; he could not observe the course that had been pursued; he could not contemplate the systematic activity with which pernicious doctrines had been disseminated among the people, without feeling the absolute necessity of parliamentary interference. The noble lord had contended, that it was impolitic to throw any impediment in the way of public meetings, because, as he supposed, they were the safety valves of the constitution, by which all the bad spirit and feeling of the people evaporated. It was a most pestilent evaporation. Were it the pure essence of liberty, no man would observe it with more satisfaction than himself; but it spread death around. Compression might be inconvenient; but if it were not compressed, sure he was, that they would all fall under the baneful influence of that noxious exhalation. Looking then at the circumstances of the country, and balancing between evils, he could not but decide in favour of the present measures. The liberty now claimed by the disaffected was unknown to the constitution. It had grown up into a frightful abuse. Of this he was persuaded, in direct opposition to the noble member for the county of York, that the corruptions and dangers of the present day were much more alarming than those of any former period; and if not checked with promptitude and vigour, that they would produce still greater evils:

“*Damnosa quid non imminuet dies?
Ætas parentum, pejor avis, tulit
Nos nequiores, mox daturos Progeniem vitiosiore.*”

Mr. W. Smith said, he should not address himself to those who thought that the existing evil originated in the French revolution, and had proceeded until it had arrived at its present point, because he was not aware of any argument which could effect a change in such an opinion. He acknowledged that by allowing all assemblies to take place under cover, a very considerable part of the sting had been taken out of the bill; but on that point he wished to make one observation. He was aware that the marginal notes of a bill were not to be considered as an accurate index of the bill itself; he could not, however, help adverting to the marginal note referring to the clause of exception which he had noticed. It was as follows:—“Clause not to extend to any meeting held in a private room.” He was at a loss to know on what authority that expression had been introduced, but he protested against parliament being concluded by it. Many of the clauses might be excluded from the bill without interfering with its operations. He alluded particularly to the clause which limited its duration to five years. This was a period which he thought ought not to be insisted upon, as, if that were permitted, at the end of five years the measure would no doubt be renewed as a matter of course. His objection in general to the bill, however, was founded upon the same grounds on which he objected to the whole system of measures which had been brought in, namely, that they had been introduced to the notice of the House, without any inquiry whatever. The House had taken for granted, that all that had been stated was true, without one inquiry as to the propriety of the evidence on which those statements had been made, and without once considering whether the remedies proposed were called for by the evils which had existed. The prima facie evidence before the House was, that there had been a meeting at Manchester, the legality or illegality of which was doubtful; that that meeting was dispersed in a manner which had not been resorted to since 1780 (when it took place under very different circumstances), that two or three hundred persons were much hurt—some of them killed. If this was not true, let it be disproved. If not disproved, he had a right to assume, that at least a large proportion of the statement was true; and that the mode of dispersion was illegal. The justices acting on that occasion had, nevertheless, substantially received from his majesty's government complete indemnity; and all other justices in a similar way were, under the bill before the House, to enjoy similar indemnity. By the bill, a single justice of the peace was empowered to disperse an assembly of the people. Was that an authority which ought to be so conferred? A great deal had been said, and said with truth, of the merits of what had been called "the unpaid" magistracy. But that was a narrow view of the question; they were not "an unpaid" magistracy. Did those hon. gentlemen who cried "hear!" think the magistracy unpaid because they received no pecuniary recompense for their services? He remembered a story, which was probably known to all the readers of French anecdote. A chevalier de Saint Louis, of distinguished military merit, observing a great French actor receive, on coming out of the theatre, the homage of a large crowd of persons, exclaimed, "who is this fellow that enjoys so much applause, while I, who have served my country so long and so faithfully, am quite neglected?"—"What, sir," replied the actor, "do you reckon for nothing the privilege of treating me in this manner?" So he would say to those who talked of the "unpaid" magistracy, Did they reckon for nothing the privileges and authority which those gentlemen enjoyed—privileges and authority, in his opinion, of much greater value than any pecuniary payment they could receive. Of that "unpaid" magistracy, he believed the far greater portion of them would rather enjoy the privileges they now enjoyed than be turned into paid magistrates with moderate salaries. For those who discharged their duty in a proper manner, it was much to possess the power of doing good, and for those (if there were any such in the country) who sought to recommend themselves to the higher powers, they only looked forward to payment in futuro instead of in presenti. He would not intrude longer upon the House, but he had felt it his duty to state the reasons that induced him to vote against the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Long Wellesley felt himself called upon to state the reasons which induced him to support his majesty's government in the present measure; and these were founded on a conviction, that the dangers which existed demanded the exercise of extraordinary powers. In coming to this conclusion he disclaimed any intention unnecessarily to infringe on the rights and liberties of the people; nothing was farther from his principles, or those feelings of independence which he hoped he should always maintain. If he thought the present bill went unjustly to infringe on the liberties of the people he trusted that no motive would induce him to give it his consent. He, however, could not see that it affected those constitutional liberties which the people had a right to enjoy. It did not prevent them from meeting, as they had a right to do, by law: an individual who had received the common education of a gentleman, knew that there never was a period when the people could meet to express their sentiments on public affairs without being under some restrictions. Those now to be imposed were not unjustly severe, and in his opinion they did not trench on those privileges secured to the people at the time of the Revolution.

Mr. Williams expressed a hope, that the House would indulge him for a few moments while he explained the motive on which he founded his objection to these bills. It was because, taking the whole of the statements which had been given by the hon. gentleman on all sides of the House to be strictly true, he thought that these bills went further than the evils complained of demanded. The evils were, according to his notion, that a great number of persons assembled together with flags and with military parade, and that these persons were inflamed by the speeches of itinerant orators, who went about from place to place inculcating their pernicious doctrines. Now, allowing these evils to exist in certain quarters, surely it did not follow that the restrictions which might be considered necessary to their suppression, should be extended to places in which they were unknown? If the bill had been confined to the correction of the evils described, it would have met with his most cordial support. But why were parliament to put those under restraint who had not participated in these proceedings, and who had unquestionably a right to submit their opinions to the throne, or to the other branches of the government? One or two of the enactments of the bill would have been sufficient for the purpose. Those which forbade persons from going out of their own county to public meetings, and the display of any military parade at those meetings, would have met all the necessity of the case. But why take away that which ought to be considered as the inalienable right of Englishmen? By the proposed bill, meetings could be held only by the will of the sheriff or the magistrate. If his permission were refused, the people would be compelled to assemble in parishes. And what kind of meetings would they be? He knew several parishes in which the meeting must necessarily be composed of two persons—the landlord and the farmer! How were these persons, unless they joined with neighbouring parishes, to express their opinions, or to discuss any grievances of which they might have reason to complain? The proposition was quite idle and ridiculous. Another objection to the bill was, that cities and towns corporate, might be restricted from delivering their opinions through the intervention of a single individual—he meant the sheriff or mayor. It was true, as had been said, that sheriffs were not in England, at least, under the control of the Crown; but still these individuals might be influenced by private passions and prejudices, which would incline them to act in opposition to the wishes of the community at large. He had known such persons enter their protests even against charitable meetings; and if this were the case, how much more likely would they be to exercise the same right under the direction of those feelings which were apt to actuate men upon political subjects! Thus he conceived he had shown, that the powers given by this bill would materially infringe upon the legitimate rights of the subject. There was one of the remedies which had been proposed, to which he thought there was no objection? The bill for preventing the training which was going on in some districts, no friend of his country but must cordially support. To the prevention of the display of flags and other military demonstrations, there could be no possible objection. To the assembling of immense numbers—for how was it possible that any individual could address or be heard by thirty or forty thousand persons?—To the assembling of immense numbers, a check seemed indispensable. The congregation of such a multitude could answer no good end. Had the bill comprehended merely those considerations, it would have met with his most cordial support. But, as he had already said, it went much further, and much beyond the necessity. Adverting to the severe distresses which were experienced in the manufacturing districts, he expressed his regret that his majesty's ministers had not put into the mouth of his royal highness the Prince Regent, at the commencement of the session, an avowal of that sorrow for those distresses which he was persuaded the benevolent nature of his Royal Highness would incline him to feel on the subject. The next step ought to have been to institute such an inquiry into recent occurrences as would satisfy the people. He would then have endeavoured to get rid of a great part of the existing discontent by the appointment of a committee of inquiry into the nature of the general distress. He must say, that if ever the House of Commons was disgraced, it was by the rejection of his hon. friend's motion on that subject; a rejection founded on the assertion that the motion was dictated by party motives! For himself, he was uninfluenced by party motives. He sincerely felt that inquiry would have got rid of a great portion of the evils complained of. He sincerely believed, that if the legislature were to resort to proper measures, there would be found in the country abundant means, without any recourse to emigration, of giving beneficial employment to the whole population. After he had done all that he had described, he would have proceeded to that, which, in his opinion, would be the most important step of all—a moderate and rational reform. Advancing step by step, he would eventually have made the voice of the people as distinctly heard in that House as was consistent with the public safety. He was satisfied that the great bulk of the people would continue to respect the House, if the House would apply themselves calmly and dispassionately to inquire into and remedy the existing distresses. But, above all, he conjured them not to adopt measures injuriously operative on the whole community, when it was confessedly only a part of that community that ought to be subject to them. They were the guardians of the people, and should be especially cautious not to oppress those who were already in a state of great dissatisfaction.

Lord Morpeth said, that hon. gentlemen must feel that party attachments would be allowed on some occasions to influence the discussion of state questions; but he deprecated their influence in this instance, not merely with reference to the awful situation of the country, but also with reference to these particular measures, which were proposed by his majesty's ministers, for the purpose of averting the dangers by which it was threatened, and of opposing the progress of revolutionary doctrines. Without further preface, he must for his own part fairly confess, that from all the information he had been able to glean from the papers on the table, and from all he had been able to gather from persons the best informed upon the subject, the constitution, in his opinion (however reluctantly he came to that conclusion), would be seriously endangered, unless the spirit of these seditious meetings were speedily put down by the strong arm of the law, aided by military interference. Under all these circumstances of the case, he must give this bill his support; but with regard to the character of the measure, it had been already so amply discussed, that he did not deem it necessary to detain the House upon the subject. He would here ask, what was the evil complained of by the country? What was it, but the existing state of the country? What remedy then must be applied? What, but the aid of physical, but authorized, force? They would be told by some of those who advocated the cause of reform, that such a system of measures was incompatible with their wishes. These gentlemen would assert, that their object was, in one word, the constitution, the whole constitution, and nothing but the constitution; and they would then proceed to say what their views of that constitution were. Why, they would assert that annual parliaments and universal suffrage formed a most essential part of it; and they would say, that they should consider their wrongs unredressed, their evils unremedied, and their rights unrestored, if such annual parliaments and such universal suffrage were not conceded to them! They would go on to declare, that these remedies they possessed the most ample means of obtaining; and in favour of these doctrines, the House had heard by one hon. baronet already, the great and respectable authority of the learned Selden cited. He had not been able to refer to the particular passages which were said to contain such opinions; but if they were the opinions of Selden, indeed hon. gentlemen must acknowledge, that no man ever put a greater restraint upon his feelings than that learned person; because, as the House must know, he was himself a member of a parliament the very reverse of annual; and one which deprived the people of the exercise of any authority as to the establishment either of general suffrage, or a different mode of representation. But, however, that might be, he would ask the House, whether there was no difference between a man's suggesting a theory, and propounding a fact?—No difference between the circumstances of the times, or none in the application of such opinions? But they were told, that this was a system of coercion and restraint: he must confess that he thought it was, generally and particularly. He must allow that these regulations of meetings, were in themselves a limitation of the right of meeting, as in individuals; but the question for their consideration was, whether the limitation and the coercion were necessary to the safety of the state? Besides, it was further necessary to impress upon the members of these seditious meetings the consideration, that this measure was not intended as one of coercion, but as one of penalty. As to the propriety of preventing such meetings as that of Manchester, let it be remembered, that the objects of that meeting were not those of the people of Manchester only; but that it was thought necessary to infuse into that people the genuine and unadulterated spirit of disaffection which prevailed in all the manufacturing districts. It was urged again, that this bill was an infringement on the privileges and the liberties of the subject; and that assertion he must also allow. They, however, were to inquire, whether it did not go to prevent more daring and extensive encroachments, which, if not so prevented, would involve all the liberties dearest to the country in one vast and undistinguished ruin? When the nature of those liberties was talked of, he was strongly reminded of a memorable passage in Burke, written, by the way, not at a time when the general disgust and horror occasioned by the atrocities of the French revolution might have been naturally supposed to have elicited such observations from him, as the result of experience, but nearly fifteen years before their occurrence—in the year 1774:—"The distinguishing part of our constitution is its liberty. To preserve that liberty inviolate, seems to be the particular duty and proper trust of a member of the House of Commons. But the liberty, the only liberty I mean, is a liberty connected with order; that not only exists along with order and virtue, but cannot exist without them. It inheres in good and steady government, as in its substance and vital principle." But this "order," which Mr. Burke had thus imaged to his auditors (the passage was from his speech at Bristol), hon. gentlemen could hardly deem to be synonymous with the rigid and awful silence which prevailed at the meetings of these reformers; that "virtue" was not to be found either in the opinions or the assemblies of those men (he hardly knew how to describe them), those insidious exhorters to infidelity, who, not contented with insulting religion, would contaminate the loyalty of the people. He held measures of coercion to be absolutely necessary; but he had yet to learn, why, if they were adopted, and these districts tranquillized, the genius of the country should not be allowed a fair and patient trial of exertion? He had yet to learn why she should not be competent to that trial; or why it should not be the duty of those engaged in commerce, to extend and to improve her commercial interests? or why, in the pursuit of that object, they should not sedulously cultivate a promising and profitable intercourse with South America? He had also yet to learn, why it should be found impossible to employ the surplus and industrious population of this kingdom upon works of public utility, or upon monuments of national genius? Lastly, he would ask, why they should not be applied to that most important of all purposes, the improvement of uncultivated lands? The advantages, in short, of their employment and exertions, had been already most ably described in the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Taunton; and had not been more highly estimated than their real value warranted. It was of all things, however, the duty of the House to extend protection to the loyal, the peaceable, the industrious, the unbiassed part of the population—a duty which they owed to the unrepining, and, equally so, to the misguided portion of the community, whom they were bound to protect from those treacherous and designing men, who, professing sympathy for their misfortunes, exaggerated their distresses: and while they strove to subvert the altar by assailing it with blasphemy, endeavoured to undermine the throne by the diffusion of revolutionary principles.

Mr. Scarlett acknowledged that he was far from considering that in the present state of the country, some measure was not necessary, calculated to produce a salutary impression upon the disturbed districts of the country, and to lay the spirit by which they had been agitated. For his own part, no man thought some such proceeding more needful than himself; and if he considered that the one before them was a measure of that description, no man would more cordially support it. But it was because he had a serious and solemn conviction, that a directly contrary effect would be produced by it, that he should think it his duty to oppose it, and to lay before the House his reasons for doing so. It appeared to many, that the state of the country was such as imperatively to call for measures which might be effectual to put down the large meetings which had recently been so frequent. No one would more readily concur in the general impolicy and impropriety of such large assemblies. He was by no means disposed to think that a meeting of the whole people of England upon Salisbury plain would be either advisable or convenient for the discussion of grievances. He was very ready to admit, that a public meeting, convened under a state of circumstances, such as affected the manufacturing districts of the country, might call for a measure of restriction; but they had been told that it was not there alone that the measure was necessary; and indeed those districts did not seem to be in particular affected by the bill before the House, or by any of the measures proposed by his majesty's ministers. He should have been disposed to support the measure, even had its provisions been more severe, had he not thought they were inimical to the liberties of the country. The noble lord and several hon. gentlemen had admitted that the measure was a restriction on the liberties of the people; but how did that admission agree with the declaration of his right hon. and learned friend, that so far from restricting the liberties of the people, it was framed in the very spirit of the constitution; and that it went to support those rights which he (Mr. Scarlett) and the noble lord thought it went to abridge? This bill did not merely confine itself to interference with meetings, at which 30 or 40,000 persons were assembled, but it made all meetings, in any part of the country, to depend on the will of a single magistrate, and was this, he would ask, no restraint on the liberty of the people? Was it nothing to put under restraint these meetings which it affected not to attack, in a manner in which they had never been dealt with before? If he should be able to prove that the bill went a great deal further than the right honourable and learned gentleman had said it did, he trusted that he might hope from his candour a retraction of the opinion that it contained no sort of restraint upon the rights of the people. He hoped to show that it was a bill founded on panic and alarm. Danger might exist, indeed; but he denied that it arose from public meetings. They were but warning voices which admonished the government of the country of what it was prudent to foretell. What had been called a noxious exhalation, government, instead of preventing, wished to confine: they sought a pretext by which, instead of its exhaling, it might stagnate, and become so rank, as eventually to explode with a force too powerful to be easily restrained. The magistrates, by this bill, were empowered to disperse and dismiss any meetings which had been heretofore frequently held in large and populous places; and here he could not help observing, that as hon. gentlemen were more removed from the immediate scene of danger, in proportion were their fears increased. He did not find that gentleman coming from the very districts in question were the most anxious to support these measures; but on the contrary, those who came from the north, were not half so much alarmed as those who came from the west, while the greatest alarm of all was felt among the gentlemen from the sister country. — The friends of the noble lord seemed to have come over in the utmost trepidation and with the greatest personal inconvenience; and though perfectly satisfied with the state of their own country, were sufficiently anxious to tranquillize this. — But did this bill prevent any large meetings in the neighbourhood of populous places — Birmingham or Smithfield? No such thing; to the amount of 10,000 at least, they might still meet. But did his right hon. and learned friend consider that it did this, that it annulled a course of proceeding which had been persevered in for these twenty years past? that a meeting held in however accustomed a manner was liable to be dismissed and dispersed, and all attending it liable to be put to death, for aught he knew to the contrary, at the will of a single magistrate? He would not say of a magistrate appointed by the Crown, but of an ordinary magistrate. If he, again, had party feelings to indulge, and magistrates possessed feelings similar to those of other men; they had their prejudices and party views; and any one of them imagining that the meeting had been called to pass resolutions, incompatible with his own sentiments might directly proclaim it to be illegal, and pursue those who attended it with the pains and penalties of felony! He begged pardon of the framers of this bill, but he must say, that a greater blunder in legislation was never committed, than to make men guilty of felony, not for any breach of the peace committed by them — not for any outrage or violence on their part, but at the will and on the discretion of a single magistrate. He would suppose the case of a meeting summoned by the sheriff or by five magistrates: who should regularly convene it. It might be imagined that such an assembly would be secure from any disturbance; yet a single magistrate, not friendly to the meeting, and intending to destroy it, might contrive to invalidate the whole proceeding. He would put to them a strong case. He might, for instance, send to the meeting a copyholder, who held lands to the value of 8,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* a year in the county; but who not being a freeholder or inhabitant householder, could not legally attend the meeting. In the case of a borough, a freehold of 50*l.* a year qualified a freeholder; yet none but a freeholder or inhabitant householder, or a baron in Scotland, was to be so qualified as to attend those meetings. Well, in this case, the magistrate might send either a copyholder or his own clerk. If any resolution were proposed which the magistrate did not like, he might make his proclamation, and strangers would be ordered to withdraw. He would then perhaps say, that he knew there was an individual who had no right to attend the meeting; but he would not name the party; for by this bill he was not bound to do so. He might even be called on to name at the time of so ordering strangers to withdraw; and would only reply, that he was not under the necessity of doing so; that he knew there were intruders, and that was sufficient. In a quarter of an hour, the magistrate might make another proclamation, and half an hour after that, every person remaining, if more than 12 in all, was declared a felon. What! was this the way to support the rights of the people of England? Was this no restriction upon their liberties? was this a measure framed in the spirit of the constitution? He would suppose, that at a county meeting—such a one, for instance, as that held in the castle-yard at York, there might be half a dozen strangers present. The magistrate makes his proclamation, takes his measures properly; in a quarter of an hour makes his second, in half an hour the half dozen are guilty of felony; and on what ground? Or he might disperse such a meeting on speculation, and if a few disqualified persons afterwards showed themselves who either had or had not been present, the magistrate might say, “I find I am right; my proclamation was a proper step, here are 6 persons neither freeholders nor inhabitant householders; you must all of you be transported for seven years. And these were the rights, the unrestricted rights of the people of England! So well were they protected, that those who met to exercise them inevitably subjected themselves to the risk and penalty of being transported! It had been said that private rooms were excepted. He did not mean to quarrel with the exception; but he meant to say, that the views of the framers of this measure in making that exception were most inconsistent. It was said that great discontents existed in the country; that great dissatisfactions among the people (it was but too true) were increasing. If so, could any thing be more improper than to allow these troubles, discontents, and dissatisfactions to rankle and fester in private, where government could know nothing about them? While the public expression of complaint was not to be permitted, this bill was to allow its utterance in private. This appeared to him to be the way to increase and not to diminish the danger. Although he did not himself at all approve of any proceeding of the kind, yet, if the country was agitated, if that agitation arose from the meeting of vast bodies of persons, whose discontents were too liable to excite disturbance, he would much rather see a measure aiming altogether at public meetings, or suppressing them entirely for a time, than one which protected the disaffected, merely because they met in private where they could not be got at. He wished also to say a few words on another clause, not merely as it now stood, but also as it existed before the bill had been revised by the committee. It was originally intended that the clause should only extend to meetings holden for the purpose of deliberating upon public grievances, or of considering or agreeing to petitions, addresses, and remonstrances; but it now extended to all meetings which had relation to trade, manufacture, business, or profession; so that if any number of individuals residing in different parts of the country wished to deliberate on a matter relating to their trade or business, they could only do it by calling meetings in their respective parishes. For instance, if any gentleman wished to express his opinions upon the policy or impolicy of an increased tax on wool, he could not go out of his parish to do it, unless, indeed, a county meeting should be called for the subject; to which, in his opinion, a county meeting would not be inclined to pay any considerable attention. Lord Sheffield, who was so much interested in the wool trade, and had done so much to promote it, might wish to have a meeting of the wool growers, to petition parliament against the tax on wool; but the bill now before the House, if passed into a law, would prevent him from going to such a meeting if it was out of his parish, and would prevent others from coming to it if it was holden within it. This circumstance alone would go far to prove, that this bill, was what it had been originally called, a bill exclusively to establish parish meetings; and being so, he would ask, whether the rights of the people were not violated by it? Was it to be argued that their meetings would be more deliberative and respectable, because overseers of parishes were to act as presidents at them; or that meetings over the parish vestry-table, to discuss public grievances, would be of greater utility than meetings assembled on the principles of our ancestors? If it was not the intention of ministers so to argue, then their division of the country into parishes and townships was perfectly absurd and ridiculous. A right hon. and learned gentleman in the course of the debate had said, that all government was founded upon a compromise of individual rights, and had argued from this principle, that, even if some of the rights of the people were sacrificed by this bill, which that right hon. and learned gentleman would by no means allow, the interest of the state demanded that they should be so sacrificed, in order to put down the discontents which existed, and to promote the general security of the country. But in what manner could this bill tend to soothe the irritated feelings of the people, or remove the dissatisfaction which a system of misrule had excited among them? In what manner could it tend to the security of the country that public meetings should be abolished, when it was well known that they were the channels through which government most easily became apprised of the feelings of the governed, and when according to the acknowledgment of the right honourable and learned gentleman himself, it was from what occurred at the meeting at Manchester that his majesty's ministers were apprised of the disaffection which prevailed there? He did not object to this bill as putting down large meetings in populous manufacturing towns, but as putting down all meetings of every kind and in every place, at the will and discussion of a single magistrate. He also objected to it as furnishing a bad precedent to future times, and as forming a part of that novel system, which ministers were introducing to coerce the country. Its tendency was to produce any thing but conciliation, as it robbed the people of those rights which they had enjoyed ever since they were a people, and to which more than any other they felt themselves attached. He would not enter into the question how far the exigencies of the times required a measure like the present, now that it was conceded by a right hon. gentleman opposite, to be an infraction on the liberties of Englishmen; he would only put it to the House to consider, whether, after the manner in which it had defended its liberties against a foreign foe, and resisted, during five and twenty years, all the attacks which he could make upon them, it was prepared to see them fall at once before such beings as Hunt and Cobbett? It was paying too high a compliment to those individuals to suppose such a sacrifice to be necessary; but it really appeared as if ministers paid them that compliment by the measures which were taken to preserve the country from their machinations. For these reasons he should vote against the bill.

The Attorney General supposed that his hon. and learned friend had not read the bill before the House with the attention which he generally conferred upon subjects of this nature, from the vague and incorrect ideas which he had formed regarding it. For his own part he should not have arisen at so late an hour in the evening, and after all that had been previously said upon this subject, had he not felt it necessary to say a few words in reply to his hon. and learned friend who had just sat down. His hon. and learned friend had asserted, that public meetings were not dangerous in themselves, but only indicative of the existence of danger; and had deduced as a corollary from that proposition, that, as far as public meetings were concerned, no legitimate measures were necessary. He did not wish to misrepresent his hon. and learned friend, but he certainly understood that to be the sum of his observation. His hon. and learned friend had said that public meetings were not dangerous. If that were the case, parliament had been wasting their time during all their late legislation, as that legislation went principally to prevent the recurrence of meetings accompanied with danger, such as had been seen at Manchester and elsewhere. For that purpose this bill with all its various details had been formed; and to that bill and its details his hon. and learned friend had made many objections. In his objections to the details, his hon. and learned friend had been particularly unfortunate; his first objection was, that "all meetings were made to depend upon the will of a single magistrate, who might arrest at them any individual whom he found expressing sentiments hostile to his own."

Where, however, did his hon. and learned friend find any thing in this bill which warranted such an objection? He would tell him, that he would find there nothing like it. He would indeed find that the magistrate was entitled to arrest any stranger who might attend without being entitled to do so, and to disperse the meeting if resistance were made to such an arrest. He would also find that the bill, so far from enabling a magistrate to arrest any individual who addressed a public meeting, only enabled him to arrest such as were propounding seditious and treasonable resolutions, and were not entitled to attend, much less address the meeting. This was all that his hon. and learned friend would find, and did this, he would ask, bear out his objection? The next objection made to the bill was, that a magistrate might dissolve a meeting upon speculation; that is, he might send into it some man not entitled to attend it, who, by staying beyond the limited time after proclamation made to depart, would give him the opportunity of dispersing it. To this objection he should, in the first place, reply, that a magistrate by this bill, had no absolute power to disperse a public meeting, but acted on his own responsibility. He was left to use the same discretion which magistrates at present possessed under the Riot act, and could no more use his discretionary powers on every occasion, than they could employ theirs where there was no riot. His hon. and learned friend put the astonishing case of a magistrate coming to a meeting accompanied by a person, whom he might have hired to come forward in order to render the meeting illegal. But to what did that tend? Would not that hired person by attending a meeting, at which he had not a right to be present, leave himself liable to a prosecution for a felony as well as any other stranger? Surely his hon. and learned friend had not read the bill before he made those observations; at least he had not read it with his usual attention. The last objection to the bill made by his hon. and learned friend was, that words relative to trades and manufactures were now inserted in it which it did not contain as it originally stood; and that those words, contrary as they were to its spirit, did not give those facilities to the discussion of trade questions, which were absolutely necessary. His hon. and learned friend had endeavoured to illustrate this objection by a reference to the wool-trade; now he would ask his hon. and learned friend what there was to prevent the wool-combers, at Leeds for instance, from meeting on any subject connected with their manufactures, in their town-hall? Was not that mode of meeting left open to them? and therefore did the bill take from them any right which was beneficial to their interests? Did not the measure leave all meetings held within doors unshackled? It was not necessary for any trade to meet in the open air, to the number of 10,000. They might discuss their interests as well, if not better within rooms, where the provisions of the bill allowed them to assemble when they chose, and as freely and numerously as they pleased. He had now answered all the objections, plausible objections he would allow them to be, of his hon. and learned friend; and he therefore trusted that the House would think that he had not trespassed needlessly on its indulgent attention.

Mr. Scarlett explained, and maintained that he was fully borne out in the assertion, that a single magistrate had it in his power to disperse any meeting by the words of the clause, which enable a justice to take any person into custody "who shall wilfully and advisedly make any proposition, or hold any discourse for the purpose of inciting or stirring up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the government and constitution of this realm as by law established." Now the words "inciting or stirring up to contempt of the person of his majesty" were none of the clearest: he had in the course of his professional practice known a man of the name of Lloyd to have been convicted of inciting the people to hatred of his majesty, who had merely written on the walls of the town in which he lived, and with whose corporation he had quarrelled, the words, "Damn all corporations." Now our lord the king being a corporation of himself, was included in this sweeping execration; and it was argued, that these words "Damn all corporations," were against his peace and dignity. The result of the conviction was, that the man was imprisoned for two years in Lancaster-castle. On similar grounds it was to be feared that magistrates would act in the execution before the House.

The Attorney General maintained, that he had replied to the arguments of his

hon. and learned friend, as originally put, and that the objection now urged was equally fallacious.

Mr. Denman begged leave to remind his hon. and learned friend, that he had stated the same objection in the committee, and that no satisfactory answer had been given to it up to that moment. The strong objection to the bill in his mind was, that it authorized a single magistrate to disperse any county meeting at his own discretion, whether it had been called by the lieutenant, the sheriff, or any other legal authority. Such was the principle that pervaded all the enactments of the Bill. The answer attempted by his hon. and learned friend (the Solicitor-general) was, that the magistrate had not the power to dissolve the meeting immediately, but after an intermediate process. But had not the magistrate the power to order any person into custody who had used expressions which would justify him, in his own opinion; and who was the judge as to the propriety of his interference? not the sheriff, but the single magistrate himself. The functions of the sheriff were therefore destroyed by the bill. He also strongly opposed the clause indemnifying magistrates for any deaths which might ensue from the dispersion of meetings. The clause to which he alluded authorized magistrates to disperse meetings, and to hurt, maim, and kill those who remained after the proclamation, and this was done, not by a direct enactment, but by implication. It had been said that the same was done in the Riot act. It was no such thing. The power of dispersing a crowd in the Riot act was not given to the magistrate by implication, but in so many express words and sentences: nor was the power of inflicting the other penalties allowed to them till after opposition was made to the attempt to disperse. The clause in question was nothing better than a fraud upon the House, and was introduced to legalize acts of violence. There was no such law at present in existence; for if there had been any such law, there would have been no occasion for any magistrates to have complained (as the papers on the table showed that some magistrates had complained) of a want of power wherewith to put down the evils which surrounded them. "But they had the power of dispersing a meeting in their commission of peace." This was not the fact; the commission gave them power to apprehend and commit to custody, but not to disperse a meeting of their countrymen. "But they had it by the statute of Henry 7th." There was no statute of Henry 7th referring to this point, and therefore he conceived his hon. and learned friend had made a mistake, and intended the statute of Henry 4th, c. 13. Even this statute gave a magistrate no such power as he contended for. That clause, therefore, which gave them the power of dispersal by implication, also conferred upon them the right to commit manslaughter by implication. These, however, were objections in detail: he would now state why he was hostile to the bill itself. He was hostile to it because it was inefficient for all the purposes for which it was provided: for the protection of the loyal it was not sufficient, and the leaders of the seditious meetings were so well aware of its impotency, that even now they were laughing it to scorn: they knew that itinerant orators could still be heard in private rooms, and were therefore, aware that they themselves were untouched by it. Though inefficient, however, to protect the loyal and repress the ill-disposed, it would operate as a bar and as an exclusion to all discussion among those who had really grievances requiring redress: it would shut up against them the outlet of complaint and leave them without any hopes of being heard. Besides, he could not forget that it came before them accompanied by others of a suspicious nature; that it proceeded from a cabinet that had discussed the question, whether a censorship ought to be established in England; and that it was one of six bills which went to overthrow all that was valuable in the constitution, and to produce a greater alarm than that which they were nominally intended to suppress.

Mr. R. Martin stated, that the Irish members had come over to defend the constitution of the country. He acknowledged that he was in some degree an alarmist, and conceived that great danger would ensue to the constitution of England and Ireland if the present measures did not pass. It might be taken as a proof of his sincerity, that he was ready to bear any share of unpopularity which the course he took might excite, and he knew that in England it would be attended with no popularity—but he was convinced that he should earn great popularity in the county which he had the honour to represent, for having contributed to save the constitution of England and Ireland by the passing of such acts. Had he been a lawyer, like some of the worthy gentlemen opposite, he would have written a note to the attorney and solicitor general, telling them, "I approve of much of what your bill contains, and I request a conference, that we may see whether we may not so arrange the rest as to come to an agreement." He complained, that as it was now sure the bill would pass into a law, it was acting improperly towards the people to teach them to believe that the system under which they would have to live was unconstitutional.

The Solicitor General expressed his surprise at some observations that had fallen from his hon. and learned friend who had spoken last but one. He would ask, upon what ground his hon. and learned friend had asserted that his majesty's government had held a consultation on the subject of instituting a censorship of the press? This was a charge which ought surely not to have been made upon light grounds. He had charged him with mis-quoting the act of Henry 7th, and had suggested the act of Henry 4th as the only one applicable to the power of magistrates. But the act of Henry 7th gave the magistrates the same power over unlawful assemblies as over riots. There was a statute of Henry 4th, he would admit, upon the same subject, which was confirmed by that of Henry 7th, so that he maintained his quotation was correct. As to the power of dispersion, it was given in the present bill precisely in the same terms as in the Riot act. His hon. and learned friend had said, that until the clause indemnifying justices in cases of killing and maiming, occurred, there was nothing in the bill that could lead them to suspect it of containing the power of dispersion—but did his hon. and learned friend forget the proclamation, which was copied to the very words from the Riot act, and which called upon the people to disperse on pain of being subjected to the penalties of the bill? "Our sovereign lord the king chargeth and commandeth all persons here assembled immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business." Yet, with this proclamation before him, his hon. and learned friend said, that there was not a word about dispersing till he came to this clause. A similar clause was introduced in 1796, and in 1817 a proclamation similar to the present was provided, followed by a power of dispersion expressed word for word in the same language with that which was now objected to. His hon. and learned friend had also said that the bill might easily be defeated—that he denied. The object of the bill was, to prevent assemblies of thirty or forty thousand persons from meeting to display the physical force of the country, to the terror of the peaceable inhabitants and the encouragement of the disaffected. It was not proposed to prevent itinerant orators from speaking in rooms or apartments; they might speak there still, though, if they inculcated doctrines subversive of the government they were answerable to the law.—For these reasons, he did not hesitate to express his confidence that none of the arguments offered that night would be successful in persuading the House that the bill was inadequate to the object for which it was introduced.

Mr. Denman repeated his assertion, that none of the authorities referred to by his hon. and learned friend, allowed the magistrate to use direct force for the dispersion of meetings.

Lord Folkestone begged leave to recall the attention of the House to the consideration of the general principle of the bill. At the same time it could not be a matter of wonder, that the House, in discussing the principle of this measure, should have deviated into the consideration of particular clauses, when it was recollected that the bill in its progress through the several stages had undergone so many changes; when it was recollected that it had been twice recommitted; that its details had occupied the House two whole nights; and that it had been altered from what it was originally intended to be. In the course of the debate, he had been surprised to find that it was not intended by all the advocates of the bill to support it on the principle originally laid down by the noble lord, that it was not an infraction of the constitution; for the right hon. the president of the board of trade, seemed to think that it was an infraction of the constitution. The right hon. gentleman, sitting there as one of his majesty's ministers, had told the House that the bill was an infraction of the constitution, and that it was a necessary measure to protect the country against the baneful effect of those reforming principles that had been growing up ever since the French revolution. This statement was made in the place by a cabinet minister, and yet ministers had allowed the evil to go on so long without making any attempt to arrest its progress till now, when they came down to the House with six or seven bills at once; of which the present was not perhaps the most alarming. A right hon. and learned gentleman had adopted a course of argument somewhat different: he had contended that the bill not only was no infringement of the liberties of the people, but that it was perfectly congenial to the constitution of the country. Astonishing as this doctrine was, he (lord Falkstone) had been still more astonished at the right hon. and learned gentleman's definition of liberty, as applied to the argument which he had endeavoured to maintain. He had defined liberty to be potestas faciendi quicquid per leges licet; by which it was admitted that a man had a right to do whatever was lawful (a pretty narrow definition of liberty, by-the-bye.) By this bill, however, a man might be prevented from doing what was perfectly legal by the intrusion of one stranger, or by the interference of a single magistrate; and how then could it be said that that man was at liberty to do quicquid per leges licet? But the subsequent part of the right hon. and learned gentleman's speech was not less surprising. He had talked of new lights, and informed the House, in the language of the poet, that "a little learning was a dangerous thing;" After all the right hon. and learned gentleman had himself said upon the Catholic question, he was now prepared to recommend a different course of policy in the present instance. In arguing the Catholic question he had often stated to the House, "You have done so much, that you cannot go back again." Was it not the same with regard to the discontented part of the community now? By informing their minds, the country had enabled them to see the blots and flaws of the constitution, and the question now was, whether they should proceed to stop them from seeing, by penal enactments, or taking out those blots and flaws of the constitution, the existence of which the right hon. and learned gentleman himself did not deny? His hon. and learned friend below him had justly observed, that this measure, objectionable as it was in itself, was rendered still more dangerous by the other bills by which it was accompanied. One of those bills (the search for arms bill) enabled any magistrate or justice of the peace, in any of those counties in England or Scotland to which the measure was intended to be applicable, to give a warrant to a constable to break into a man's house at any hour of the night. By another of the bills now on the table, such restrictions were to be laid on the press as sufficiently indicated the spirit in which all the present measures originated. The hon. and learned gentleman had denied that there had been any discussion in the cabinet on the subject of establishing a censorship; but had the hon. and learned gentleman been a member of that cabinet which he had defended, he would have known that (as had been stated in another place by a person who must have known the fact) there had been a discussion on that subject, and that, though the measure was not decided on, still the question had been entertained. This measure relating to the press, as well as the others now in progress, seemed to be a part of that continental system which was opposed to all representative governments. He believed, indeed it had been stated by the noble lord, that the assent of this country had been given in words, though not in substance, because in substance it was not in the power of the Crown, without the concurrence of the executive government, to assent to all the propositions of the Holy Alliance; and connected as the noble lord was known to be by negotiation, perhaps also in forms and manners with foreign courts, it was not impossible that measures originating with the noble lord might partake of that policy which prevailed in those courts. He begged the House to consider, while they were passing these bills that they were intended to meet an evil, into the origin and circumstances of which ministers had twice this season refused to grant an inquiry. Some persons referred that evil to the distresses of the times, while others maintained that it proceeded from a bad principle that had been growing up in this country since the French revolution; but, whichever of those opinions might be correct, he trusted the House would not consent to pass these restrictive measures without knowing more of the cause that required them.

Mr. Honeywood said, he represented a very populous and a very loyal county, and he should ill justify the confidence which his constituents reposed in him, if he did not express his sentiments on this bill. Many arguments had been used to show, that the population of this country did not entertain loyal sentiments; but for his own part, he considered it a libel on the people of England to say that they were disloyal, or disaffected to the constitution. That they were disaffected he would admit; but to whom were they disaffected? Not to their king; not to their country; but to his majesty's ministers. If that was a crime, he was also guilty; for he was equally disaffected to them. To his majesty's person he would pay the most loyal allegiance, but to his majesty's ministers he would pay no allegiance. When he saw them making innovations on the constitution of the country, he conceived it his duty, as a loyal subject, and a member of parliament, to oppose their proceedings; and, accordingly, he now felt himself called upon to raise his voice against the present measure, which was not only an innovation on the constitution, but was subversive of the liberties of the country.

Mr. G. Bankes supported the bill. He thought the discontent which was at present so prevalent, arose in a great measure from distress; but to prove that it was not the less dangerous on that account, he quoted the following passage from Bacon:—"Lucan noteth well the state of Rome before the civil war—

'Hinc usura vorax, rapidumque in tempore scenus.

'Hinc concussa fides et multis utile bellum.'

"This same multis utile bellum is an assured and infallible sign of a state disposed to sedition and troubles; and if this poverty and broken estate in the better sort be joined with a want and necessity in the mean people, the danger is imminent and great; for the rebellions of the belly are the worst." As to the question of religion, there was and could be but one opinion on the subject. The House should come to some decided vote. The best interests of humanity were engaged in the contest, and if gentlemen did not choose to legislate on so important a subject, the dissolution of all law would be the consequence. Those who did not protect religion must partake in the consequences of its fall. Those who did not rise in its defence must share in the misfortunes and the danger necessarily consequent upon its ruin. He honestly and fairly stated his opinion. He believed the measures proposed to be calculated for the public good, and should support them.

Lord Morpeth said, that in the last stage of this important measure he wished to be allowed to offer a few words to the House. He was the more anxious to obtain that permission, because he was under the painful necessity of differing from many of those for whom he felt the most sincere respect and esteem. But occasions might occur, when the feelings of personal friendship and of party attachment might be allowed to bend to a strong and imperious sense of public duty. Such an occasion was the present, whether viewed with regard to the awful and critical state of the country, or considered with reference to the nature of those measures which were proposed to counteract the evils and avert the dangers of our situation: for that gentleman must have viewed the measure that was now proposed through a very different medium from that in which he had been constrained to see it, if he considered either its adoption or its rejection as an unmixed or unbalanced good. But called upon to form his opinion from the information submitted to the House, from the intelligence that he had obtained from other sources, from the general notoriety that prevailed, he was led irresistibly, however reluctantly, to the conclusion that the meetings which had lately disgraced and distracted the manufacturing districts in the northern parts of the country, if not suppressed by the strong arm of new legislative enactments, must be put down by the much more to be dreaded alternative, the interposition and exercise of military force. With this conviction upon his mind, though disapproving of some of the clauses of the bill, and wishing that its duration had been confined to a shorter period he must give his support to the present measure.—Into the nature, character, and complexion of the meetings that had lately occurred he would not now inquire, as that part of the subject had been completely analyzed by preceding speakers; but he might inquire into the grievance that was the general object of complaint; what was it but the existing constitution of this country? and what are the means by which this grievance is proposed to be removed? terror and intimidation resulting from the display of physical and organized force. For what are the words inserted in resolutions agreed upon some time previous to the meeting at Manchester? "They (meaning the reformers) will be satisfied with nothing short of the constitution, the whole constitution, and nothing but the constitution: that annual parliaments, and universal suffrage constitute an essential part of the constitution, and are their rightful inheritance, that they shall consider their wrongs unredressed, and their rights withheld until they are possessed of such annual parliaments, and such universal suffrage." They then proceed to say, that they look for redress only from themselves, and that they are possessed of ample means. No petition to parliament, no address to the Prince Regent. What is it but to declare that the reformation of the constitution is to be effected by the introduction of a principle calculated to lead to confusion and anarchy, through the medium and agency of physical force? But he is told that these doctrines of annual parliaments, and universal suffrage have met with the sanction of many great and distinguished authorities, among the chief Mr. Selden has been named, the most learned as he has been termed in a learned age. He had not been able to refer to the particular passage, but if Mr. Selden supported these doctrines no man ever placed a greater constraint upon his feelings and principles; for he was, as is well known, an able and distinguished member of a parliament the most reverse of annual, of one which debarred the people of this country for a longer period than ever before or since occurred, from exercising their right of suffrage either universal or particular. There is also the authority of the duke of Richmond, and the very respectable name of Mr. Granville Sharp; but if there be a parallel between the theories, is there any parallel between the times, and the circumstances with which they are attended? is there no difference between propounding a theory, and asserting a right? is there no difference between discussing a point in a treatise, or submitting it as a proposition to either House of parliament, and claiming it as an integral part of the constitution before an assembled multitude, suffering under privation and want, and exposed to all the artifices of disaffection and malignity? But this is a system of coercion and restraint. That may be true both in its general and particular acceptation; all regulation, all law, all duty, allegiance itself is the diminution of some right, is the limitation of some power inherent in every individual; but the question is, whether such restrictions are not generally necessary, and whom and what they restrain? If the effect be to coerce those who are gaining a flagitious livelihood by preying upon the credulity and inflaming the passions of the suffering classes of the community: if it check their career, and arrest their progress, it is a measure not of rigour but of prevention. If it also have the effect of suppressing such meetings as that which occurred at Manchester, (for it must be remembered that the leaders upon that occasion did not convene merely the inhabitants of that town. The good sense and moderation of some might have checked the turbulence and disaffection of others. It was necessary to collect the scattered and diverging rays of disaffection into one focus; it was necessary to infuse into the mixture of Manchester the pure and unadulterated spirit of neighbouring reform,)—if it suppress meetings of this character, it is a measure not of coercion, but of protection. But it infringes in some degree the liberty of the subject. He admitted it; and it was with reluctance that he gave his consent to some of the provisions of the bill; but does it not guard against greater infringements, against more daring encroachments, encroachments which if not sturdily resisted must involve all the liberties of this country in one undistinguished mass of ruin and desolation?—But he had heard much general declamation about liberty; he wished it to be more accurately defined. He remembered Mr. Burke, not writing at the time that he might be supposed to be led away by his horror and disgust at the excesses of revolutionary France, but in the year 1774, in his address to the electors of Bristol, thus describing liberty: "Liberty is the distinguishing part of our constitution: to preserve it inviolate is the peculiar duty, the proper trust of every member of the House of Commons. But it is that liberty, and only that liberty I mean which is connected with order, and that not only exists with order and with virtue, but cannot at all exist without them." Mr. Burke could not have intended that species of order which proceeds from the regular procession, the marshalled files, and organized battalions of the Manchester reformers; nor that species of virtue which is to be collected from the inflammatory harangues of the demagogues of the day, much less that virtue which is to be extracted from those publications, the noxious exhalations of the press, which, not content with simple infidelity, insult and revile the God whom they renounce and abjure.—But it is a system of conciliation that is required. He confessed that he did not see that a system of conciliation was incompatible with measures of promptitude and vigour. He had yet to learn why parliament and the government might not lend a patient ear to the distresses of the people, and endeavour by all attainable means to alleviate and diminish them. Why they might not upon the basis of reciprocal advantage, establish a more close commercial intercourse with neighbouring nations; why they might not avail themselves of the bright prospect that was opening to the people of South America, or carry the spirit of commercial enterprise into those almost untraversed seas which wash the numerous and scattered islands in the Eastern Ocean: why they might not employ the superabundant population of some districts in this country in works of practical and durable utility.—But the urgent and immediate duty was that of protection, not merely with the view of defending that manufacturing and commercial capital, the nature of which had been so well illustrated in the very able speech lately made by the member for Taunton, in order to tranquillize its alarm, to ensure its confidence, to perpetuate its stay; but it assumes a wider range, the House is called upon to extend the shield of its protection over the quiet, the loyal, the industrious, the uncomplaining part of the community, and not them alone, but to extend it over the unthinking, the deluded and the infatuated, to endeavour to reclaim and rescue them from the grasp and ascendancy of men, their professed and pretended instructors and teachers, but in fact their bitterest and deadliest enemies—men, to whom if free scope were allowed for their pious and patriotic exertions, would purify religion by blasphemy, and renovate the constitution by revolution.

The gallery was cleared for a division, but the House did not divide. During the exclusion of strangers Mr. Scarlett and some other members rose to address the House. Mr. Lambton perceiving this, observed, that if the House attempted to debate with closed doors, he should move that it do adjourn. On our re-admission to the gallery,

Mr. Scarlett was speaking. He said, that if the present measures were calculated to produce the effect proposed, there was not a man in the House who would support them more readily than himself. But, upon the most serious consideration, he was convinced they would have a contrary effect, and therefore it was that he felt bound to oppose them. He did not pretend to deny that the state of the country was such as to call for the enactment of some legislative measures—that the state of the manufacturing districts did not call for the interposition of government. But he felt convinced that the measures proposed by ministers were not calculated to remedy the existing evils. Many hon. members had expressed their reluctance to support these measures, and he was glad to hear them say so, as it was an admission that they were a restraint upon the liberties of the people. But how did this admission agree with the statements of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Plunkett), that these bills were brought forward in the spirit of the constitution [Hear, hear!]? Where did the constitution say that meetings were to be limited to 10,000 or to 30,000 persons? Did the operation of the present measures go to prevent large meetings in counties? No: the present measures went to suppress meetings not contemplated by the proposers of them. If, then, they were unnecessarily trenching on the people's rights, it was not yet too late to retread their steps; it was not too late to arouse themselves from the unfounded panic and alarm which had been spread abroad. It was urged, that the meetings themselves were not so much to be dreaded, but that they were an indication of public feeling. If these meetings were to be put down, then one indication of public feeling was put an end to. The hon. and learned member, after some farther observations, asked, what was to prevent any magistrate from coming in and dispersing one of these meetings tolerated under the act? If such meeting were to remain beyond the quarter of an hour allowed to strangers to withdraw, or if the parishioners were to remain half an hour beyond the order to disperse, then the whole of those who remain were to be accused of felony. Suppose, for instance, that a magistrate were to send a volunteer, he would not use the harsh term a spy; suppose such a person were to be sent into a meeting, would not this at once destroy the liberty of meeting in this way? The hon. and learned member concluded by imploring the House not to adopt measures subversive of the liberties of the people, merely for the purpose of putting down such persons as Hunt and Cobbett, and other orators and writers equally contemptible.

The Attorney General observed, that his hon. and learned friend had argued that public meetings were dangerous, but yet that they ought not to be suppressed by legislative measures [No, no!]. This was what he understood his hon. and learned friend to have said. The hon. and learned member went on to defend the measure. The magistrates were vested with the power of dispersing the meeting if strangers refused to withdraw. The magistrates were, however, responsible for the exercise of this power. They could not disperse the meeting unless, as under the provisions of the Riot act where there was a riot [Hear! from the Opposition]. Gentlemen might cheer, but he maintained that the proposed measure provided as fully against abuse as the Riot act did, or could do. He believed that this was not an irreligious age, and that if religion was attacked by the disaffected, it was because they conceived it a main pillar of government.

The House then divided: For the third reading, 318; Against it, 95: Majority, 218.

When we were re-admitted into the gallery, we found

Mr. J. Wharton on his legs, proposing a clause relative to the admission of reporters to public meetings. It went to authorize the attendance of reporters to newspapers at public meetings, although strangers to the place, on their sending in their name to the magistrate twenty-four hours before the meeting.

Lord Castlereagh objected to the introduction of reporters as a distinct body recognized by the legislature and invested with particular privileges. If strangers to the county, parish, or district, the inhabitants of which respectively composed the meeting, he saw no reason for considering them in any other light than strangers by any clause in the bill. The magistrates might grant them facilities of admission if they saw no objection. It was true, as had been stated by an hon. member, that the reports of the proceedings of public meetings in the public journals had sometimes warned the country of its danger; but it was at the same time not to be denied, that the danger had often been increased by alarming and fallacious reports. He was unwilling to allow this class of persons any rights by this act which they did not previously possess; and thus to give a pretence for the admission of strangers.

Mr. Tierney said, that the number might be limited to three or four, and thus a part of the noble lord's objections might be obviated; but the noble lord objected to the principle of admitting reporters altogether [No, no!].

Lord Castlereagh said, he merely objected to the claim of a right. A magistrate, who saw no reason for excluding them, might grant them facilities of admission.

Mr. Tierney did not see how a magistrate, without some authority in the act, could authorize the attendance of strangers.

Lord Castlereagh said, the magistrates could introduce their own officers and assistants, though strangers, and if they chose they might bring in the reporters among them.

Mr. Alderman Waithman said, the reason which the noble lord had given for the exclusion of reporters was, in his opinion, the strongest ground for their admission. The noble lord had stated, that fallacious reports had been propagated, and produced danger. Now, as some reports must always go abroad, would it not be better to admit reporters from respectable newspapers, who were men of education, who had characters at stake, and would be careful to avoid misrepresentation, than allow statements to get into circulation through the medium of individuals less qualified?

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that the magistrate could not connive at reporters when strangers were ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Hume contended, that by the bill, the reporter by attending a meeting would incur the penalties of a stranger, which was fine and imprisonment, nor could the magistrate protect him against the informer who would share the fine. He would propose a clause obviating the objection to the clause under discussion, which gave a right to attend, while it at the same time protected the reporters from the penalties attaching on other strangers. He would propose to give the magistrates a power to refuse or grant admission to reporters at their discretion. The noble lord had not brought forward the clause which he had given hopes to expect on a former night; and therefore he (Mr. H.) felt it his duty to propose one. The hon. member was proceeding, when

The motion of Mr. Wharton was put and negatived.

Mr. Hume then moved that the following clause be brought up:—"Provided also, and be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the lord-lieutenant, governor, or custos rotulorum, sheriff, steward depute, convener, justice of the peace, or other officer, convening any meeting, or presiding at any meeting, called agreeably to the provisions of this bill, on application from the editors of newspapers, in writing, stating their names and places of abode, to grant authority under their hands to a reporter for each editor so applying, to attend any such meeting, provided always that such reporters shall conduct themselves at such meetings in an orderly and quiet manner."—The House divided: For the bringing up the clause, 88; Against it, 262: Majority, 174.

Mr. Hutchinson said, that he did not wish at so late an hour, and after so protracted a debate, to detain the House by going at any length into argument in support of the clause to exempt Ireland from the operation of the bill. He had already troubled them at the opening of the debate on that night with some of the many observations which might be adduced to prove how entirely unnecessary, and totally inapplicable this particular bill, and the whole of the noble lord's measures of coercion and penalty, were to that country, in reference to its present avowed state of tranquillity and submission to the law. He had already shown that there was a total and absolute difference in the relative situation of the two countries (Great Britain and Ireland) at this moment. That not one of the causes assigned by the noble lord for introducing these bills, nor by any member who supported them, had been, or could be, stated as existing in Ireland, for whose peaceable state the noble lord and the secretary for Ireland had themselves voluntarily vouched. He had repeatedly challenged ministers and the members for Ireland who supported them, to contradict him if in error, and to state boldly why they were disposed to inflict these bills on that unoffending and much-sinned-against country. They had not answered that challenge, they could not. The right hon. gentleman, member for the university of Dublin, had, indeed, replied to that appeal, by stating some doctrines better calculated for the divan of Constantinople, or for the kingdom of Morocco, than for the enlightened wisdom of the parliament of this empire. He reminded the House of the temperate manner in which he had made his appeal to that gentleman, and he desired them to contrast it with the heat and peevishness with which he had been answered, with a want of patience, he must say, but little creditable to a gentleman whose talents and learning pointed him out as likely to become one of the most distinguished judges of the country. He assured the House that he had been perfectly serious in that appeal, which he understood the right hon. member to have answered by stating "that the members for Ireland had agreed to the extension of these bills to their country, because they felt that there existed a system of violence and intimidation." Where? in Ireland! would the right hon. gentleman assert any such thing? he had indeed, and doubtless to the great satisfaction of ministers, given his opinion as to the illegality of the Manchester meetings, when the question really interesting to the public and to the constitution was, how that meeting had been dispersed, whether the manner of dispersing it by the magistrates had been illegal, and attended by circumstances of the utmost brutality committed against the people, by which lives were lost, and men, women, and children, most inhumanly treated; but the right hon. gentleman resisted any such inquiry, and gave the weight of his talents to support ministers in stifling all investigation, and in their deep laid plans against the liberties and constitution of the people of England; but above all, had willingly joined with the minister without the shadow of an excuse to extend these claims to his unfortunate and unoffending country, where, Mr. Hutchinson said, he hoped, he and the rest of the Irish members who agreed with the right hon. gentleman, would be called to account for their extraordinary conduct with regard to this bill and the whole of the system of the noble lord. The right hon. gentleman had talked of exclusive loyalty and exclusive patriotism. Mr. H. said he believed there was such a thing as fashion in loyalty, such a thing as occasional loyalty, that for himself he did not lay claim to the credit of exclusive patriotism, but he confessed he should be rejoiced to have had it in his power to induce the right hon. member to give with him a patriot's vote on the present question. The right hon. gentleman had made use of the very hackneyed observation of a "little learning is a dangerous thing;" in his (Mr. H.'s) opinion, extensive information and super-eminent talents misapplied, were not more dangerous than reprehensible. The right hon. gentleman had stated, that the present was not the first occasion in which they had differed in opinion. He was not aware to what he alluded. They had, indeed, differed in opinion as to the noble lord's bills against the liberty of the press, and the sacred right of petitioning, but above all, as to extending these hateful measures to Ireland, where there had not been even one solitary instance of a tumultuary meeting on parliamentary reform, or on commercial and manufacturing difficulties, nor one in consequence of the proceedings at Manchester on the 16th of August, which had created such a flame, and had given rise to so many meetings in Great Britain, and which meetings were stated as the main foundation for all these measures. He certainly considered it an unnecessary insult and cruelty practised against Ireland, to extend the training bill, and that against seditious and blasphemous publications there, where there had not been a single instance of training, nor a single trial for any such publication; yet the right hon. gentleman approved of the extension of these bills to Ireland, which Mr. Hutchinson was happy to oppose with all his might. There was, indeed, another occasion, a very signal one too, on which he was proud to have differed from the right hon. gentleman, it was on the investigation into the conduct of an Irish county member, which occupied the attention of the House during a part of last session. The right hon. gentleman was absent during the whole of that investigation, but he afterwards attended in his place, and, after as able a display as perhaps he had ever made in parliament, or on any occasion, he supported that speech with as objectionable a vote as had ever been given in the House of Commons. On these occasions, Mr. H. said, he had on his part too, no reason to regret having most decidedly differed both in opinion and conduct with the right hon. gentleman—a difference of opinion which he hoped would be recorded, and on measures which he flattered himself would never be forgotten by the people, notwithstanding the able attempt of the right hon. gentleman to palliate and defend them. With regard to the hint from the right hon. gentleman, not to mix up the Catholics with this question; perhaps he did not know, that, as the bill originally stood, there could have been no Catholic meeting to petition the legislature, and that, since the first presentation of it to the House, a clause had been introduced to remedy this defect.—After some other observations, Mr. Hutchinson concluded by asking leave to bring up his clause.

Mr. Plunkett assured the hon. and gallant general, for so he believed, without meaning to deny his learning, he must call him [a laugh], that he did not feel his temper at all ruffled. The hon. and gallant member quarrelled with the observations he had made to the House; but the hon. and gallant member should recollect, that he had been reluctantly compelled to address the House in consequence of an appeal from the hon. and gallant member. But the hon. and gallant member complained, that his argument was bad. If it was so, he assured the hon. and gallant member it was not intentionally so. He was called upon to say, why the Bill should extend to Ireland, when Ireland was not disturbed? Why, many English members for counties perfectly tranquil, voted for the extension of the Bill to the whole kingdom,—and with reason. A system of violence and intimidation was now pursued, which, though his country was not deemed particularly timid, would have its effect there also. It was like the stone thrown into the water—circle succeeded circle; every new proselyte added to its power, every one who was terrified became the instrument of intimidation; if it went on, he knew not where it would end. He regretted the less the extension of the bill to Ireland, because all legitimate meetings there, being generally held in rooms, would not be affected by the bill.

Mr. R. Martin contended for the necessity of including Ireland in the operation of this bill, for the purpose of more effectually ensuring the stability of both countries.

Mr. Tierney wished to know on what principle it was, that if, in 1817, when the danger was greater than it was now, Ireland was excluded, while now, with no other difference than that she was more tranquil, the bill was to be extended thither? She was then open to all the mischiefs which were now held forth, and the additional danger of Spenceanism, which was no longer talked of.

Lord Castlereagh denied that the danger was greater in 1817 than it now was. It was now more systematic and dangerous. The measures were of a description to show that vigilance and permanent measures were necessary to suppress it. The extension to Ireland served to show the measures to be permanent and general.

(VOL. XLI.)

The House would, therefore, extend its protection to Ireland against an evil by which, though not now visited, she might be afflicted at no distant period.

Mr. Brougham said, it was a somewhat whimsical mode of arguing in the noble lord, when the necessity for strong measures was questioned, to hold up their severity as a proof of their necessity. In 1817, according to him, they had only the suspension of the Habeas Corpus—a common rod; now, said he, we have a whip of scorpions. The noble lord had forgotten that at the former period of alarm, the danger was deemed to be as great as at the present moment; so it was nearly in 1812; so it was in two or three cases during the war. If any gentleman would look into the reports of 1817, and measure the danger by the assertions to be found there, he would rest his claim to his vote in his declaration, whether the dangers were not greater then than now? There was then a central committee in London, directing an organized system of disaffection throughout the country; the Tower was summoned; magazines were collected; bullets provided, though as it afterwards turned out, in the foot of an old stocking. The bridges were to be blown up, and the soldiers to be smoked in their barracks. He was mixing up, perhaps, the detection with the assertions; but on the comparison of the present dangers with those described in three reports, he would rest his case. As to Ireland, he could not do better than borrow from his right hon. friend the remarks he had on former occasions applied to that country. It was a most ungracious act to that country to declare her suspected before there was a ground for suspicion; to hasten to declare her guilty, or about to become guilty, though there was not the shadow of a charge against her. As in private life there was no more certain way to make a man unworthy of trust, than to distrust him when there was no need, so he feared it would be found with Ireland. This was not the way to regain those who were lost, or to retain those who were well affected.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 14.

REFORM OF PARLIAMENT.] Lord John Russell rose and said: Mr. Speaker; The House will readily believe, that it is with no common feelings of anxiety that I rise to address them on the present occasion. In private life there is no task more painful, or more invidious, than to tell an individual of his faults; and those who have had occasion to address this House on any question connected with reform, have found it no less irksome a duty to point out defects, and require amendment, in a numerous assembly. This difficulty, I am aware, has been much increased since last year, when I gave notice of my intentions. It is impossible not to see, that there are two parties dividing the country, both greatly exasperated, and both going to extremes: the one making unlimited demands, and the other meeting them with total and peremptory denial: the one ready to encounter any hazard, for unknown benefits, and imaginary rights; the other ready to sacrifice, for present security, those privileges which our ancestors thought cheaply purchased with their blood.

Yet, if I were inclined to maintain, that this moment is peculiarly favourable for entertaining the question of reform, I might cite an authority much respected in this House; I mean that of Mr. Pitt. On bringing forward, in May, 1783, resolutions, two of which are not very different from those which I shall have the honour to propose to the House, he is said to have stated, "that the disastrous consequences of the American war, the immense expenditure of the public money, the consequent heavy burthen of taxes, and the pressure of all the collateral difficulties, produced by the foreign circumstances, gradually disgusted the people, and at last provoked them to 'turn their eyes inward on themselves,' in order to see if there was not something radically wrong at home, that was the cause of all the evils they felt from their misfortunes abroad. Searching for the internal sources of their foreign fatalities, they naturally turned their attention to the constitution under which they lived, and to the practice of it. Upon looking to that House, they found, that by length of time, by the origin and progress of undue influence, and from other causes, the spirit of liberty, and the powers of check and control upon the executive government were greatly lessened and debilitated. Hence clamours sprung up out of doors, and hence, as was perfectly natural in the moment of anxiety, to procure an adequate, and a fit remedy to a practical grievance, a spirit of speculation went forth, and a variety of schemes founded in visionary and impracticable ideas of reform, were suddenly produced."* This, however, did not deter Mr. Pitt from proposing a plan which he thought calculated to preserve the constitution from decay. Soon after he says, "An Englishman, who should compare the flourishing state of his country some twenty years ago, with the state of humiliation in which he now beholds her, must be convinced that the ruin, which he now deploras, having been brought on by slow degrees and almost imperceptibly, proceeded from something radically wrong in the constitution. Of the existence of a radical error no one seemed to doubt." Now, if we compare that period with the present, though indeed we have no foreign calamities to deplore, might I not urge that our expenditure and our burthens are quadrupled? Might I not show that undue influence is enormously increased? Might I not maintain, that we, the successful belligerent, are suffering all the calamities which defeat and disaster could produce?

But, Sir, however great may be the authority of Mr. Pitt, I cannot but feel that circumstances like those which he has described, have at present too much embittered our political parties, to allow me to think the present a favourable moment for a proposal of moderate reform. On that question, above all others, these extreme parties are in open hostility. The one would leave the fabric of the constitution, like the temples of Rome in her last days of empire, when they were found by the Goths covered with cobwebs, and falling to ruin from the neglect of their worshippers. The other party consists of those audacious men, who seek to raise their names from obscurity to fame, by setting a firebrand to this magnificent edifice, the glory of our Ephesus and of the world, which has been a sanctuary even to those who now wish for its destruction. Amidst these conflicting feelings, I know how hard it will be to obtain a hearing for those who wish to clear away the pollutions and impurities of an undue worship, but to preserve the fabric unimpaired. It may tend to reconcile these parties to my proposition, however, that those who have opposed any general plan of reform, should reflect that they have always said they were ready to correct a particular defect; and that those who are for the largest plan of reform, should recollect that sir Samuel Romilly, a warm reformer, said, a great object would be gained if only two or three government boroughs should be destroyed, and that the duke of Richmond, two years after he brought in his bill for universal suffrage, was the chief promoter of the bill for preventing corruption in the borough of Cricklade.

I will not now presume to enter on the abstract discussion whether uniform suffrage, or variety of suffrage, be the best principle of representative government. But thus much I think is clear, that a system founded upon variety of suffrage is the more liable of the two to corruption and decay. If the principle of uniform suffrage be adopted; if, for instance, all persons of 100*l.* a year have a vote, the system, whether good or bad, may continue always the same. But if the principle adopted be that of giving representatives to the largest cities, and richest towns, it is not possible but that cities must lose their importance, and trade transfer its seat. It is for this reason I conceive that the ancient practice of our constitution allowed the greatest facilities for changing the places entitled to send members to parliament. As towns rose into importance they received a writ from the Crown, requiring their services in the great council of the nation: others, which fell into poverty and insignificance, obtained an exemption from this charge; Maldon, in Essex, for example, received a charter allowing the borough no longer to send burgesses to this House, on condition of maintaining a bridge. But there was another mode by which large and important districts received the right of taking part in the deliberations of the state. No one, who has read the speech of Mr. Burke on conciliation with America, can forget his description, as true as it is eloquent, of the manner in which the privilege of having representatives has been conferred at various times by act of parliament. Wales, for two hundred years, was vexed by rapine and violence: fifteen penal statutes were passed against that unhappy country: the remedy was at last discovered; it was representation: Chester suffered the evils of exclusion from the sympathy and protection of her governors, and parliament gave representation; Durham a long time after was found to suffer from the same evils, and representation was still the remedy. The case of Haverfordwest offers, perhaps, the most direct precedent for what I shall hereafter move; for eight years after a representation was granted to Wales, a special clause in an act of the 34th and 35th Hen. 8th extended that privilege to Haverfordwest. In the Chester act, the preamble is most remarkable, and although before quoted, I cannot refrain from reading it. "To the king our sovereign lord, in most humble wise shown unto your excellent majesty, the inhabitants of your grace's county palatine of Chester, That whereas the said county palatine is and hath been always hitherto exempt, excluded, and separated out and from your high court of parliament, to have any knights and burgesses within the said court; by reason whereof the said inhabitants have hitherto sustained manifold disherisons, losses, and damages, as well in their lands, goods, and bodies, as in the good, civil, and political maintenance of the commonwealth of their said country: and forasmuch as the said inhabitants have always hitherto been bound by the acts and statutes, made and ordained by your said highness and your most noble progenitors, by authority of the said court, as far forth as other counties, cities, and boroughs have been that have had their knights and burgesses within your said court of parliament, and yet have had neither knight nor burgess there for the said county palatine; the said inhabitants, for lack thereof, have been oftentimes touched and grieved with acts and statutes made within the said court as well derogatory unto the most ancient jurisdictions, liberties, and privileges of your said county palatine, as prejudicial unto the common wealth, quietness, rest, and peace of your grace's most bounden subjects inhabiting within the same."—Now, if any member of this House should say, that to grant representatives to a part of the kingdom which has not hitherto enjoyed that right is a novelty in this country, I will refer him to this act, and show him the principle consecrated in a statute more than three hundred years ago. Or if any one should maintain that those who are not represented suffer no grievance, and require no redress, I will point to the preamble which I have just read, as an authentic and solemn record of the evils which flow from an exclusion from this House.

The wholesome practice of altering and enlarging the basis of representation continued till the end of the reign of Charles the 2nd. The Durham act was passed in the 25th year of that king; and Newark was for the first time summoned by writ during that reign. At the æra of the Revolution, this practice seems to have ceased. A day's proceedings in this House, which I need not detail, show that the great authors of the Revolution seem to have been unwilling to disturb the state of the representation: they probably thought that having cut off one of the three great branches of the government, it would be unsafe to attempt a change in one of the other two, and that any further alteration might shake the frame of the whole constitution. This disposition, which they brought into the practice of administration, seems, at the time of the union, to have been introduced into the substance of the law. From that period it has been generally considered that the king no longer enjoyed the right of sending writs to unrepresented places, as the proportion between the two countries of England and Scotland would by that means be changed. But by this departure, a necessary departure perhaps, from the old custom of England, two great evils have been introduced.

The first is, that small decayed boroughs, finding their suffrages eagerly sought for, have sold their seats to the highest bidder. The second is, that towns and districts have risen to great importance from their trade, population, and manufactures, and have not been admitted to parliament. A third evil, flowing from the two former, has also made itself very sensibly felt; namely, that the House of Commons has been found in various instances not to represent the people.

The first of these evils is too notorious to require that I should dwell upon it. In the instances of Shoreham, Cricklade, and Aylesbury, the abuse has been acknowledged by the House. In that of Aylesbury, as it appears from the evidence, a mark of infamy was affixed to the houses of those voters who were too honest to receive the usual bribe. Now, it is a mockery to say that, in such a case, the present system "works well." One of the least evils which can happen is, that the managers of the borough apply immediately to the secretary of the treasury, who recommends two friends of undoubted solvency and approved steadiness. This is one of the most respectable modes of these boroughs being represented; yet even this secures the votes of the members to government, and the patronage of the treasury to the managers of the borough. But, it often happens, that speculators expend the surplus of their wealth, or sometimes their whole fortune, to obtain a return to parliament. Their object in wishing for the honour of a seat in this House, is often far from being the public good. They have either debts owing them by government, which they require to be paid, or suspicious accounts which they wish to be settled; they either hope to repair their poverty with office, or to crown their fortune with a coronet. These are the men whom every good administration must dislike; for the necessity of conciliating their favour withdraws the government from that which ought to be their wish,—the task of gaining the unbought approbation of their country. We are often told that the publication of the debates is a corrective for any defect in the composition of this House. But to these men, such an argument can by no mean apply; the only part they take in the affairs of this House, is to vote in the majority; and it is well known that the names of the majority are scarcely ever published. Such members are unlimited kings, bound by no rule in the exercise of their power, fearing nothing from public censure in the pursuit of selfish objects, not even influenced by the love of praise and historical fame, which affects the most despotic sovereigns; but making laws, voting money, imposing taxes, sanctioning wars, with all the plenitude of power, and all the protection of obscurity; having nothing to deter them but the reproach of conscience, and every thing to tempt the indulgence of avarice and ambition.

The second evil is easily ascertained by looking at the history of those towns, which, during the last century, have grown up into importance. Thus, Manchester, which in 1778 had only 23,000 inhabitants, is now supposed to have 110,000. Leeds had, in 1775, 17,117; in 1811, 62,534. Birmingham had, in 1700, 15,032; in 1811, 85,753. Halifax had, in 1764, 41,000; in 1811, 73,000. Sheffield, in which the first brick-house was built in 1696, had, in 1811, 35,840 inhabitants. Now, Sir, it is very evident that these places suffer a serious inconvenience from the want of representatives. It is said, to be sure, that they are represented by the members for the counties in which they are situated. But those members, however well inclined they may be to do their duty to their constituents, are often of different station and habits of life. They have not the knowledge requisite for stating the grievances and the wants of manufacturers. And when we consider how many questions relating to trade, to the poor-laws, to the laws of combination, and of particular taxes, deeply affect the manufacturers, we cannot but allow the justice of their desire to be represented. Even should their grievances not be redressed, it will be a satisfaction to them to have their direct representatives in this House, who can state their complaints in the face of the ministers and of the nation. Sir, when this argument was pressed in 1782, it was victoriously answered, "Where is the petition from Manchester? Where is the petition from Sheffield?" I am aware that the argument now used will be very different. It will be said that the people of these towns are too clamorous; that we must not give way from fear. In answer to such an argument I would apply to the people the observation made by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Plunkett) on the depositaries of power; "we must not be too critical in examining their conduct." We must recollect that we are their representatives. But if we should say to them, "Formerly we would grant you nothing because you did not ask; and now we will grant you nothing because you ask too loudly:"—if such should be the language used, this House, instead of being what Mr. Burke says it ought to be,—"the express image of the feelings of the people," will appear to be a hard-hearted and capricious governor.

It has been said by some persons that to give the elective franchise to the large towns, would be to introduce tumults and affrays. Such an argument, one should have thought, was not produced in England, but came from Naples, or from Spain; and indeed it is such as I have often heard from the mouths of the Spanish clergy. But in England experience has taught us that, so far from occasioning bloodshed, elections have tended to give a vent to the political animosities of the place, and after a violent canvass and tumultuous poll, the air has been cleared by the storm, and settled into serenity. Perhaps if there had been elections at Manchester, we should not have had to lament the unfortunate events which we all deplore. Sir, on this subject, I may quote the example of Westminster. It is not a year ago that my honourable friend near me (Mr. G. Lamb) excited the most outrageous disapprobation, being supposed to be the organ of an odious coalition. But he has no sooner shown himself attentive to the interests of this city, and a warm friend to the rights of the subject, than his appearance excites every where good humour and applause.—We have been very lately told that education, which ought to be a blessing, has been injurious to the population of the manufacturing districts. Sir, the fault is not in education; it is in the time and the circumstances which have accompanied it. Had the people received instruction, when they were rich it would have taught them frugality; had they received political rights at the same time they would have learnt the value of legal liberty. But they have received education when they were sinking into poverty, and they have received it without being admitted to political power; they have eaten of the tree of knowledge, like our first parents, only to be conscious of their nakedness.

I come now to the most difficult part of the subject, namely, the separation which has on some occasions taken place between the opinions of the people, and the declared will of the House of Commons. I am aware of an objection urged by a right hon. gentleman opposite, that those who ask for moderate reform state the evil as broadly as those who ask for the most extensive reform. This fault I would endeavour to avoid. I do not wish to create illusion, and therefore I do not pretend to say that reform would make our government less inclined to war, which, it must be remembered, is the cause of our chief burthens. A fondness for war is not the fault of an oligarchical, but of a popular government. If we look to late events, we shall see that the French war was popular in its commencement; the American war was popular in its commencement. True, these wars would have been sooner discontinued if the voice of the people had been listened to; but then, on the other hand, the long administration of sir Robert Walpole would hardly have passed in peace with a more popular assembly. If we look farther back in our history, we may observe, that when we speak of our Edwards, and of our Henries, we dwell with the greatest delight upon those of our kings who had the greatest disposition for war, and the greatest opportunities of indulging it. If we look to other countries, we may see, that Venice and Genoa, two popular states, sent their fleets round Italy, for the purpose of meeting in destructive contests. If we look farther back, to the great republics of ancient times, we shall see that Athens ruined herself by failing in the subjugation of Sicily, and Rome by succeeding in the conquest of the world. We may, therefore, state that the wars, in which this country has been engaged, would still have been undertaken if the will of the people had been entirely consulted; and this view is confirmed by looking at the large proportion of county members who voted in the great majorities which have sanctioned our two last wars. Indeed, we might almost say, it is impossible that an assembly acting in the face of the people, vulgi stante coronâ, should continue, by immense majorities of every class of members, to sanction, year after year, a policy which created immediate and enormous burthens upon the people, entirely against the feelings of that people. Such a system could hardly continue even in the most despotic state; and it is only by carrying the feelings of the people with them, that a free government can lay on greater taxes than an arbitrary king. So firmly persuaded of this truth was Montesquieu, that he has devoted to it a whole book of his immortal work.

But, Sir, there are other questions materially affecting the interests of this country which are not equally decided by a deference for public opinion; amongst them are those questions which regard the expenditure, and are under the eye of this House in its important capacity of guardian of the public purse. In looking at the divisions on this subject, we shall find, that at the periods when those questions were most interesting, and excited the greatest attention, the majorities, instead of being as large as they have been on questions of war, have been singularly small; and on farther examining those majorities we shall find, that, instead of being formed of the fair proportions of county and borough members, they consisted almost entirely of the latter. On the famous motion of Mr. Dunning, in 1780, which was carried by a majority of 18, there appeared in the majority, consisting of 233, the large proportion of 69 county members; in the minority, consisting of 215, only 11 county members. This question, however, it may be said, was carried; but there was another division, of which I will read an account from a letter of sir George Savile, which I have seen quoted in another place: "The most uncourtly question we have had this year was, when after having voted the influence of the Crown increased, &c., we moved to address the king not to prorogue or dissolve us till we had effectually diminished it: we lost it in the proportion of six to five. In this question, the House being divided into classes, showed itself in the following proportions: county members, about three to one, the three being on the side of the minority; English borough members, about four to three, the four being on the side of the majority; the members of a certain long county, which sends a great many, eight or nine to one, at the least; Scotch members, nine or eight to one, at the least; Cinque Ports, about four to one." On referring to what took place two years ago, we shall see that questions of a similar nature were then proposed in this House. In the beginning of 1817, there was a great cry for economical reform; in order to meet this cry the ministers proposed a finance committee. I do not blame them for so doing; for I think that the finances of this country are now so complicated, that they cannot be well examined except in a committee. Upon the composition of this committee, it is evident, depended the question whether our expenditures should be rigorously examined, and honestly corrected, or whether the same system of waste and extravagance should be continued and confirmed. If it was to be composed of independent and impartial men, we might expect the most useful results; if of the followers of ministers we could only look to laboured but flimsy apologies of the existing system of profusion. Sir, the proposal of ministers was, that, besides a great majority of ministerial supporters, five official persons should be members of the committee, in order to see all right. A division took place on the question of substituting the name of a country gentleman for that of lord Binning; for ministers there appeared 178, of whom 15 were county members; on the other side were 136, of whom 27 were county members. The consequence was, as might have been expected, that the reports of the finance committee were totally disregarded by the people. On the 28th of February, the same year, a division took place on the reduction of two junior lords of the Admiralty; when, of 208 who voted with government, 16 were county members; of 152 who voted for the reduction, 35 were county members, being more than double. Now, I do not mention these things as proving that county members alone ought to form the House of Commons, but as an index how totally opposite the decisions of this House have been, on some occasions, to those of the people. In support of the same thing I may mention, on the authority of Mr. Fox, that, although the Opposition were the popular party in 1780, yet they gained very few members by the general election. Even the last general election, decided as the voice of the people was, did not take much from the strength of the ministry.

I come now to the resolutions which I shall have the honour to propose: the two first declare, that when a borough is convicted of gross and notorious bribery and corruption, it shall cease to send members to parliament, and that a great town or county shall enjoy the right it has forfeited. On these heads I have nothing to add. The third declares, "that it is the duty of the House to consider of further means to detect and prevent corruption in the election of members of parliament." The meaning of this resolution is, that some means ought to be devised to give greater facilities in proving corruption in the elections in the smaller boroughs. Perhaps any person, not a candidate or a voter, ought to be allowed to complain of bribery in an election. The farther meaning of the resolution is, that a body appointed by this House ought to be enabled to decide, that a borough has lost by corruption its right of sending members to parliament. Some persons think, that this body ought to be a committee appointed under the Grenville act; and some are of opinion, that a second committee ought to be appointed. It is in order to avoid pledging the House on this subject, that the resolution has been expressed so generally. On this part of the subject, I hope the House will receive the assistance of the member for the county of Montgomery (Mr. Wynn), who, besides his learning, has hereditary claims to authority on this question.

The last resolution declares the opinion of the House, that the borough of Grampound ought to be disfranchised. The corruption of that borough was clearly proved before a committee of the whole House in the last session of parliament, and resolutions appear on the Journals to that effect. The question that remains is, whether Grampound ought to be thrown into the hundred. Now, supposing that all the principles I have endeavoured to establish are false, that all the wants of other districts are imaginary, I still think that there is enough in the peculiar situation of the hundred in question to prevent its receiving from parliament the return of the two members which Grampound is unfit to send. The hundred of Powder in which Grampound is situated, is one of the most fertile of the whole kingdom in members of parliament. It contains Tregony, Truro, Lestwithiel, Fowey, and Grampound, besides three out of five voters of the borough of St. Michael. It will scarcely be contended by any one I imagine, that the hundred of Powder is not sufficiently represented. Why, then, since Cornwall is in no want of representatives, and the hundred in which Grampound is situated is already overstocked,—why not, I say, transfer the right of sending two members to a populous town? I know but of one objection, namely, the common one, that the innocent will suffer with the guilty. And the only answer I shall give, will be in the words of Dr. Johnson, in an argument he furnished his friend Mr. Boswell on the subject of a Scotch borough: “The objection,” he says, “in which is urged the injustice of making the innocent suffer with the guilty, is an objection not only against society, but against the possibility of society. All societies, great and small, subsist upon this condition,—that as the individuals derive advantages from union, so they may likewise suffer inconveniences; that as those who do nothing, and sometimes those who do ill, will have the honours and emoluments of general virtue and general prosperity, so those likewise who do nothing, or perhaps do well, must be involved in the consequences of predominant corruption.”

And here, Sir, I might close my case, were it not that a question has been asked by a gentleman, lately a candidate for the city of Exeter, which it is incumbent upon me to answer; and the more so, because I have no doubt that the same feeling has arisen in the breasts of some whom I most deeply love and respect. The question is, why not disfranchise also the unconvicted boroughs? To this I answer, that I do not by any means maintain that the resolutions I now propose comprise all the amendments that can be made in the frame of this House. Whenever a specific proposition is made, I shall be ready to give it all my attention, and if I can approve of it to adopt it. But I do not, at present, I confess, see any rule by which any unconvicted boroughs can be disfranchised without disfranchising the whole. We then arrive at what is called a reform upon a principle, or the reconstruction of the entire House of Commons. Now, Sir, I will not dwell upon the arguments which are generally used to repel such a proposition; arguments resting chiefly upon the advantage of admitting men of talent into this House, by means of the close boroughs; and on the danger that an assembly of popular delegates would overthrow the two other branches of the legislature. But I cannot forget that these arguments have been urged not, as some out of doors, endeavour to persuade the people, by boroughmongers anxious to defend their own vile interests, but by some of the greatest, the brightest, and the most virtuous men whom this country ever produced. I cannot say, however, that I give entire credit to these arguments, because I think, that in political speculation, the hazard of error is immense, and the result of the best formed scheme often different from that which has been anticipated. But for this very reason I cannot agree to the wholesale plans of reform that are laid before us. We have no experience to guide us in the alterations which are proposed, at least none that is encouraging. There is, indeed, the example of Spain. Spain was formerly in the enjoyment of a free constitution; but in the course of the fifteenth century many of the towns fell into the hands of the nobility, who, instead of influencing the elections of members to cortes (the practice so much reprobated in this House), prevented their sending members at all. The consequence was, that when a struggle took place between the king and cortes, the aristocracy, feeling no common interest with the representative body joined the crown, and destroyed for ever the liberties of their country. There is also the example of the present French constitution; but that is of too recent a date, not to say of too precarious a nature to make a rule for us to go by; we must come back then to our own laws. The constitution of this country is not written down like that of some of our neighbours. I know not where to look for it, except in the division into King, Lords, and Commons, and in the composition of this House, which has long been the supreme body in the state. The composition of this House by representatives of counties, cities, and boroughs, I take to be an intimate part of our constitution. The House was so formed when they passed the Habeas Corpus act, a law which, together with other wise laws, Mr. Cobbett himself desires to preserve, although with strange inconsistency, whilst he cherishes the fruit, he would cut down the tree. This House was constituted on the same principle of counties, cities, and boroughs, when Montesquieu pronounced it to be the most perfect in the world. Old Sarum existed when Somers and the great men of the Revolution established our government. Rutland sent as many members as Yorkshire when Hampden lost his life in defence of the constitution. Are we then to conclude that Montesquieu praised a corrupt oligarchy? that Somers and the great men of that day expelled a king in order to set up a many-headed tyranny? that Hampden sacrificed his life for the interests of a boroughmongering faction? No! the principles of the construction of this House are pure and worthy. If we should endeavour to change them altogether, we should commit the folly of the servant in the story of Aladdin, who is deceived by the cry of "New lamps for old." Our lamp is covered with dirt and rubbish, but it has a magical power. It has raised up a smiling land, not bestrode with overgrown palaces, but covered with thickset dwellings, every one of which holds a freeman enjoying equal privileges and equal protection with the proudest subject in the land. It has called into life all the busy creations of commercial prosperity. Nor, when men were wanting to illustrate and defend their country, have such men been deficient. When the fate of the nation depended upon the line of policy she should adopt, there were orators of the highest degree placing in the strongest light the argument for peace and war. When we were engaged in war, we had warriors ready to gain us laurels in the field, or to wield our thunders on the sea. When, again, we returned to peace, the questions of internal policy, of education of the poor, and of criminal law, found men ready to devote the most splendid abilities to the welfare of the most indigent class of the community! And, Sir, shall we change an instrument which has produced effects so wonderful, for a burnished and tinsel article of modern manufacture? No! small as the remaining treasure of the constitution is, I cannot consent to throw it into the wheel for the chance of obtaining a prize in the lottery of constitutions.— There is yet another person who resembles Nestor in nothing but his age, who tells us that the people have a right to universal suffrage which is derived directly from heaven. No one is more inclined to allow the most extensive rights to the people than I am. I allow that they have a right, if they will, to overthrow their government; that they have a right, if they will, to exercise the sovereignty collectively. But representation is the invention of society, and I cannot allow that the people have any natural right to meet in their parishes and choose members of parliament by putting white and black beans into a box.

Sir, I have but one word more. It is to entreat the government, whether they accept of these resolutions or not, to adopt some measure tending to conciliate the people. The history of all free states, and particularly of that one on which Machiavel has thrown the light of his genius, demonstrates that they have a progress to perfection, and a progress to decay. In the former of these, we may observe, that the basis of the government is gradually more and more enlarged, and a larger portion of the people are admitted to a share of the power. In the latter the people, or some class of the people, make requests which are refused, and two parties are created, both equally extravagant, and equally incensed. In this state, when the party which supports the government loses all love and respect for liberty, and the party which espouses liberty, loses all attachment and reverence for the government, the constitution is near its end. Without any common attraction to the established laws of their country, each is ready to call in force to subdue the other; and it is in the power of an ambitious king, an ambitious general, or an ambitious demagogue, to extinguish the liberties of his country, as easily as these lights above our heads will be put out after the debate! I now beg leave to move the following resolutions:—

1. "That it is expedient that all boroughs, in which gross and notorious bribery and corruption shall be proved to prevail, should cease to return members to serve in parliament; provision being made to allow such of the electors as shall not have been proved guilty of the said offence, to give votes at any election to be held for the county in which such boroughs shall be respectively situated.

2. "That it is expedient that the right of returning members to serve in parliament, so taken from any borough which shall have been proved to have been guilty of bribery and corruption, should be given to some great towns, the population of which shall not be less than 15,000 souls; or to some of the largest counties.

3. "That it is the duty of this House to consider of further means to detect and prevent corruption in the election of members of parliament.

4. "That it is expedient that the borough of Grampound, in which gross and notorious corruption has been proved to prevail, do cease to send members to this House."

The first resolution being put,

Lord Normanby rose to second the motion. He said, that the grounds on which he might have troubled the House had been much narrowed by the speech of his noble friend: he should not therefore, enter into the detail of precedents which his noble friend had so ably examined, but state at once the general grounds on which he supported the motion. On former motions for reform, it had been a favourite argument to contrast the advantages of the present system with the dangers of a change. This argument had great weight with him when a practical good was opposed to a theoretical one; but when his noble friend proposed to touch nothing but what was as essentially bad in practice as it was erroneous in theory, this reasoning would not apply. The only question which could be raised on the disfranchisement of places convicted of corruption, was the abstract question of the property of the voters in their franchises. In his opinion, the word property did not apply. The privilege of voting was not property but a public trust, conferred for the benefit of the community at large—that trust which the voter delegated to his representative, had been delegated to him by the community at large. The nation had an interest, not only in every election, but in every vote. If the voter twisted his trust to the purpose of corruption, he forfeited his franchise; and if the majority of voters were so corrupted as to influence the whole return, the franchise or trust of that larger portion was as clearly forfeited, and should be transferred to some other place, which, from its size, wealth, and populousness, comprised the largest portion of the national interests [Hear, hear!]. He admitted all the evils of those itinerant demagogues, who went about the country and sought only the overthrow of that constitution which they pretended to reform; but the present motion would, if agreed to, have the effect of destroying the influence of such men, by placing the reform of abuses in hands from which a safe and effectual remedy might be expected. What could be a greater right than that of selecting a member of the legislature? and if that right was bartered, was it not proper that it should be forfeited? The member who should come into parliament by the purchased suffrages of the people might, it was possible, be an independent man, but it was not unreasonable to suppose that he would barter what he bought, and at all events such a member was any thing but a representative of the people. If the House should reject the proposition of his noble friend, what would be the remedy for the evil of which he spoke? He might be told that the right which was abused might be extended to the neighbouring hundreds. That in itself, he admitted, would be good; but would it transfer the right from those who had abused it, to places which had a greater stake in the country? The extension of the suffrage to the hundreds might, it was true, lower the price of corruption, but it would at the same time increase the market, and certainly would be very little, if any punishment, to those places who had been guilty of a violation of so great a privilege. If the House refused this motion, what security had they for the future independence of those places which had heretofore abused their rights? What guarantee had they that those persons would not still deal in that Cornish article of manufacture—a member of parliament? Such a man so brought into the House might, as he had observed, be an independent man; he might be a Whig or a Tory, or belong to no party; but this was certain—that he could not be looked upon with confidence by the people. If the right of voting, in cases of its abuse, should only be extended to the neighbouring hundreds, would it not leave to the party the same power of abuse as before? But it should be recollected also, that the freeholder of the hundred would have a vote for the county, and by this extension of suffrage a man might have a vote in several places—might have almost a little parliament of his own selection. Would it not, he asked, be much more wise to give the suffrage to those who did not possess it before, than to double the votes of those who could so abuse that great right? He would ask, if the House refused the present motion, how could they refute the attacks of those seditious demagogues who went about poisoning the minds of the people against them? Would not the refusal give them a new subject for violent invective? In his mind, the extension of the suffrage to large towns, which would exercise it without corruption, would have the effect of draining off that stagnant pool of discontent which at present existed in the country, and which, when stirred, was calculated to breed a pestilence. His opinion on this subject was grounded on the experience of the state of public feeling in different parts of the kingdom. In the overgrown village of Manchester, there was manifest a restless and discontented feeling, while in the represented towns of Leicester and Derby, the same degree of irritation was not known [Hear, hear!]. He conceived it his duty thus to express his sentiments in favour of the motion of his noble friend. When his noble friend had first given notice of these resolutions in the last session, he had pledged himself to support them. He had since seen nothing which did not tend to make him more secure in that opinion. The motion broached no theory; it denied none. It presented a clear and efficacious remedy for an acknowledged evil, and went no further. The noble lord expressed a hope that gentlemen would seriously consider the consequence of rejecting the proposition of his noble friend. For that consequence must be to excite an apprehension, if not a belief, in the country that, however plain and palpable the abuses in our representation might be, or however rational, moderate or definite the remedy proposed, that House was not disposed to entertain any proposition upon the subject. He did not call upon the House to accede to his noble friend's motion with any view or expectation of conciliating those demagogues who spoke so much of chimerical plans of reform out of doors, but in order to satisfy the rational, temperate and sober part of the people. The House was called upon, for the maintenance of its own dignity, as well as in the performance of its duty to the country, to withstand the objects of the former, while it was peculiarly bound to consult the wishes, and to attend to the desires of the latter; and there could be little doubt of the fact, that all the reflecting, intelligent and unbiassed men in England were of opinion that a reform was necessary in the system of the representation of the people in parliament. To this opinion then it behoved that House to pay the most respectful attention; for the best security of the constitution was founded in public opinion. All the external ornaments, all the imposing forms of the constitution might remain but its solid foundation was shaken, if deprived of popular affection, for this affection was the great fundamental principle, upon which alone it could safely rest, and upon that affection no reasoning man could calculate, if abuses and errors were to go on accumulating, without reform or remedy. This reform or remedy, too, should at once be adopted; for if postponed, while abuses and errors went on undermining the constitution, late amendments might only serve to weaken the fabric, and accelerate its fall. On these grounds he wished the House promptly to direct its consideration to this important subject.—[The noble lord sat down amidst loud and general cheers].

Lord Castlereagh rose, he said, at this early stage of the debate, for the purpose of submitting a few observations, with a view to direct the attention of the House to the real question which it was called upon to consider by the nature of the noble lord's motion. It was his wish that gentlemen, in discussing this question, should not allow themselves to travel into the unfathomable abyss of debate, to which party spirit or abstract theories might lead. The example of the noble mover would, no doubt, have its due weight with other gentlemen. That noble lord had, indeed, debated the question with a temper that was highly creditable to his judgment, and which naturally disposed his mind to make every practicable concession to the noble lord's wishes. In keeping aloof from the language and temper of the wild theorists who had lately agitated the country, the noble lord had pursued the course that was best calculated to conciliate the House and to promote his own object. Still, he must say, that the noble lord had sometimes fallen into the error of making an approach to those principles which the theorists whom he disavowed were forward to maintain. The noble lord had, indeed, dealt more in general topics of reform than was strictly consistent with the end which he had in view, or with the motions which he had brought forward; but still the noble lord's speech was, on the whole, of a moderate and conciliatory character. There was, at present, a peculiarly morbid sensibility upon the subject of reform prevailing in the country, and it seemed not at all probable that the proposition of the noble lord would give any degree of satisfaction to those who were affected by that sensibility ; but he assured the noble lord that he did not mean to press this circumstance as any argument against the motion. However, he must say, that while a spirit was abroad, and actively at work to depreciate the constitution of that House, the House itself should be cautious of recognizing any general principle that might serve to aid the object of those agitators. England enjoyed a system of popular representation, infinitely better calculated to answer all the good purposes of such a system than any other country had the fortune to possess, and the character of that system should be defended against every possible attack. Those who were in the habit of making those attacks were not, he repeated, at all likely to value much the object of the noble lord, while they might probably deem any step towards reform rather as a concession from the fears, than as a vote from the judgment of the House. But still he did not mean to urge this as a plea in bar to the noble lord's motion. When the noble lord gave notice last session of this motion, there was not the same ferment in the country upon the subject of reform ; and having pledged himself on that occasion to bring the motion forward, he was called upon to redeem his pledge, and the noble lord had done so in a proper spirit. The noble lord had, however, rested too much, in his (lord C.'s) apprehension, upon what he regarded the theoretical defects of the constitution, without duly considering the utility and advantage belonging to its practical operation. In the course of his speech, also, the noble lord had argued as if every instance of borough abuses occurred among those who sat upon a particular side of the House—as if, indeed, those only on the ministerial side had any interest in maintaining borough patronage. But if the noble lord inquired a little of the gentlemen around him, he would find this to be a very great mistake. It was a mistake also to assume that gentlemen on the ministerial side had not enjoyed any proofs of popular confidence, as there were some gentlemen on this side who had, he believed, quite as many constituents as the same number of gentlemen on the other. He would not, however, dwell upon those points of dissent or difference, but proceed to consider rather those points upon which he was disposed to concur with the noble lord ; and it would appear, on consideration, that there was less difference between him and the noble lord than might be anticipated. When they came fairly to understand the practical course which might be adopted upon a general view of the representation of the country, he was sure they would come to a perfectly good result ; and that the House would not be placed in a situation, when the present state of the country was considered, substantially to differ on the real principle involved in the noble lord's motion, or upon those practical steps which the wisdom of parliament might point out. The apparent sense of the noble lord's propositions was, that where places now sending members to parliament were proved, to a certain degree, to have been guilty of corruption, in equity affecting the rights of the majority of the electors, they should be dismembered of those rights as an example to others, and that the elective franchise so abused should be placed in the hands of more deserving bodies, and more in consonance with the interests of the community. To that principle he had not a single sentiment to oppose ; on the contrary, it was a principle which had been recognized by parliament, not merely in theory, but in practice ; and that the principle had not been carried farther was to be attributed to the judicial difficulties that stood in the way of the application in particular cases which had arisen. In the course of the last session, three, if not four cases had occurred, in which this principle had been admitted by both sides of the House ; and the only question which arose was, as to the facts of those cases, and the mode in which the principle was to be applied to those facts. He believed that one bill had actually been sent to the other House of Parliament ; but, in all events, the inquiry into the course which was to be adopted in cases of corruption had considerably advanced at the close of the last session ; and he confessed that at no period should this subject receive the least resistance from him ; on the contrary it should always be met with the most cordial co-operation [Hear, hear !]. The House had distinctly agreed, that if any borough abused its franchise in proceedings at elections, it should be disfranchised, and its privileges applied to the general representation of the country. To this proposition he acceded, and he of course supposed that, in the course of this session, the House would proceed upon the same principle. That the House had not proceeded in the cases which were before it during the last session, he presumed, was to be attributed to the impolicy of bringing parties up to town upon inquiries, the pursuit of which the business before parliament might greatly retard. But it would be recollected, that during the former session he had expressed no disposition to prevent the House from looking into those cases, or from adopting such conclusions as the facts established on the records might warrant. Now, when the case of Grampound was before the House, if the view which the noble lord was disposed to take of that borough were correct, he saw nothing which could prevent him from coming to a concurrent vote with the noble lord for its disfranchisement: but a question of great moment still remained; and that was, what would they do with the franchise of the borough? It was very likely, although he was not prepared to pledge himself to that opinion, that when he came to look at the difficulties which might arise, in applying the species of reform to that borough suggested by the noble lord, he might think it impolitic, and therefore oppose it; or he might, on the other hand, perfectly agree in the expediency of throwing the franchise into the district connected with the borough. All this must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of the case. But he thought it stood confessed on the very face of the representation of Cornwall, that the description of reform suggested by the noble lord would be extremely inapplicable to a part of the country so situated. It was manifest that such a reform would be best, if at all, applied to boroughs situated in counties having but few places of representation. It was therefore very obvious, that the reform broached by the noble lord was not applicable to every county, under every circumstance; but, on the contrary, might, under peculiar circumstances, be productive of positive mischief. It was in this view of the question that he thought the noble lord's plan would in some cases be attended with irreconcilable difficulties, and therefore he could not but deprecate its adoption by the House. He was not inclined, nor would he then take upon himself to say, that the franchise of a borough might not be extended to the circumjacent county; but he would say, that many cases might be offered to the consideration of parliament in which an objection might present itself to such an arrangement. With these feelings he could not but conclude, that the system laid down by the noble lord in his resolutions was founded upon very imperfect data, and its application likely to meet with obstructions, in many cases, which it would be impossible for all the wisdom of parliament to obviate. It was altogether an abstract theory, in the practice of which inevitable difficulties must arise. It was not probable, in fact, that some cases would not arise, in which the norma of the noble lord would operate as an embarrassment to the very objects which he had in view. In the event of a borough being disfranchised, taking it for granted that this punishment would only extend to those who had been proved guilty of corruption, what would become of those electors whose rights had not been extinguished? Upon the principle of fairness, the only mode of disposing of those householders, or potwallopers, as they were called in Ireland, would be, to throw them upon the county, and to give to them the privilege of freeholder. Would not this, he would ask, be a complete anomaly and an infringement upon the rights of freeholders? If the noble lord, therefore, reviewed steadily the consequences which might fairly be expected to result from his system, he would see that there were difficulties which could not be overcome. To enter resolutions on the Journals of the House, too, founded on abstract principles, which were not applicable to all cases, and could only be applied under peculiar circumstances of a local character, must necessarily produce great inconvenience: he would therefore submit to the noble lord, and to the House, whether it would not be a more natural course to take up at once the case in which reform was contemplated, and apply to it those arguments which its peculiarities might justify [Hear, hear!]. He could assure the noble lord, that if he asked for leave to bring in a bill to disfranchise the borough of Grampound upon the grounds which he had stated, that he would not throw the least difficulty in his way [Hear, hear!] He was perfectly willing to recognize such a course; and, in the discussion of that bill, the House would have an opportunity of determining in what manner the representation of the borough should be disposed of. Although he was not prepared to say that he would exactly adopt the arrangement which might be proposed, yet he saw sufficient reason to bring the question fairly to issue. He saw no danger in applying different principles of reform to cases which were opposite in their local character. Such a proposition was perfectly consistent with what he considered a constitutional reform; but if the abstract principles laid down by the noble lord were acceded to, he thought there was fair ground to apprehend that they might be made use of to put down that part of the representation which was not in conformity with the norma of the noble lord, and which was the peculiar excellence of our constitutional representation. It was from this feeling that he thought the attention of parliament should be called to the special circumstances of each case. The House would then, while they were acting upon the maxims of the noble lord, take care that those maxims were not turned to the destruction of the constitution. He did hope that when the noble lord (and he had every confidence in his prudence) looked to this question, he would see the impolicy of unnecessarily exciting a feeling of discord; and the more especially when he assured him, that he was disposed to co-operate with him in the most cordial manner, for the purpose of obtaining, by a more practical remedy, the reform which he had in view [Hear, hear!]. He had, therefore, to entreat that he would take the particular instance to which he had alluded, and found a bill upon it. If the noble lord looked to all the peculiarities of Cornwall, he would see the impracticability of applying his system to that part of the country. From this he could not fail to observe the impolicy of adopting a fixed principle: the mischiefs which would arise were self-evident: whereas, if each case, accompanied by its peculiar circumstances, were brought before parliament, then the question might fairly be discussed as to the mode of disposing of the franchise—whether to extend it to the adjacent county, or to populous towns which were not previously represented. He did deprecate, however, in these days, their combating shadows, where there was so much of substance in danger. He could assure the noble lord of every co-operation and support in every proposition which he might make consistently with the general views of policy which the preservation of the true spirit of the constitution of parliament might justify; but he must object to the introduction of any measure which was calculated to furnish a ground for discontent out of doors, or to bring into discredit the representation of that House [Hear, hear!].

Mr. Tierney declared, that he never rose with more of the spirit of moderation, or with more of a disposition to harmony than he felt at that moment; and in the first place, he must thank his noble friend for the opportunity which he had afforded the House of unanimously and decidedly discountenancing the wild and visionary doctrines of reform which had lately agitated the country. But while he must say, that he could not see the force of the noble lord's objection to some parts of the speech of his noble friend, he was pleased with the points upon which the noble lord expressed his disposition to acquiesce. The noble lord, if he correctly understood him, and he was not disposed to misrepresent, had acceded to this proposition—that if the majority of the electors of any place or borough, should be found to have conducted themselves corruptly, the right of voting for such place or borough should be thrown upon the adjoining districts, or the right of return should be transferred to some other district. But then the noble lord had raised an objection to that of his noble friend's plan, which proposed to confer the right of voting for the same county upon such electors as had not acted improperly, but as might be involved in the disfranchisement of any borough. To this proposition, the noble lord had said, that its adoption would serve to create an anomaly, by giving potwallopers the right of voting for the return of a county member. But to such an anomaly he thought no very serious objection could be urged. If the right of voting for a county were given to the present potwallopers, non constat, that that right should descend to their successors. He did not indeed think that any county member would be adverse to the votes of such persons, or to those of the householders of a borough, more particularly as the right of voting, in either case, could only be demanded for the persons living at the time of the disfranchisement of any borough. The only question, then, which remained between his noble friend and the noble lord, was as to the establishment of a system, as the noble lord termed it. He himself (Mr. T.) had a system upon the subject of reform, but he was willing to waive that system, and to take all he could get at any time towards amending the state of the representation; and to guard against any objections that might be made to him, in consequence of this sentiment he had only to refer to his known opinions respecting reform—these opinions he was indeed ever ready to avow. But to return to the motion—trusting to the moderation of his noble friend, he took the liberty of advising him to withdraw it, in consequence of the declaration of the noble lord. His noble friend had the promise of the noble lord's support of a bill which was calculated to do some good for the cause of reform. The noble lord's pledge was no fetter upon the discretion of his noble friend, and the redemption of that pledge would form a good omen for the country. At all events, it would recognize this principle, that election corruptions were in future to be discountenanced and punished. When a borough was to be disfranchised for such corruption, the only question, according to the noble lord, that would then remain, would refer to the manner in which that franchise should be disposed of. That franchise should, in his opinion, be transferred to some populous place. It was notorious that times and circumstances had created a very material difference with regard to some of these places, which at present possessed the right of returning members to that House. Many places had indeed sunk into comparative insignificance upon which that right was formerly conferred in consideration of their wealth and population. Was it not then obviously fair, that when any such places forfeited their franchise by improper conduct, that franchise should be transferred to Leeds, Manchester, Halifax, or some such popular town [Hear, hear!]? Sure he was, that such a transfer would be hailed by the people as a good omen of the disposition of parliament. But the principle for which he was an advocate, was the same as that acted upon by the noble lord himself, and by Mr. Pitt, in the arrangement of the Union, as in that case the right of returning members to parliament was reserved for the counties and the larger or more populous towns, while it was granted to but a very few boroughs. This he deemed a sort of parliamentary reform, and therefore he supported it. Upon that precedent, then, he hoped the noble lord would act in this country, and that upon his noble friend's proposition to transfer the right of return from Gram-pound to Leeds, the proposition would be supported by the noble lord. At all events, he trusted his noble friend would act upon the spirit of conciliation which had been evinced this evening by one member of the government, and that without hesitation he would withdraw his motion. The right hon. gentleman concluded with expressing his pleasure, that, after so many angry discussions of late, the House had had one quiet debate, terminating in a result which, he was persuaded, would be satisfactory to the country.

Lord Castlereagh, in explanation, stated, that the only difficulty which would remain on the disfranchisement of Gram-pound would be, as to the manner in which the right of return should be disposed of. That the return should be transferred to another district, he should have no objection, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances of Cornwall and the character of its municipal government. But he could not accede to the establishment of any general principle upon such transfers, and he must reserve to himself the right of moving an amendment upon any proposition, as to the place of transfer, which might be brought forward by the noble mover.

Mr. Wynn expressed himself satisfied with the view of the subject which had been taken by the noble secretary for foreign affairs. He preferred the proposition of the bill recommended by the noble lord to the general propositions brought forward by the noble mover, because it was much more satisfactory to reason from particulars to generals, than from generals to particulars.

Mr. Valentine Blake stated, that, with the permission of the House, he would shortly notice his reasons for opposing all the resolutions of the noble lord; at the same time he would not disturb the harmony which now so happily subsisted between the noble lord and the right hon. gentleman, by giving a negative to the particular point upon which they agreed. He lamented that this spirit did not commence some days sooner, as he was sure, if it had done so, the right hon. gentleman would have saved the House and the country much time and anxiety. He received with every respect the proposition of the noble lord, because there was no proposition, especially on the present subject, which the House would not feel disposed to receive from any member of the house of Russell; and this feeling was increased in consequence of the temper, moderation, and talent with which the noble lord brought forward his motion. He principally objected to the introduction of any new law which would alter the frame-work of the constitution, especially as the one proposed did not remedy the acknowledged abuses of the existing law; and this he thought the House was bound in the first instance to do; for these abuses were such as to disgrace the representation, and to bring the constitution into disrepute, and it was only by an application of the proper remedy, that it now could be restored to its original vigour and beauty; and the consideration of the question of parliamentary reform was much prejudiced by the advocates for universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and election by ballot; for as by reference to the most undoubted authority, it must appear that those ingredients were not to be found in the fundamental structure of the constitution since it assumed a settled form, so it must follow that if they be now engrafted upon it, the change will amount to nothing less than revolution; for what is revolution but a change or alteration from one system or principle of government to another? The only difference would be as to the mode of bringing it about, as it would not be effected by force. The noble lord on the other side had eloquently described the original structure of the British constitution, and he (Mr. Blake) would add, that that structure was to be venerated, not only for its excellence, but also because it is the approved and tried work of the experience and wisdom of accumulated years. He was hitherto adverse to the consideration of this question, because it was impossible to approach it without its being mixed up with the most absurd and pernicious principles; but now those principles being almost entirely abandoned, he thought the time most apposite, but he considered the particular mode recommended as unjust and inapplicable to the evil. He could certainly urge many objections to the disfranchisement of a virtuous minority; and he would be unwilling to depart from ancient practice while we professed to follow it; but he would defer to the much better judgment of the noble lord. He considered the evil now complained of, to consist in the minor grievance of bribery only. Bribery and corruption were used as distinct terms in all resolutions of the House, and they had distinct meanings: bribery is a reward given to pervert the judgment of voters at a particular election, but yet the persons returned were the real choice of the people, having a right to choose: corruption is the vicious, debauched, and rotten system, by which a person or his nominee (neither having the constitutional influence arising from local property), is permanently returned as the representative of a particular place, when, in reality, to the inhabitants he is utterly unknown, having no interest that is not adverse to theirs, and consequently not returned by them. This is effected by the degrading and insulting voice of non-resident freemen, not freemen by birth, servitude, or marriage —no, he respected their rights, whether non-resident or not, but persons elected to the franchise, and unknown except by name, and all of the lowest order. Corruption of this nature is therefore infinitely more pernicious than bribery; because it is a permanent and degrading system of mock representation; and besides, bribery, from its nature, is only practised among the lower classes of freemen having titles by birth and such like; and he would not punish their offences, nor as the noble lord said, scrutinize their conduct too strictly, in times like the present, when every allowance ought to be made for the distress of the tradesmen, which it will be the effect of the disfranchisement to increase; but to this he could never object ultimately, his present object being to begin with the rich and the affluent dealers. A great deal had been said about non-represented places, but he would beg to ask, whether Manchester or Birmingham would not much rather be without local representatives, than be insulted by having men returned as their representatives, when they had no share in the choice? The evil of this system has brought the character of the parliament into more disrepute than all the bribery that has ever been practised. The noble lord's motion is directed against bribery only, and therefore levelled against the lower orders, while the affluent nobleman is the object of particular protection —one class of voters much more numerous now than in former times; the freehold franchise is fourfold more extended; and in this point of view the constitution has gained much. Forty shilling freeholds were first created in the reign of Henry 5th or 6th, yet the number then must have been very small, because it was not till the time of Henry 7th, the barons were empowered to alienate their estates, and it was subsequently of course to that time, that their tenants became possessed of freehold property; indeed, until this time, he believed, or near it, the agricultural people were respected little more than the other movable property belonging to the estate. Such certainly was the case in earlier times, as the words of Magna Charta demonstrate. If the House would not prohibit non-residents elected as freemen, it ought at least to put an end to the abuses of this right. In former times it was unknown in all corporations; it crept into some, and the vigilance of the parliament in the reigns of the Henries before alluded to, put an end by statute to the continuance of it; but those salutary acts were subsequently disregarded, and finally they were repealed only in the present reign. In Ireland they are still on the Statute book unrepealed, except by the judgment of the courts of law. The hon. member begged pardon of the House for having trespassed at all, especially after the subject had been disposed of by the compromise which has taken place, but he could not consistently with his duty to his constituents give a silent vote.

Lord John Russell said, he rose with feelings of peculiar pleasure to thank the noble lord for the conciliatory disposition which he had evinced, and to congratulate the House on the result of that night's debate. He was, indeed, ready to acknowledge, that the noble lord had given him every assistance in his power, in conducting the inquiry last session into the state of the borough of Grampound; but, on the present occasion, he must confess that the noble lord had even gone beyond what he had reason to expect. He certainly did not see the force of the objection which the noble lord had urged against his proposition; but on that subject it was not his intention to offer any remarks. If he rightly understood what had been said, the noble lord had no objection to a bill for disfranchising the borough of Grampound, and extending the right of representation to some great town or other place; and that if he should have any objections to the plan proposed for transferring the right of representation, he would state them when the bill came to be discussed. He now therefore gave notice, that on Thursday next he should move for leave to bring in a bill to disfranchise the borough of Grampound, and to transfer the franchise to some great town. Though he believed that it would be a great advantage to increase the number of members for large counties, yet he was convinced that it would be more beneficial in such cases, to transfer the right of representation to some of those great and populous towns that at present returned no members. He was not at present prepared to say to what particular town the franchise of Grampound should be transferred, because there were many circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration by parliament before that point was determined. He concluded by begging leave to withdraw his motion.

Lord Milton said, it might perhaps be considered irregular in him to address the House after his noble friend had proposed to withdraw his motion; but he could not refrain from congratulating the House on the result of the debate. Though, for his own part, he certainly did not object to the propositions of his noble friend, yet, perhaps, some of them propounded principles which it was better to keep out of view. His opinion on the subject he should state when the bill was brought in; but at present he might observe, that he thought it would be both possible and expedient to adopt some general rule for supplying the vacancies in the representation occasioned by the disfranchisement of corrupt boroughs, and he thought that the House, in establishing such a rule, should direct its consideration to those places which formerly sent members to parliament, but which at present were unrepresented.

Lord Castleragh wished to avoid future misconception, by stating, that he did not pledge himself to any particular mode of proceeding, nor was he pledged to the exclusion of the local principle, in the consideration of the transfer in all cases. He did, however, think from the number of boroughs in Cornwall, that the local principle did not there apply. Every distinct case should be canvassed on its own intrinsic merits.

The resolutions were then withdrawn.

IRISH PARTNERSHIPS BILL.] Mr. Alderman Wood moved for leave to bring in a bill to promote the employment of the poor in Ireland in fisheries and manufactories, by the encouragement of partnerships. The worthy alderman said, that this bill stood over from last session. It was only an amendment of the old law. The alteration was actually necessary to induce English capitalists to embark their property in trade in Ireland; there were many errors and ambiguities in the existing act, which it would be well to amend and obviate.

Mr. Leslie Foster said, that the bill professed to encourage fisheries and manufactures, and yet in it there was not one word about either. It was not however of the omissions, but of the contents of the bill that he complained. It had for a long time been the practice of Ireland to admit occult partnerships, and wherever any ambiguities formerly occurred, they had been in so many recent instances pointed out and explained by decisions in courts of equity, that the practice in such partnerships was rendered quite clear and intelligible. He could not therefore see the utility of the worthy alderman's proposition.

Mr. W. Parnell said, that though these matters might be clear enough in Ireland, yet it did not follow that people in England were equally conversant in the decisions of Irish courts of equity. In the present state of Ireland, it was very desirable to encourage English capitalists, and he was therefore in favour of any explanatory measure which could have that tendency.

Mr. Plunkett said, that this was not a bill of regulation, but one which went at once to sweep away, by an unqualified repeal, whatever had grown systematic in a code of commercial law which was perfectly understood by the people. He had had great experience in the equity courts of Ireland, and he could assure the House that he had not observed any difficulty in the operation of the existing law. The worthy alderman had not pointed out the defects in the existing code. Had he done so, it was competent for him to propose a specific remedy, instead of which he called upon parliament to repeal the whole code.

Mr. Alderman Wood replied, that he had stated, as he conceived, the real object of his bill, which was to remove the prevailing uncertainties respecting partnerships in the courts of law, which prevented, in a great degree, English capitalists embarking in Irish trade. He could state a specific evil, as the law stood, which he was ready to prove. If an occult or sleeping partner went into the counting-house of the firm in which he was engaged to look over the books, he was liable, according to a decision in the courts to be set down as an active partner, and his whole property to be responsible for the affairs of the concern. Now, the fair, and, as in England, the legal principle was, that an occult partner should be merely liable for the property he had embarked, the amount of which was registered, where any man could see it for one shilling. There was, it was true, not one word about fisheries in the old bill, but he meant to introduce the subject in the amendment. In introducing this topic, he had no other wish than to serve the trade of Ireland, and augment its prosperity; knowing, as he did, many capitalists who would, if the proposed alterations were adopted, embark a part of their property with the Irish resident. But if the gentlemen of Ireland had no feeling for the interests of their own country, nor any desire to increase its wealth by the introduction of English capital, he could not help it; if the Irish gentleman would not interfere for their own country, it was no fault of his! he was ready to withdraw his motion.

Lord Jocelyn hoped the worthy alderman would not withdraw the bill. He certainly should, in the first instance, support the motion of the worthy alderman, as he felt himself bound to support any measure which had a tendency to encourage the embarkation of the capital of an English merchant in Irish trade.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] Lord Castlereagh having moved the reading of the order of the day for the going into a committee on the Seizure of Arms bill,

Mr. Lambton observed, that adhering to the declaration which he had made on a former occasion, of the tranquillity of the county of Durham, and of the absence of all necessity, in that county at least, for the measures in the progress of enactment by the legislature—having already stated that the report of arms being found in the possession of the persons who attended the meeting at Newcastle was wholly groundless—having since received from the clerk of the peace of the county of Durham a direct contradiction of an extraordinary statement respecting that county, contained in an article in a ministerial newspaper under the head of "State of the Country"—he felt anxious, although the conviction that he could have no chance with the noble lord would prevent him from taking the sense of the House on the question, to record his opinion of the bill on the Journals of Parliament; and he should therefore move that it be an instruction to the committee that the provisions of the said bill should not extend to the county of Durham.

Mr. W. Powlett could not concur in the view of the state of the county of Durham taken by his hon. colleague. At a meeting of 38 magistrates and other principal inhabitants of the county of Durham, 36 expressed their opinion of the necessity of placing the yeomanry in that county on permanent duty. A great portion of the population of that county, although suffering great distress, certainly bore it with exemplary temper and forbearance; but from all the means of information of which he had been able to avail himself, he was persuaded that there nevertheless did exist in that county considerable disaffection.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Birch rose to make a similar proposition with respect to Nottingham. He contended that there had been no disturbances in the county of Nottingham sufficient to warrant the extension to that county of the operation of the bill. Unquestionably much distress existed in Nottingham. Of 10,854 frames, no fewer than 3,751 were unemployed; so that a great portion of the population were almost starving. Had the harsh measures now before parliament any tendency to ameliorate the condition of the poor people thus left destitute? He was persuaded that had the noble lord acceded to the motion of his honourable friend, for an inquiry into the existing distresses of the country—had he even gone so far as to show his feeling and the feeling of parliament for those distresses, more good would have been effected, than by all the gagging bills that could be devised. Instead of which, however, the present bill was urged, with the denunciation which its title expressed against all the "disturbed counties." Now as Nottingham was not disturbed, he should move, that it be an instruction to the committee, that the provisions of the bill should not extend to the town and county of the town of Nottingham.

Lord Rancliffe felt it unnecessary to trouble the House at any length after what had fallen from his worthy colleague; but in justice to his constituents, he was bound to say, that Nottingham was in a state of perfect tranquillity; for which the noble lord and the country ought to be thankful to the population, considering all the irritating circumstances to which they had been subjected. In one parish, no less than a thousand persons were unemployed. Nevertheless they bore their sufferings with the utmost fortitude. He supported his honourable colleague's motion, not only because he did not conceive that the people of Nottingham deserved any such legal visitation; but also because he thought the bill under consideration one of the most arbitrary and unjust measures that ever emanated from a legislature. What had been the consequence of similar bills in Ireland, that misguided country, blest by Providence, but cursed by man, but to open the door to the greatest oppression, and to rouse the most fiery passions of hatred and revenge. The atrocities perpetrated in that country under such an act as this, had been well described by an hon. member last night;—they were such as no man could contemplate without horror. He protested against the measure in toto; and he would say in the words of a gallant general, that if ever his house was attacked in consequence of this act, he should think it only consistent with his duty and his right, feeling as an Englishman, to resist the assailants.

Mr. Denman concurred in the assertion, that there was not the slightest manifestation of disaffection or disloyalty at Nottingham. He begged leave to state for the information of ministers, with respect to the town of Nottingham, that although the lord lieutenant of the county did at one period propose the adoption of measures indicative of a suspicion of disaffection, he believed that noble duke was now perfectly satisfied that his apprehensions were unfounded. The more reports of disturbance and disaffection were inquired into, the more they were proved to be groundless.

Mr. R. Martin, on perusing the bill, felt convinced that it contained nothing which could affect the poor man's rights, or property, except he possessed fire-arms, for which he could have no use. Had the bill been one for the protection of game, the gentlemen opposite would not have objected to it.

The motion was negatived.

Lord Castlereagh having moved, that the Speaker do leave the chair,

Mr. Protheroe apologized for taking that opportunity of addressing the House on the state of the country and the new measures, as he had been prevented by family indisposition from attending to deliver his sentiments earlier in these discussions. That the country was in an alarming state no one had ventured to deny, from whatever cause its danger originated. He was convinced, not only by the papers on the table, but by information obtained from other quarters, that there did exist a widely spread conspiracy for changing the constitution of the country. He believed that many of those persons who had recently been actively engaged in the proceedings to which he alluded, thought that that at which they aimed would be an improvement of the constitution; but he also believed that they were misled, and goaded on by leaders who hoped to raise themselves in the confusion of a revolution. For this purpose, those leaders endeavoured to eradicate every religious principle from their minds, to draw closer the ties that united the infidel to the enemy of order, and direct the combined powers of blasphemy and sedition against the government and the institutions of the country. A great change to the worse had taken place in the morals and opinions of the people over the manufacturing districts; so great indeed as to render it doubtful, whether the diffusion of education, by which their minds had been opened to the introduction of mischievous as well as good principles, had been more a blessing or otherwise. Disaffection prevailed not only among those who were suffering from want, but those who enjoyed a competence; and that disaffection had been nourished by speeches at public meetings, by seditious publications and itinerant orators. It was consolatory, however, to reflect, that the operation of these machinations was confined to particular districts, and that even in those districts the moral and decent feeling of the majority of the people revolted against them. Nevertheless no man acquainted with the state of the manufacturing districts, but must allow that it was a state of great danger.—With respect, however, to the enactment in the bill which authorized the search for arms by night, he considered it as utterly inconsistent with freedom, and with the existence of civilized society.

The Hon. T. W. Anson, after apologizing for the length at which he must trespass on the attention of the House, trusted he need not say, that it was with feelings of the deepest regret he had seen the necessity which existed for calling parliament together, arising from the distresses which prevailed in many parts of the country, and the discontents which they had unfortunately produced. He might, perhaps, add to these causes, the efforts of a few evil-disposed persons, who were ever to be found ready to take advantage of such a state of things, for the furtherance of their own views. There was one subject connected with these considerations, but which he did not wish at present again to introduce into that House—the Manchester meeting—of which he would observe, that his votes had already expressed his own opinion. He could not, however, but regret, that into the nature and consequences of a transaction, unprecedented in the history of this country, and unparalleled in the annals of such meetings, the House had determined not to inquire; nor could he at the same time refrain from declaring, that hitherto he had heard no reason whatever assigned for the denial of an investigation into the occurrences of a day which would for ever be recorded in history as one on which the blood of his majesty's subjects had been wantonly and uselessly shed. Although he allowed that there was cause for alarm, he expressed his conviction that that cause had been greatly exaggerated, for the purpose of obtaining the concurrence of parliament in measures hostile to the freedom, and repugnant to the feelings of Englishmen. If there could be one of those measures more repugnant than another to a free and high-spirited people, such as the English were, it was this. The principles upon which it was founded, and the temper in which it was framed, appeared to him to be so much at variance with the free spirit of their venerated constitution, and so contrary to that undoubted right which the subjects of this country had ever possessed—the right of retaining arms for the defence of themselves, their families, and property—that he could not look upon it without loudly expressing his disapprobation and regret. The more he did look at it, the more he was amazed at the extraordinary powers given to one man, to authorize the entry of others into the house of any individual in the dead of night, for the avowed purpose of seizing his arms. The oath of a single man before a magistrate, of his belief as to the possession of arms by a third party, and as to the intentions of that party in keeping them, was to be the ground of this arbitrary proceeding! He, for his own part, did not hesitate to declare his firm opinion that, referring to the papers before the House, out of which this bill was said to have arisen, the evidence there given was by no means sufficient to justify its enactment; and certainly, if it passed into a law, it would be one of the most severe measures ever determined upon. With regard to the names of the counties to be inserted in the bill, there were many which there was no pretence for including in its provisions. The House had that night heard an hon. member for the county of Durham, and the hon. members for Nottinghamshire, disclaim, on the part of their constituents, any necessity for such a measure. On a former day the hon. member for Northumberland had said, that he did not think it was necessary that the bill should be extended to that district; and as for his own county, it was well known never to have entertained even a wish for the presence of those meetings which were contemplated by another of those measures. Was it just, then, that such counties should be branded with the same stigma of sedition? Was it proper that the punishment should be inflicted upon them also? Was it fitting that, because this or that particular district was considered to require the application of a coercive system, that system should be applied to the whole country? Because there might be a single manufacturing town in a county; and that town might happen to be in distress, was it fitting that the whole county should be subjected to the operation of such a law? It was a law founded on a principle which no man had ever before dared to assert—a principle from which every lover of freedom turned with horror and disgust. It was not, he would here remark, this measure only which he felt it his duty to oppose; he had viewed with sentiments of deep indignation the whole series of the proposed measures. He had seen with abhorrence the liberties of the people so entirely disregarded. One party of the friends of the measures, appeared to think, that to pass these coercive bills was to do that which was essentially necessary for the safety of the country; the other allowed, that to adopt them, was to give up privileges which they had long enjoyed. Here certainly was an immense discrepancy of opinion. Most of those who supported the measures were also the supporters of the government of the country—that is, of his majesty's ministers. To render that support effective, they had themselves created the alarm which they were now so anxious to allay. He really believed, that it was the wish of those persons to make his majesty's ministers as independent of the people, as in his opinion they already were of that House. While he declared this, he must assure hon. gentleman on the other side, that in what he had said, party feeling had been entirely laid aside; but he would wish to ask them, whether the taking away of the right of petition and the seizure of arms, were not more daring attacks on the constitution than were ever before attempted against it? Had the government consulted the interests of the state, by restoring confidence to the minds of the people, by arming them against the bugbear called radical reform, by measures of conciliation and protection; and had such measures been sooner adopted, the country would not now have been in that situation in which they found it.—Had that been the case, the people would have borne their distresses with that patient fortitude for which they were formerly remarkable. The measures now recommended to the legislature were, in his opinion, calculated to exacerbate instead of to abate the evil. If, in these observations he differed from a great majority, at least on the other side of the House, he hoped they would give him credit for having done so upon principle. Should the course now pursued be found to answer, no man in that House would be more ready to acknowledge his error.

The House then resolved itself into the committee.

Mr. Bennet strongly objected to the bill. It would be in the recollection of the committee that on the subject of depriving the people of arms, a measure had been proposed in the year 1817, which he had opposed. He did so upon this principle—because he held that the distinctive difference between a freeman and a slave was a right to possess arms; not so much, as had been stated, for the purpose of defending his property as his liberty. Neither could he do, if deprived of those arms, in the hour of danger. It was a violation of the principles of a free government, and utterly repugnant to our constitution. Let the committee consider the process by which the object of the bill was to be effected. One of the provisions was, that upon an information on oath before any justice of the peace, such justice should be empowered to grant a warrant for the search. Now, he most strongly objected to any one justice having that power; and that objection was founded upon a conviction, that even in the best and most moderate times, it would be one both dangerous and improper. He was by no means sure, that when men's minds were thrown off the balance, in which they ought to be sustained, and particularly when the manufacturing districts were in that state in which the noble lord had described them to be, there was not the greatest danger in placing such a power in the hands of any one individual whatever. In the year 1812, many instances might be found in which persons had exercised a similar power in the most arbitrary manner; and when he recollected what had occurred at Manchester, he was very certain that there were persons, who might sign these warrants, in whose hands, he, for one, would be the last individual to trust it. He should, indeed, be extremely sorry to confide to them such a power as the enactment of this measure went to confer. Such, then, was the first step of the proceeding—the information upon oath, on which the magistrate was to be empowered to issue his warrant; the next question was, how was that warrant to be executed? They were to have a power to enter houses by day or by night for the purpose of seizing arms. To this power he must most strenuously object. He had no hesitation in saying, as a free-born Englishman—born so indeed, but how long he might continue free he really now could not say—that the people of this country never would submit to so gross a violation of their liberties. He did not think that they were yet base enough to allow it to be carried into execution by armed force, violence, or the sword. He did not wish to use inflammatory language, but he would say, that he thought nothing could be more horrible, more despotic, than this power to enter houses in the dead of night. Had hon. gentlemen ever seen the execution of a simple warrant of distress? Had they ever witnessed the agony occasioned to the sufferers, by putting in force, in open day, one of the most ordinary processes of the law? If so, would they thus subject females, in the dead of night, and in bed, to necessary insults? Necessary, he said, because, however gently the warrant, under the bill, might be put in execution, the mere inspection alone was horrible. He would ask, was there one circumstance at the period of the French revolution which excited more horror and disgust throughout this country, than the domiciliary visits of the magistrates and the soldiery? But where was the difference between the domiciliary visits in France, and those which would be authorized under the enactments of this bill? What, however, would be its effect, after all? The only effect which the measure would have would be that of irritating the public mind. Was it expected that arms would be found? No. Nothing was more easy than to conceal them, and no doubt that those who had arms would take care to secure them? What else, then, would the magistrates do? Would they proceed to practices that had taken place in other countries? Would they inflict tortures to extort confession? He protested against the first step to which he had alluded; and as to this other one, he did not at all mean to impute to hon. gentlemen opposite, an intention that it should ever be taken; but, if the magistrates got no arms, the bill was nugatory; how would they then proceed? The failure therefore of this bill might be considered as certain, except as for the purposes of disgust and irritation; and he should move, as an amendment, that the words "two justices" be inserted instead of "any justice;" and that the words "or by night" be omitted, and the words "by day only" be substituted in their stead. Surely "by night," were words, the effect of which was only to add insult to irritation, and in some cases to occasion the commission of necessary outrages in the execution of the warrant. Under these circumstances, he submitted to the committee his amendment.

Lord Castlereagh said, that with the exception of a subsequent clause, the whole object of the bill was to give the magistrates a concurrent jurisdiction, enabling them to seize arms, in particular cases, in a neighbouring county. The honourable gentleman who had just sat down had stated, that when a bill of the same nature was formerly before the House he had given it his strong opposition. He had always thought, he said, that the right to have arms could never be called in question; and that no circumstances of public danger could ever induce him to vote for an infraction of that right. He appeared to have pushed his assertions to that extent. Now, he (lord Castlereagh) did not think that since the last century, particularly since the two rebellions which marked the beginning of it, any measures of public safety had been framed less calculated to trench upon the rights and liberties of the subject. The hon. member had, however, argued this question as he generally did other public questions. He felt alarm lest the liberties of the subject should be infringed upon by government, without allowing himself to look to the measures necessary for the protection of society generally from dangers of more serious nature. He seemed always to fear a blow from the hand which was stretched out to protect him. What he meant to say was, that the hon. gentleman never seemed to look at this or any other question in any other way, than as if he were invariably jealous of the magistracy, and of the operation of the laws of his country. An idea also appeared to prevail, that measures of this nature were quite new—altogether unheard of—entirely without a precedent in the history of the country. The hon. gentleman, however, appeared to admit, that there might be, by possibility, something in the state of the country to authorize some measure of a severe character, but he objected to the power of granting the warrant being given to a single magistrate. It was extremely odd that this should be supposed to be a provision entirely new, and now for the first time promulgated. In the year 1812, a measure of much more extraordinary rigour and harshness had been enacted, on which he had the assistance of several members on the opposite side of the House; among them of the late Mr. Whitbread [a cry of “No, no”]. He did not mean to say that it had received that gentleman’s explicit approbation; but certain it was that that bill passed through the House with as little opposition as perhaps any one of its important nature had ever experienced. But the present measure was more calculated to guard against any abuse on the part of the magistrates than that of 1812. By the bill of 1812, the magistrate was empowered to search for and seize arms, by day or by night, not only upon information upon oath, but upon a bare suspicion that arms were concealed in any House. Was this deemed a better security for the country than the securities of the present bill? By another clause of the bill in 1812, the magistrate was not only entitled to search, but had the power of calling upon the whole district to deliver up their arms of defence for safe custody, and lest they should be used by the banditti at that time infesting the country. He would now state his conviction, that if the power of which the hon. gentleman complained were not given to a single magistrate, the bill would be entirely ineffectual. Suppose a magistrate were to receive information that arms for illegal purposes were lodged in a particular quarter, was it to be supposed that he must take no steps to seize them until he sent, perhaps a considerable distance, for a brother magistrate? The delay in such a case would afford an opportunity for removing the arms, and thus, as he said before, the bill would be rendered useless. The value of the information in such cases depended upon the rapidity with which it was acted upon; a moment’s delay would in many instances render it wholly useless. Then, as to searching by night, he knew nothing more likely to fail than a search by day; and nothing more likely to succeed, if their information was correct, than a search by night. The means of communication were so organized and complete among the disaffected, that the magistrates could not move by day, without their knowing it; and so of course the whole object would be lost. He did not mean to say that this was not a very strong measure; God forbid he should! He did not mean to say this was not an enormous power. But then it was a choice of evils—a question, whether they would give a strong power to the legislature to protect peaceable people, or leave them a prey to another power, tyrannical and destructive. It had been said, that these measures were neither known nor practised in England before; but they were, in fact, to be found in what the hon. gentleman would consider the very best authority; in those times of Whig principles, in which the Whigs were in the government of the country. It had been asserted, that no such measures had been resorted to, after the rebellion either of 1715 or of 1745; that even then there had been no such thing. Instead of all this, however, it happened in reality, that two bills passed between the years 1715 and 1745, and three, after 1745, all founded upon the same principle as the one before the House, but carrying them to a much greater extent. And one thing particularly to be noted was, that they were passed at a period very little subsequent to the date of the Bill of Rights; they were passed in the first year of the reign of George 1st, and only twenty-seven years after the Bill of Rights had been established; so that the Whigs of that day did not consider themselves bound not to desert, in these instances, the provisions enacted by that bill. What was thought of the disarming of the Highlanders? Was not that a measure introduced by a Whig administration? And yet surely the hon. member opposite would not persuade hon. gentlemen behind him, that there was no distinction between the cases of those rebellions in the Highlands and these seditions; surely it was a much more generous spirit of resistance to the laws which actuated the persons engaged in those rebellions, than any thing which had influenced any proceedings out of which the necessity for the present measure might have arisen. The hon. gentleman opposite deprecated any measure that was to be permanent. Yet the act of George 1st, though a local act, was not a temporary one. It was entitled "An act for disarming the Highlands," and, in point of fact, remained in operation, and was virtually the law of the country, during the whole of the reigns of George 1st, and George 2nd. In the interval which elapsed between the years 1715 and 1745 they brought in an act (11th George 1,) to re-enact the former one. They, the Whig government of that day, even went so far as to make it penal for any persons to retain arms in their hands, after being summoned to give them up; and a person convicted of so retaining arms was compelled to serve as a soldier in North America. The act of 11th George 1st, was passed for seven years. The rebellion of 1745 broke out during the 19th of George 2nd, when they re-passed the former act of George 1st, but in much stronger terms; for the act contained a provision making the second offence of retaining arms punishable by seven years transportation. This act was successively continued for periods of seven years and seven years each; and during the whole of the reign of George 2nd, there was no repeal of it. But now, hon. gentlemen, professing the same political principles as the authors of the measures which he had just described, denounced his majesty's ministers, and held them up to the execration of the country, for introducing the comparatively mild bill before the committee. It was generally admitted that some restrictive measures were necessary to preserve the tranquillity of the country. If so, was it not humanity to the people to make those measures effectual? If this were not done, the country would undergo the painful feeling of having their liberties restricted, without enjoying the protection which the measures were intended to afford. The bills introduced after 1745 vested the power in a single magistrate, in the same manner that that now on the table did. He was not arguing this question on the principle of the seditious meetings bill. He was aware that the principle of the bill was not congenial with the constitution, that it was an infringement upon the rights and liberties of the people, and that it could only be defended upon the necessity of the case. But that necessity now existed; the security and general interests of the subject demanded the sacrifice, and therefore he could not feel justified to himself if he did not press the original clause.

Mr. Brougham observed, that thus much had been conceded—the noble lord did not present the bill upon the table as constitutional in its principle or in its spirit, for he had frankly avowed that it was an infraction of the one and a violation of the other. It did not follow that the same opinion would be felt by all who ranged themselves on the side of government; from an ultra portion of the House the country might still be doomed to hear sentiments of an ultra description, in which it would be represented that, in truth, this measure, like the restriction upon the right of meeting and the trammels upon the liberty of the press, was an improvement, a notable improvement, upon the system which our ancestors had thought so perfect, but which their wiser descendants had discovered to be defective. However, it was something to gain the admission of the noble lord that this bill was to be dealt with as an infringement of the acknowledged and ancient rights of the people. In what way had the noble lord argued against it? He had adopted his usual and favourite mode of reasoning; for no sooner was an objection started to the nature of the bill, than he turned round and inquired, what objection could now be fairly urged against so mild and conciliating a measure, when only seven years ago the House had adopted a law of ten times its severity; and he followed it up by this special interrogatory—"What, do you think there is no necessity for the interposition of parliament in this way, when I have brought down six bills, where only two were formerly introduced? Shall not we now require the seizure of arms on the oath of the belief of a person before a single magistrate, when in the bill of 1812 you omitted all oaths and only rested on the bare surmise of a justice of the peace?" The reply to all this was obvious. How could those be bound by what parliament had formerly done, who had resisted its proceedings to the utmost? Such as had supported the bill of 1812 might, indeed, be called upon to lend their aid in making a new attack upon the constitution; but to those who had formerly maintained the rights of the people as they now maintained them, the appeal of the noble lord was inapplicable. The noble lord had insisted that the measure would be crippled, if not defeated, by abstracting the clause authorizing a search for arms at night; that it would give the disaffected warning; that when they heard that a magistrate was heading a troop of horse to seize their weapons by day, they would straitway take especial care to conceal them. But what answer could be given by the noble lord to this statutory warning, the bill upon the table? It must be granted (or the whole foundation sunk under the noble lord's new structure), that there were numbers in the various districts now actually in arms against the state, and the moment notice was given them by this bill, that a magistrate might come and search, would they be so weak, so childish, as not instantly to place their weapons beyond the reach of the civil or military power? Every man knew that he was liable to be informed upon by his neighbour. What was easier than to put his arms out of the way? The noble lord had frequently said much of the artifice and subilty of the disaffected, and would he now desert his former story, and for the sake of his present argument, insist, that while all the magistrates in all the districts were to be on the alert, peeping into every hole and corner for a pike or a pistol, the disaffected would ostentatiously pile their arms in the open fields, or display them as in armouries, in stars, circles, and triangles, for the exterior ornament of their habitations. It was ridiculous to suppose, that they would thus lay themselves open to the malice of their neighbours, and to the domiciliary visits of the magistrates. Thus far then the bill afforded no protection, unless it was intended that it should go farther than had been yet stated; if not, he would venture to say, that not a single stand of arms could be seized under it. Besides, as now presented to the House, it was most essentially defective. True, it had had its birth in another place; and notwithstanding all the wisdom, and sagacity, and acuteness, and perspicacity and accuracy of the allies of the noble lord in that place, and particularly of the most wise, sagacious, acute, perspicacious, and accurate secretary for the home department, notwithstanding the enlightened abilities of those who were represented as giving the tone of opinion, and taking the lead in the cabinet, notwithstanding the labours of those who had sent their sage directions through the country, in such perfect grammar and such classic English, notwithstanding the bill had passed through the ordeal of the protesters, whom the noble lord had so struggled to confute in an elaborate speech, he was obliged to take it under his protection, and to vindicate the defects by which it was disfigured. The noble lord had mainly relied upon precedents, but he (Mr. Brougham) denied that that on which he had principally depended had the slightest application to the case before the House. The noble lord had quoted what he had been pleased to call the good old Whig times of 1715, when the Scots were disarmed with far greater severity than the present bill recommended. It must be admitted that however severe the old law was more effectual, because one part of the argument of the opponents of the new law was, that it would by no means accomplish its object, for, though it enabled a magistrate to search, it was destitute of any power by which he could get at the arms he discovered. Did our Whig ancestors pursue this course? No; they said, "Summon those who have arms, and require them to give them up; and if afterwards it turns out that they have concealed them, then they may be fairly subjected to the severe penalties of the law." That measure was only to be justified by necessity, but it had a recommendation which the noble lord's bill did not possess—it was effectual for its purpose. And why, at that period, was it necessary? Was not open rebellion then stalking through the land? Was there not then a disputed succession to the Crown? Did not a foreign enemy aid the efforts of the domestic rebel, and threaten an invasion? War was then menacing without, and his ally, insurrection, was at work within; yet the noble lord with the utmost assurance asserted, that the precedent of 1715 should now govern the deliberations of parliament. Where was now the foreign foe, where the domestic levies? where the central commission? where the organized insurrection? Had we at this moment the first peer of the realm in open hostility, and sent to the Tower for his crime? Had we now a disputed succession, an open rebellion, or even an appearance of rebellion? Rebellion! Good God! was it to be asserted, even after all the evidence that had been so industriously collected and so ostentatiously displayed, that there was any thing in the country bearing even the semblance of rebellion? Where was the general rising that had been threatened by ministers and their agents from day to day? First it was said, that it was undoubtedly to take place on Wednesday; and after all the fears of all the old women had been excited to the utmost, they were respited until the Monday following: now it appeared that it had been postponed, positively for the last time, until yesterday; fortunately for the country, and unfortunately for the prognostications of the noble lord, no rising had yet taken place. Several of the warm adherents of ministers had been terribly alarmed a few days ago by seeing chalked upon the walls of the metropolis the ominous words "Remember the 9th of December;" and just as they had concluded that on that fatal day a bloody civil war was to commence, they were agreeably surprised by hearing that it was only a lottery puff of "the richest wheel ever known with 8 prizes of 20,000*l*." which like some of the other promises of the chancellor of the exchequer, turned out in the end to be only four. To revert to the precedent of the noble lord, the history of Scotland proved, that the rebellion which the act against arms was meant to suppress, was hastened by it. The people were exasperated, their feelings were aroused rather than softened by those measures of the Whigs, which, though honestly meant, were highly erroneous.

The Whigs of that day had not the experience which the country now had, that disarming was not the way of pacifying a kingdom. While the noble lord, with that example before him, had adopted its mistakes, and persisted in the error. It was not the rigour of that or of any other measures that at length subdued and pacified that part of the united kingdom; it was reduced to submission and obedience by a series of conciliatory measures, the first foundation of which was laid in the statute abolishing the remnant of the feudal system, which was followed up by other measures, as consistent as they were prudent. It was the wisdom of lord Chatham in placing confidence in those who had not been trusted by his predecessors, that finally completed the harmony that had now so long continued. He had thrown himself upon the people—he had gone, as he afterwards proudly and justly boasted, to the north, to seek for merit, and he found it where his predecessors had only sought for and found rebellion. The precedents of George 1st and George 2nd were therefore to be employed rather for the wise lesson to be gathered from them, than for the mere dry and naked support of a case, supposed to be analogous. He gave his hearty concurrence to the opposition made to the principle of the bill. That the subject had at all times a right to keep arms in his possession, of which the government could not, under given circumstances, deprive him, was a proposition that he would not maintain; but before the subject was deprived of them, a case of necessity must be fully established. Another point most material to be considered was, that in dealing with so sacred a matter as the rights of the people, any one of them must be suspended in the mode, under all the circumstances, least likely to affect the rest, or to abridge the other privileges or comforts to which he was entitled. When the noble lord maintained that the subject had only a right to arms for the protection of his property, or for self defence against the midnight plunderer, or an unauthorized police officer, he (Mr. Brougham) could only state, that he had not so read the constitution. He even believed that the noble lord would be ready to agree with him, that he had too narrowly stated the right. Not only was an Englishman's house his castle against the unwarranted intrusion of the police, or against the attack of thieves, but it was so in another and a higher sense of the word, as giving him a prerogative to have arms for his defence. He maintained that he had a right to arms for his defence, not merely because he would preach it up to him that he might use them against the lawless measures of bad rulers, but to remind those rulers that the weapons of defence might be turned against them if they broke the laws, or violated the constitution. If this were dangerous doctrine, he addressed it not to the country, but to its rulers; and he begged them to recollect that, in broaching it, he was only following a venerable authority, not to be disputed even by the other side—Judge Blackstone—who twice over had laid it down in his book, that such was the use of arms, and such the privilege of English subjects. These were not times for any man to assert opinions that might be misapprehended or perverted; and he would therefore follow up what he had advanced by adding, that no act of the rulers of the country, in which they were supported by the constituted authorities, could warrant any part of the community to talk of, nay, to dream of resistance. If the law of the land were to be altered, it could only be altered by parliament; and he would as vehemently and steadfastly, to the last drop of his blood, resist any encroachment by the people upon the legislative right, as he would oppose strenuously and firmly any invasion by the crown or the parliament of the known privileges of the community. These were the doctrines of the British constitution—doctrines as serviceable to good rulers as they were dangerous to evil rulers—calculated to promote and secure the peace and good order of society, and calculated too, as a warning to those who would violate that liberty they ought to preserve. The hon. and learned gentleman sat down amidst loud cheers.

Mr. Canning allowed that, as he should be sorry to push any expressions beyond their fair and obvious meaning, he was perfectly ready to admit the right of the subject to hold arms according to the principle laid down by the hon. and learned gentleman, especially when accompanied with the qualification which the hon. and learned gentleman had thought proper to annex to the right, after having stated it on the authority of Mr. Justice Blackstone. The doctrine so laid down, he was willing to admit was no other than the doctrine of the British constitution. If he was at all disposed to quarrel with the doctrine, it was not in consequence of the principle upon which it was founded, but in consequence of the occasion upon which it was stated: for if it were to go abroad at this particular moment, and under the present circumstances of the country, that the hon. and learned gentleman had contended for the propriety of an armed resistance, he would ask any man of common understanding whether more danger was not likely to arise from mooted the possible case, than security from the qualification the hon. and learned gentleman had made when he asserted it? Without, however, pressing this further, he would only state, with reference to what had fallen from the other side, that there was no general and abstract right belonging to the community, which was not subject to the control of the governing power of the state, on the showing of an adequate necessity. If in the instance before the House any proof were wanted of this qualification, he would refer those who doubted to that immortal statute so often quoted within doors and without, in regular debates and at public meetings, but, he knew not by what fatality, never quoted accurately—the Bill of Rights. It was most true, as had been laid down, that all subjects were entitled by the Bill of Rights to have arms, but with one small qualification, which he mentioned not in praise of, or with a view to establish the qualification, but as showing that at the very time when our ancestors laid down the principle they contemplated the exception. Those who had cited the Bill of Rights had uniformly omitted the important words—“All subjects being Protestants have a right so to be armed.” How had it happened that in all the discussions for the last three weeks, in all the public addresses for the last three months, that clause had been carefully excluded? What was to be inferred from those words?—That the Papists ought now to be disarmed? Certainly not: he only brought them forward to illustrate the position, that this general right, like every other, was subject to qualification; and nothing could more satisfactorily prove its subjectness to qualification than the fact, that at the very moment the right was conferred it was actually qualified. Though the current of opinion was at present against such an exception of the Catholics

he was not sure whether, by any subsequent law, it had been repealed; but supposing it remained on the Statute-book, that clause would exclude from the possession of arms no small portion of the inhabitants in some of the disturbed districts. Would he then exempt the professors of the Catholic religion from the right of having arms for self defence? No; he had always argued in a contrary direction; but the Bill of Rights, correctly quoted and properly construed, brought him to the provision of the bill on the table, which, in fact, recognized the general right of the subject to have arms, but qualified that right in such a manner as the necessity of the case required. As the Papists at the Revolution, were armed against the existing government, and were excepted in the Bill of Rights, so the act before the House excepted the disaffected in the disturbed districts who were in arms against the law and authorities of the land. He appealed, therefore, to the Bill of Rights in defence of the step he now called upon the House to take; and he contended that it would only be to carry into effect the very doctrines our forefathers had shown that they admitted. In the spirit of the Bill of Rights, he called upon the legislature to interpose to suspend a right, and take away arms that could not be held without danger to the tranquillity of the state. He admitted that a case must be made out justify this interposition; but he had imagined till to-night, from the general course of the discussions in parliament from the unanimity with which the training bill had been passed, that danger, and the species of danger, was not denied. Whether it were or were not conceded that large meetings ought to be restrained that some limitation ought to be put upon the abuses of the press, or that a permanent measure might be required to prevent the possibility of a military rising, and a disciplined array, he had supposed that it was not denied, that those who were marching and counter-marching, and accustoming themselves to obedience to the word "fire" without arms, had at least a distant design at some time or other to practice it with arms. He had also concluded that when the Speaker left the chair, and the House went into a committee, it was not intended to dispute the principle of the bill, though differences might arise out of particular clauses. It was evident that, on this occasion, it was intended to make two distinct attacks—one on the whole of these measures, the other on his majesty's government. "The bill is unconstitutional," said one; and exclaimed another, "it is without precedent." Those, however, who declared that it was unconstitutional, appeared to have forgotten themselves a little. From the situation in which the House was placed at that moment, it seemed that the objection was never thought of before. Here they were in committee—not to consider the principle of the bill which had been conceded, but to inquire into the best mode of applying and adopting its provisions. With respect to the other charge, that there was no precedent for the measure, his noble friend had fully answered the objection. He had shown that there was precedent of a recent date. He had gone farther; and if gentlemen wished him to cite times and persons intimately connected with the Whig influence in this country, he had cited those times and those persons as perfectly applicable to his argument. But when this was done, and done so that it could scarcely be mistaken, the learned gentleman turned round and asked, "Well, where is the precedent?" His noble friend had quoted precedent; but as the measure to which he applied it did not partake of such bold aspiration, did not savour of such harsh severity, as those which the Whigs had supported, then he was told that it was no precedent. But the use made of this sort of management was very clear. When one objection was really answered and the other ostensibly remained—though, in effect, it was also answered—then those who opposed the bill said, "See, we have done away with all your logic, your whole course of ratiocination is destroyed." It was true the hon. and learned gentleman did not push his logic quite so far, but he did not fall much short of it. To the charge of its being unprecedented, his hon. and learned friends had answered, by stating that it was copied in its very terms, and he might say, with a servility of imitation from former acts. But then the hon. and learned gentleman turned round and said, "what signifies whether you can plead precedent in favour of it or not, it is objectionable in itself, and upon that ground ought to be resisted." For his own part, he did not mean to contend, that because there were precedents in favour of it, there could be no objection; but when he was asked, what use was precedent, he would answer, that precedent was one argument, and that when the others were answered, if that too could be overturned, the triumph of the question was complete. The hon. and learned gentleman had also expressed his surprise that this bill should be so defective, after having been subjected to that species of animadversion which was denominated "protest," and which, if it were not founded in sound reason, ought to be answered by a "counter protest." Now he had never heard of a proceeding by counter-protest, in the venerable assembly where the measure originated; but perhaps the hon. and learned gentleman thought it ought to be invented to meet the exigencies of the present occasion; and that, having engaged in a war of words in the first instance, they ought next to be engaged in a war of quills. But without dwelling upon that topic, or confessing himself a convert to the opinion of the hon. and learned gentleman, he would allude to an extraordinary publication, containing an unfounded assertion, to which, however, some highly respectable names were attached, he knew not how. The publication to which he referred, denounced the bill before the House upon various grounds, and among the rest, upon the following: "Because, in former periods of much greater danger to the Crown and constitution of these realms, when conspiracies by the adherents of the House of Stuart were known to be directed against both, when preparations were making for rebellion with the assistance of France, when men of the highest rank, station, and influence in both kingdoms, were deeply engaged in these designs; nay, during two formidable rebellions in 1715 and 1745, no such power was granted to the Crown; yet the new line of succession was defended, and our free constitution successfully maintained, against all these dangers. The principles of the revolution had been too firmly imprinted in the hearts and minds of our ancestors to allow them, on the spur of any emergency, however alarming, to hazard the existence of a right which they had so recently asserted. To this extraordinary publication the signatures of "Grey, Thane, Erskine," and many other eminent and distinguished individuals, were attached. But any man, even the most ignorant of the English history, would see that the position laid down in the passage he had quoted was incorrect

So much so, that when he read it, he imagined it was one of those libels on the names and characters of great men which were so extremely current at the present moment—a libel on persons whose stations, whose habits, the tenour of whose whole lives acquitted them of the suspicion of not having read, "Smollett's Continuation of Hume's History of England." Names of the first celebrity were, however, affixed to this statement, which was so completely erroneous, that the making use of those names became in his opinion a species of scandalum magnatum. This circumstance occasioned persons a little more curious, a little more anxious to know what had really taken place at a former period of our history—to examine what the proceedings had been during the periods alluded to. The result of their investigation was this: they found, that in the year 1715, one of the periods selected, the Whigs had passed an act as nearly as possible, similar in principle to the measure of the present day, but infinitely more severe in its enactments. It was worth while to mark how the Whigs, with the bill of rights so fresh in their memory, expounded the right of carrying arms, which had been so much adverted to. He begged those individuals, in whose ears the exposition of the hon. and learned gentleman must still be ringing—that exposition by which the right of carrying arms against the government was admitted—he begged of them to listen to what the Whigs had enacted on the subject. The preamble of the act said, "Whereas the custom that has long prevailed amongst the Highlanders, of carrying arms and using them abroad, has been productive of great inconvenience." Penalties were enacted to prevent the wearing of arms by the class of persons noticed in the bill, which set forth that a conviction might be had on information being laid before one justice of the peace. The first offence was visited with a fine of 40*l.* and imprisonment; the second offence with a fine of 80*l.* and more imprisonment; and ultimately, in default of payment, the party convicted was subjected to transportation for seven years. Not content with this, in the year 1726, being the 11th of George 1st, and ten years after the passing of the bill, which he had just quoted, a new act was brought into parliament, enforcing that which had been previously enacted. By that bill persons not giving in their arms, or not paying the penalty inflicted on them, were liable to service as soldiers. Besides this, the owners of those houses on whose premises arms were found, were to be deemed concealers of arms, and were in consequence subject to the same penalties of fine, imprisonment, and transportation, to which persons regularly convicted were liable. He was sure what he was now about to state would shock the feelings of the hon. gentleman who had opened this debate, who had dwelt with so much energy on the situation in which females would be placed in consequence of the operation of the present bill. The act to which he was referring treated females with as little ceremony as it did males. By its provisions, two years imprisonment, and a fine of 100*l.* were inflicted on any female who was convicted of concealing arms. So much for the mitigated severity which distinguished the measures of the Whigs. In the 19th of George 2nd, another act was passed to enforce that which he had recently quoted. It provided still greater penalties, the whole of which he would not then read. By that act, those who did not bring in their arms, or refused to pay the penalty, were liable to serve as soldiers. Here again women were not forgotten. A breach of the act committed by them was visited by a fine of 100*l.* and by imprisonment. This act was passed for seven years, and before it expired it was renewed for seven years longer, with this remarkable preamble—"That the act not being sufficient to answer the purposes intended, it was found necessary to enforce the same with new provisions." This was passed in 1746 for seven additional years, and continued till 1753, when it was again renewed. In 1753 the act as he had observed, was renewed, though he knew not any particular reason that called for it since the renewal took place in a period between two wars. In 1759, the last year of the reign of George 2nd, he found it still in force. Men were subject to fine, imprisonment, and transportation, if they did not give up their arms, and women were also fined and imprisoned for assisting them in concealing them. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that there was no precedent for the present measure; but till long after the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 had subsided, it would be found that bills far more severe than that now before the House were renewed. He also wished the House to recollect what the hon. and learned gentleman appeared, to have forgotten, namely, that these bills were enacted after lord Chatham had made use of the highlanders as soldiers. While on the one hand lord Chatham was calling on the highlanders to fight the battles of their country, he was on the other enacting a measure, with what the hon. and learned gentleman would term an odious preamble. That act which kept in force the measures of which he had been speaking, set forth in the preamble, "Whereas, the acts for preventing the carrying and using of arms have been found useful and beneficial to the country." On this recital, two years after the highlanders had fought their country's battles, those acts to which he had alluded continued, and they had not since that period been repealed. He thought it was too bad, after this statement, for any gentleman to say that there was no precedent for the proceeding now before the House. It was quite clear, that the acts which he had quoted, acts of extreme severity, had been continued in force long after the rebellion of 1715 and 1745 had wholly subsided. It was a most extraordinary circumstance to see it proclaimed to the country, under the sanction of the great names he had mentioned, that no precedent could be found in our history; when the truth was, that from 1715 to 1745, and from 1745 till it pleased God to put an end to the Whig administration, acts more severe than those which were now in contemplation were constantly operating; they were not mere dead letters in the Statute book; they were not suffered to lie undiscovered, but were carefully renewed from seven years to seven years, as if it were intended, when the Whigs had given to parliament a septennial duration, they were determined that every thing connected with the government should be septennial also. He knew that with the hon. and learned gentleman this would not be considered any reason for passing the bill; but he never would suffer any statement against precedent, to be made by those gentlemen on the other side of the House, who were in the habit of using all manner of precedents themselves, without taking a proper notice of it. If precedent could be advanced to the purpose, unprecedentedness ought not to be introduced as an argument against any measure. Let gentlemen consider the temper of the present administration with the temper of some of those which had passed; let them consider the tone of this measure as compared with the legislation to which he had alluded, and then declare whether the bill upon the table demanded or authorized any of the observations which had been made upon it by the hon. and learned gentleman. It might be said, with respect to the act of the 1st of George the 1st, that it was of a local nature, as it extended only to the Highlands; but it should also be observed that it had no limit to its duration. The reason why he inferred that it had no limit was, because the act of the 19th George 2nd, which renewed the act of the 11th of George 1st, which expressly recited both the acts of the 1st, and the 11th, contained a clause which appeared to him to bear out his proposition, that no limit was affixed to it. Let the House, then, look at the difference between the present bill, and the acts to which he had referred. The latter embraced a great portion of time, while the former was limited to two years—a period beyond which it was not expected that the evil would extend. By all those acts, warrants to search for arms, by day and night, might be granted by one magistrate, without information on oath. By the present bill, one magistrate might, indeed, grant a warrant, by day or by night; but the information must be given on oath. In those acts of Whig legislation no right of appeal was allowed, but in this bill the right of appeal to the quarter-sessions was admitted, which he considered an important provision for the protection of the public. By those acts to which he had called the attention of that House, it was provided, that in cases of obstruction by 15 persons or more, the peace-officers might call in the military force to their assistance, and would be indemnified if the death of any individual ensued; in the present bill there was no such provision. By those acts, an individual refusing to give up his arms might be sent for a soldier, or he might be transported for life; by this measure he could only suffer imprisonment for a misdemeanor. By those acts, a woman was subjected to a fine of 100*l.* or might be transported to the plantations; in the present bill there was no such provision. When, therefore, ministers were told that they introduced acts of unprecedented severity, those who made the assertion were manifestly in error. They might taunt ministers by adverting to what they called the wise provisions of their ancestors; but they could no longer reproach them with the want of constitutional precedents; they could no longer say that ministers had acted with more severity than their ancestors adopted, when they saw a just occasion for it. The bill might be charged with insufficiency, with the fault of not being severe enough; but to accuse its framers and supporters of forgetting the rights which our ancestors held sacred, was an imputation which the enactments of the bill and the evidence of history concurred in repelling as untenable.

Mr. Brougham in explanation, declared that the right hon. gentleman had quoted expressions and arguments which he had never used. When did he ever say that this measure was unprecedented? When did he ever argue on what the right hon. gentleman was pleased, in a fine word, to call it unprecedentedness? When did he ever turn round and say, “O what is the use of precedents?” These were a few of the points that the right hon. gentleman had grappled with; but they were points of his own making. It was easy for the right hon. gentleman to answer arguments which he was pleased to attribute, not to collect, from others. There was another point of more importance, to which he wished to advert. He was stated to have said that the people had a right to arm, notwithstanding any interdict of the legislature? Good God! when did he assert that they had such a right? He had all along admitted that the legislature had clearly a right to disarm the whole people; but then it was necessary that a case of the most decided necessity should be made out.

Mr. Canning observed, that he might have made use of the hon. and learned gentleman's argument, as he himself must have felt with greater effect than he even had done.

Mr. Brougham replied, that it would have been very unfair in the right hon. gentleman to have done so, since he had stated his qualification in very strong terms, and had not pushed his argument so far as some people thought. He knew from experience the powers of misrepresentation possessed by the right hon. gentleman, and he thanked him for his courtesy in not making use of them to the greatest possible extent on the present occasion. He very sensibly felt that he should not now have had an opportunity of making this explanation had the right hon. gentleman not been so civil. All the neighbourhood of St. John's and St. Margaret's would have been echoing to the praises rung in his ears from the hon. gentlemen around him, if the right hon. gentleman had made that exhibition from which he had so obligingly abstained.

Mr. Tierney expressed his surprise that the impression of gentlemen opposite always should be to treat this and other important subjects as mere party questions. The whole wrath of the right hon. gentleman—Well, he did not wish to use the same word that he had used on a former occasion, and he would therefore say that the whole speech of the right hon. gentleman had been one continued attempt to devise some mode by which he could throw a slur on gentlemen who sat on that (the Opposition) side of the House. Having no ground on which he could support an accusation with reference to their present actions, the right hon. gentleman went back to the old topic, and began to revile them as Whigs—"Whig, Whig, Whig," were the first and the last words in the right hon. gentleman's speech. Night after night this epithet was introduced in order to annoy them. The right hon. gentleman never made a speech in the course of which he did not declare that the Whigs were the persons whom the country ought most particularly to guard against as having done a great deal of harm. The Whigs had, however, done the country some good, which the right hon. gentleman overlooked; but if they were the authors of any mischief, that was exactly the precedent the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues quoted in order to justify the ill which they were willing to do to the constitution. It was a pity that they would not imitate some of the good works of the Whigs, as well as their bad ones. An hon. member under the gallery had said, how fortunate and how happy an event it would be if gentlemen coming to these discussions would throw aside the spirit of party, if they would endeavour to render those measures palatable instead of opposing them altogether. Now if ever an effort was made to do this, it had been attempted with respect to the bill now before the House. When that measure was brought forward, he stated his objection not to its peculiar principle, but with a reference to the situation of the times. He desired that a case might be made out which it was necessary to meet by such a law. He objected also to one magistrate being empowered to grant warrants, instead of two; and he stated his dislike to the power of searching by night. He had declared that if two magistrates were substituted in the place of one; and if the search by night was given up, he would not oppose the measure. He had, however, expressly reserved his right to discuss the measure in some future stage, and now, though the points to which he had objected were retained, he was charged with having conceded the principle, or at least forfeited his right to oppose it. He denied the assertion: he had not abandoned the principle: for he would maintain that the subject had a right to arms, in terms still more broad than those which had been used by his hon. and learned friend. The right hon. gentleman had noticed a qualification of the principle in the Bill of Rights which was the introduction of the word Protestant, but the House should bear in mind the circumstances under which the qualification was made—a Catholic king had been just expelled, and the legislature was called upon to provide against his return. Unless persons meant to use arms unlawfully, they had a right to procure them? God forbid that he should ever oppose that opinion. It was borne out by the Bill of Rights; and the paper which had been quoted, and which originated elsewhere, was in unison with that bill; and its reasoning was borne out also by facts. It was a fortunate paper for the other side of the House; for, having no argument that applied to the case, they looked for an argument in something that had occurred in another quarter. They were anxious to produce a debate, and they had no other means of effecting it than by adverting to that paper. His hon. friend said, "I object to the principle of the bill; but, notwithstanding that, I will not oppose its passing, if two points are conceded to me." "No," said the noble lord, "I must have a debate; I must have an opportunity of introducing a little party spirit into the proceeding." Not being able to conduct a business of that nature with so much delicacy as his right hon. friend, the noble lord, he handed to him the document, and it became his task to comment on it, with a view, no doubt, that his observations should go through all the newspapers. The document anserted that the subject had a right to arm, and he (Mr. Tierney) said so too. If he correctly understood that paper (for he had no idea of defending the writings of others—it was sufficient for him to defend himself), it stated that the Bill of Rights gave to the people the privilege of possessing arms. And he would maintain that that privilege was not broken in upon by the acts which the right hon. gentleman had quoted. Those acts related to Scotland; and not, indeed, to the whole of Scotland, but merely to a part of it. That England was at the time in danger, no man could deny; but they could find no bill authorizing a search for arms, which applied to this country. Why, it might be asked, should such a power be granted at that period? He would answer the question. Because the great body of the Jacobites were concentrated at Manchester at that time. But, notwithstanding the dangers which existed in Scotland, notwithstanding the dangers which threatened England, Lancashire altogether escaped the visitation of such a measure as this, although unfortunately it could not now escape. He contended that this was not a precedent. Scotland was in a state of rebellion when the measure was enacted. Where was there any rebellion now? The measure to which the right hon. gentleman alluded proved nothing, unless it clearly bore on the question; and could he say that the same state of things existed now as was in existence then? His argument was of no use, unless he could show, that the dangers of the present day were similar to those of 1745. The right hon. gentleman said, “Can there be a doubt, when you pass a bill to prevent training, that the men who are thus exercised mean to have arms?” That was very true; but then a doubt might very naturally arise whether in fact they had them. It was by great good fortune that the right hon. gentleman had got hold of the protest ready cut and dried; for without it he could have furnished nothing of an argument. He (Mr. Tierney) was obliged to speak of it, after having heard it casually read [Here Mr. Canning threw the protest across the table to Mr. Tierney]. By good fortune he had now got the document, and he was convinced that nothing contained in the acts that had been cited, proved that the doctrines contained in it were fallacious. The preamble of those acts set forth, that in the highlands of Scotland men were in the habit of marching about in military array. This was a necessary consequence of their clanship. The male population of the highlands were all armed, not secretly but publicly and openly. There was no concealment about them: they practised those exercises and made use of those weapons with which their forefathers had been acquainted. Was not this a good deal like what passed at the present day? What information had they got on which they could fairly proceed? They had been favoured with a few assertions, that a good many pikes had been seen; and with certain other assertions, that there were a good many more pikes concealed. This was all the information they had got. Here then was a fine proof of a vast number of persons being armed! Now, with respect to the training-bill, no opposition had been given to it, and it passed in two days. Then said the right hon. gentleman, “Oh! if you pass that bill in two days, can you doubt that those against whom it is directed are arming?” Now, it seemed most extraordinary to him, that if the people were arming, our wise government should take three weeks to consider of this measure, which ought to have been passed in the very first instance. In no part of the kingdom did he believe there was a single hostile musket. He would say nothing about cannon, because there was a statement in which it was mentioned, that a number of cannon were “laying about.” But this was the way in which ministers went on; they could not make out a good case, and then they talked of precedent; and those whose opinion did not coincide with their’s they immediately reproached with not having read Smollett’s Continuation of Hume’s History. But he would again repeat, that England was the country in question here; it was to it the protest referred; and acts passed with respect to Ireland or Scotland had nothing to do with it. He maintained that what the right hon. gentleman quoted as a precedent was no precedent of any kind or sort whatever; or, if it was a precedent, it was one, as he had before shown, which made in favour of his (Mr. Tierney’s) argument; because, though in 1745 the Jacobites were in arms at Manchester, still no law was enacted empowering any person to search for arms in England. Notwithstanding the right hon. gentleman’s comments on that paper, he conceived that its statement was correct. He was sorry that the right hon. gentleman had read it, and he expected that he would have been interrupted by an hon. and learned friend below him. He conceived that the act would have been treated as a breach of privilege, because the right hon. gentleman had not only read the proceedings of another place, but had introduced a newspaper to read them from. He might be allowed, however, to say, that there was not a word in that paper which he would not willingly sign, because, in so doing, he expressed his assent to the opinions that were entertained by his ancestors, and because he felt that there was not a sentiment contained in it, to which any Englishman could with justice object. Having disposed of that, he had disposed of the right hon. gentleman's speech. All that the right hon. gentleman had shown was, that those desperate Whigs had from time to time determined to put down the enemies of that family whom they had sat upon the throne. Yes; those desperate Whigs took the necessary precautions for that purpose. But were they, because they had acted thus, to be dragged in on every occasion, whatever the subject of discussion might be? Had the right hon. gentleman imbibed such a hatred against them, that he would never act with them under any circumstances? He asked this, because he thought he could find a newspaper statement, if such a statement could be credited, which showed that, with all their demerits on their heads, the right hon. gentleman had no objection to accept of office with them. He might perhaps take the liberty of observing that the right hon. gentleman was not very nice in the selection of his company; and those who looked to the right hon. gentleman's right and left, would see the truth of the observation. He should now come to the bill itself; and here he could not help observing that, though he was willing to do every thing in reason to accommodate the right hon. gentleman opposite, and to show him how far he was from acting upon mere party motives in the opposition which he gave to the measures now before parliament, he could not accommodate him upon the present occasion, because he thought that the bill as now proposed to their consideration, was pregnant with danger of every description, and therefore was of such a nature as ought to excite the jealousy of every man in the country. If, however, any necessity for enacting it could be proved, not indeed by such precedents as had been recently quoted, but by fair and legitimate evidence, he would consent to give such power to the executive government. His hon. and learned friend had never said, that even if a case were made out, such powers ought not to be entrusted to the magistracy; by no means: neither had he (Mr. Tierney) ever stood up for so absurd and so self-refuting a proposition. His hon. and learned friend had merely said that such a bill was not passed, when great danger existed in the country from numbers of its inhabitants being in open correspondence with a foreign enemy. He (Mr. Tierney) said so too; and would say, in addition, that in 1812, when the country was certainly in much greater danger than it was at present, no such bill had any existence. At that time there could not be any doubt of arms being in the hands of the disaffected, as large parties of them were perpetually scouring the country, in order to seize them; and yet no necessity for such measures as were now proposed was then asserted to exist. The real question, therefore, on which the House was called to decide was, whether a case of such imminent danger as to justify the passing of this bill had or had not been made out by ministers? For his own part, he must say, that he thought that it had not. There might be a few pikes in the possession of some individuals, and here and there a pistol; but no evidence of this was before the House, and therefore it was impossible to say decidedly that there was great danger in the country. All cases, however, were to be judged according to their circumstances. In former times arms were thrown away by persons in high stations, in order that they might be found by the disaffected; at present there was not among the disaffected a single name above that of a humble manufacturer. Arms therefore could not be given them, but evidently must be purchased by them. The right hon. gentlemen on the other side ought, among the other documents which he read for their amusement, to have read certain letters which were written about a £1. note which was suddenly missing out of the radical treasury; and he would then have convinced every gentleman in the House of the extreme difficulty the government would find in contending against such an exchequer! He would go as far as he could to allay the feelings of alarm which were entertained by others, and so would his honourable friend the member for Shrewsbury. Change but the clause which authorized a single magistrate to issue a warrant, under which forcible entry might be made by night into any House where arms were suspected to be concealed—make it even requisite that such warrant should be signed by two magistrates, and no objection would be made to the present bill: he was willing, rigorous as it was, that it should pass into law, if its regulations were only made consonant to the feelings and habits of the country. This led him to the consideration of the real question now before them, whether the power of issuing a warrant to search for arms ought to be vested in a single magistrate, and whether that warrant ought to be granted upon the oath of a single witness. He maintained that it ought not to be vested in a single magistrate; but the noble lord, on the contrary, asserted, that there was an end at once to the bill, if the warrant required the signature of more than one magistrate. The arguments which the noble lord had used to establish this position, had not convinced him of its stability; for he was well aware that magistrates (and he meant them no disrespect in what he now said) were not always selected for their wisdom and learning; they got into the commission of the peace by a variety of ways; and it therefore was possible that some of them might act upon party motives; that some of them might be intemperate; and that some of them might even act under feelings of alarm. A magistrate of this latter description might write up to government, that 50,000 men were arming, and were intending to burst forth into open insurrection. Would such a man disbelieve the information of another, who applied for a warrant against a third individual, on the ground that arms were concealed in his house? Certainly not; and, therefore, under such circumstances, it would not be right that such authority should be intrusted to him alone. But a magistrate, as he had before remarked, might also act for party purposes; and he did think, that if government wanted proof of any conspiracy, they might obtain it by application to some of these party magistrates? How far, then, was it expedient to allow the possibility of the power in question being vested in a magistrate of this description? "But," said the gentlemen on the other side, "if it be requisite to wait till the signatures of two magistrates are obtained, the arms will be removed beyond the reach of discovery." He did not see that this would be the case quite so clearly as the opponents of the amendment: on the contrary, he was inclined to maintain that in the disturbed districts the signatures of two magistrates might always be obtained in half an hour; for if they were not to be obtained in that time, it would be owing to their absence from their posts, and their reluctance to do their duty, which he should be the last man in the world to impute to them. The noble lord had also stated, that great advantage would be derived to the country from giving the magistrates the power of seizing arms by night. For, said he, "if any attempts are made to seize them by day, those who possess them will see the approach of the civil power from a distance, and whilst they are approaching, will take good care to conceal them." If there was any force in this argument, it went to show how much better it would be to strike out of the clause the words "by day," as it evidently showed the intention of always executing the search by night. Now, could any measure be in itself more objectionable, or in its effects more calculated to exasperate the disturbed districts, already in too great a state of exasperation, than a measure which rendered the houses of their inhabitants liable to search at any hour of the night, and which subjected their wives and daughters, during that search, to all kinds of insult and indignity, merely because an informer chose to swear not that they had, but that he believed that they had concealed arms on their premises? Could any thing be more dreadful than that an individual, upon such a belief, should have his house broken open by armed ruffians, his privacy invaded, and his whole family exposed to the gaze of overbearing men in authority? He would ask those members of the House who were connected with Ireland, what was the nature of the scenes which they witnessed in that country whenever it was their misfortune to go in search of arms; he would ask them whether they were not of the most painful and heart-rending description; and he would put it to them as men to say, whether it was not probable that, if this bill passed, similar scenes would be witnessed in England. Ready, therefore, as he should be to place additional power in the hands of government, whenever the necessity of granting such additional power was made out to his satisfaction, still he would always contend for the alteration of a clause like the present; for he never could agree to allow this search for arms by night, whilst he recollected how revolting it was to humanity, and how great an outrage upon decency or decorum. Besides, it would not facilitate in the slightest degree the discovery of concealed arms, especially when they were in any accumulated numbers, as those members for Ireland who were old enough to recollect the circumstances of the rebellion could inform the House. Those of the disaffected who now had arms, knowing the bills to be in agitation, would take good care to have them lodged in places of security long before they were passed into laws; and yet the House aware as it was of that circumstance, was going to pass a law, by which women might be taken out of their beds at any hour of the night, and have the very beds on which they were sleeping ripped open in this search for arms. For the House could not forget that it was about their beds that the people of Ireland had generally concealed their arms; and that when the magistrates went to their cabins with soldiers, in order to seize them, scenes of such brutal violence and cruelty occurred as humanity could not repeat, and as imagination could hardly conceive. He therefore entreated them to pause, before they gave their consent to so harsh, so severe, and so unprecedented a clause. An hon. gentleman in the course of the debate had said, that the great Whigs during the late disturbances had co-operated, as far as they could, with the leaders of the radicals. After all the protests into which they had entered since the commencement of the session against both the plans and the principles of the radicals, after the nightly repetitions which they had made of the disgust and abhorrence excited in their minds by the various artifices which they (the radicals) used to delude the people, was it not too much to say that the Whigs had co-operated with them? Could any men have gone farther than the Whigs had done in condemning both their conduct and the motive of their conduct? He had been inclined to grant through not without cause being shown for the grant, such additional powers to ministers as the exigencies of the times required; he had agreed to the training bill on the representations which had been made of the frequency of the practice; he would have agreed to this bill in all its clauses if any necessity for doing so had been made out to him. But no, that was not enough; it would not do for certain gentlemen in the House: they taunted him with observations like these—"You must consent to vote for the Seditious Meetings' Prevention bill; you must consent to vote for all the restrictions we intend to put upon the press; you must consent to vote for our Blasphemous and Seditious Libel bill; or else it must be considered that you are in league with the Radicals." If to defend the constitution under which he had lived in freedom from every attack, from every quarter—if to maintain those privileges which were the best inheritance of Englishmen, in their full vigour and purity, constituted the being in league with the Radicals, then he allowed that he was in league with the Radicals; then he allowed that he, much as he hated the term, was a Radical, and would continue a Radical as long as he lived. He never would consent to this bill in its present form; and he implored the House not to consent to it, if they had any respect to the feelings of men, either as fathers or as husbands. If the bill had only gone to meet the present danger, he possibly might have given his vote for it; but it did more than this; it contained clauses of wanton and unnecessary cruelty, and was so framed, that it would go farther than any measure which could possibly be devised to counteract the good effects which might be derived from other of the bills by which it was accompanied. Unless the amendments of his hon. friend were agreed to, he, for one, should vote against the bill.

Mr. T. Wilson thought it would be advisable to get rid of as much of the rigour of the bill before the committee as possible. He was convinced that the people were generally loyal and obedient; he did not therefore see any necessity for the extraordinary coercion that the obnoxious clauses manifested, and unless the bill were stripped of them, he conceived it would tend much to aggravate those who were well affected to the government of the country.

Mr. Booth Wilbraham said, he had stated in 1812, that in the manufacturing districts the number of magistrates had at all times been small, from the absence of gentlemen; and he thought that it would defeat the object of the bill to render the sanction of another magistrate necessary. Recent circumstances were not calculated to add to the number of resident gentlemen. At that time there existed a necessity for empowering a single magistrate to act, and that necessity existed still.

Mr. Wynn observed, that he did not see any reason why his right hon. friend should have singled him out as the most likely person to have interrupted the right hon. gentleman on the other side during the time he was reading a certain paper to the House, as he was not in the habit of rising to vindicate its privileges, except when he thought that the violation of those privileges tended to produce some practical inconvenience. With regard to the objections which his right hon. friend had taken against the precedents which had been quoted to defend this bill, he must say that they were rather of a curious nature. His right hon. friend had said that they referred only to the Highlands of Scotland, and therefore were not proper precedents for extending a similar measure to England. Why, however, he would ask, was the precedent confined only to the Highlands? Because in those days they were the chief seat of disaffection against the government. The same reason was sufficient for the application of similar measures to those districts which were now disturbed. No reasonable objection had yet been urged against the execution of the warrant by night, and therefore he should give his warmest support to the bill.

Lord George Cavendish declared his intention of voting against the bill, unless some alteration was made in the clause at present under discussion. Nobody could have a firmer reliance than he had upon the magistracy of the county which he represented: he was certain that they never would abuse any powers which might be entrusted to them; but there were other magistrates upon whom he could not place the same reliance, especially after the occurrences of the 16th of August. He felt himself warranted, from information which he had received from different parts of Derbyshire, in observing, that in that county, there had not been the slightest disturbance for some years, except that partial insurrection which took place a short time ago. Why, then, was Derbyshire to be included in the bill?

General Grosvenor said, that satisfied as he was of the necessity of passing a bill of this nature, he was not satisfied of the necessity of giving to the magistrates the right of searching for arms by night.

Sir M. W. Ridley believed the bill to be necessary, but argued against the clause empowering the search by night.

Mr. Lyttelton would not have thought it necessary to have spoken at all on this question had he not concurred with his honourable friends in thinking that this bill was stretched farther than humanity required, in giving to magistrates the power of search by night. Though he was afraid of an insurrection, and even of a rebellion, bursting forth in the manufacturing districts, he could not see any advantage arising from the execution of this search-warrant for arms in the night-time, which would not arise as well from its execution in the day time. Besides, the effect of the bill, if passed with this obnoxious clause in it, would be to excite disgust in the bosoms of the well-affected, who would be shocked by the horrors which would attend the execution of it. He did not, however, see the expediency of having the signature of two magistrates to the warrant, which had been so warmly advocated by some hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Wilberforce said, that he should vote for the original clause, and against the amendment. The publicity which was given to every transaction in this country would guard the powers which were entrusted to the magistracy under it from being abused. There was not a county under the operation of the bill which did not possess more than one or two newspapers; and if any abuse was committed, they would take care to blazon it forth to the country. Besides, let the committee remember for what the search was to be made. It was for arms which persons kept for the injury of themselves, and for the destruction of others; it was for the seizure of arms from persons who had made up their minds to resist legal authority. There could be no doubt of the object for which those arms were kept. Upon the principle of humanity, therefore, he would support the original clause. Prevention was better than punishment. It was better to seize the arms of evil-disposed persons than to suffer them to go on from bad to worse, from disaffection to blood and murder.

Sir Joseph Yorke said, he had voted for nine and twenty years on the ministerial side of the House, but, if the obnoxious clauses were insisted on, he should, for once, favour the gentlemen opposite with his vote.

The committee then divided: For the Original Clause, 215; for the Amendment, 107: Majority 108.

On reading the clause which enumerated the counties to which the bill was to be limited, Mr. Brougham asked lord Lowther, whether he, as representative for Westmorland, had given any reasons for including that county?

Lord Lowther replied, that he thought it right to include Westmorland, as it lay between the disaffected districts of Scotland and Lancashire.

Mr. Brougham said, it appeared then that Westmorland was to be punished, not for any radical principles, of which it had none, but on account of its misfortune in being situated between radical districts. The noble lord happened, however, to be unfortunate in his geography, for Dumfriesshire was situated between the disaffected part of Scotland and Lancashire, and yet it was not included. Perhaps the noble lord might as well urge that Westmorland was included in order to prepare for another measure, to stop the radicals in transitu through that county.

Mr. Bennet said, that the noble lord had traduced the character of his county, and upon his authority the House was called upon to pass this most odious law respecting a peaceable and well disposed county, and in the most odious shape in which it could be passed; as it authorized persons to enter into houses during the repose of night. He wished to know, whether the county of Northumberland was to be included, and nine-tenths, who were loyal and well disposed, were to have this stigma upon them? Because the neighbourhood of Newcastle was infested by a few who were the object of contempt and indignation to the great body of the county, Westmorland was to have that stigma upon no evidence at all but the calumny of its own representative. No member so calumniated Northumberland.

Lord Lowther said, the hon. member had been very ready in advising him, but he thought this bill no stigma, nor would his county think it a stigma. He knew nothing of Northumberland; but as to geography he begged to say, that Westmorland was connected by situation with Lancashire, Cumberland, in which Carlisle was disturbed, and the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Mr. Brougham said, the noble lord had really let new light in upon them. Carlisle, then, was now considered disaffected and dangerous. The noble lord had thought otherwise before the 16th of August; for if he had not been misinformed, the noble lord had put down a loyal address proposed to be signed by the grand jury at Carlisle, and had urged that there was no cause for such an address.

Lord Lowther said, that although that was so, yet the necessity of sending for the lord lieutenant, and other reasons for alarm, had afterwards changed his view of the state of that part.

Mr. Wallace defended the loyal address which he had proposed to the grand jury. He had thought it incumbent on them to do as others had done, very properly and very beneficially. No place was in a more dangerous state than Carlisle.

Mr. P. Moore proposed to have the city of Coventry excepted. The mayor and corporation, although as much at variance with the inhabitants as his majesty's ministers were with the whole of the people, represented the inhabitants to be loyal and submissive to the laws. This was part of a system of grinding and simple despotism, of encroachment on encroachment, plot on plot. This was the Pitt system long advancing in its desolating course, and now hastening to a consummation.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that by letters he had received that morning, he could state, that there was every appearance of tranquillity, even in the places in the neighbourhood of Newcastle, where disaffection had appeased. Individuals were fast giving up the classes into which they had formed themselves.

Mr. Bennet said, that the noble lord who was one of the representatives of Derbyshire, had asked, why that county was included? The noble lord opposite had deigned to give no reply. The member for Coventry had asked, why the people of Coventry, reported by the constituted authorities to be in a state of perfect loyalty, should be included? Still no reply from the noble lord. The sole purpose of this extension of an unnecessary, irritating, and barbarous measure was to circulate the system of delusion and deception.

The report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, December 15.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE POOR.—MR. SALISBURY'S PETITION.] Mr. Booth Wilbraham said, he held in his hand a Petition from a Mr. William Salisbury, the author of a plan for employing to advantage the labouring poor. The plan had been carried into execution in the city of London, under the authority of the magistrates, and had been found to answer so well, that he was convinced great benefit might be derived from its more general adoption, and he was desirous of obtaining the report of a committee of the House on the subject. The object of the petitioner was not to obtain any pecuniary compensation, but to have the attention of parishes drawn towards it, as he conceived that if his plan was carried into execution, it might diminish considerably the expense of the maintenance of the poor, by enabling parishes to employ them to advantage.

The Petition was then brought up, and read. On the motion that it do lie on the table, Lord Francis Osborne put a question to Mr. S. Bourne, with a view to learn, whether he intended to move for the revival of the committee on the poor laws?

Mr. S. Bourne intimated, that he intended to move the re-appointment of the committee.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, he conceived it his duty to state that the petitioner's plan had been carried into execution in the House of Correction of the city of London on a small scale, and had been found of considerable advantage, in affording employment to persons capable of labouring. It gave employment to females as well as males. As far as the experiment had been tried, it had met with the approbation of the magistrates of London. As the object of this plan was the employment of the poor, and as an hon. baronet (sir W. de Crespigny) had given notice of a motion, which stood for to-morrow, for the appointment of a committee to take into consideration the plan of Mr. Owen, perhaps it might be advisable that Mr. Salisbury's plan should be referred to the same committee.

Mr. B. Wilbraham observed that the object of Mr. Salisbury was the employment of parish poor, whereas the plan of Mr. Owen went to the general employment of the poor in the agricultural districts. Mr. Salisbury's plan had already been carried into effect to a certain extent.

Sir W. De Crespigny observed, that Mr. Owen's plan was certainly on a more large scale, and went to the general employment of the poor in spade husbandry. Mr. Owen conceived that the distress of labouring classes was occasioned by the extent to which mechanical improvement had been carried. He hoped the hon. member would postpone his motion for the appointment of a committee to consider Mr. Salisbury's plan, if he had such an object in view, till his motion for tomorrow was disposed of.

Mr. Mellish said, that Mr. Salisbury's plan might be of advantage in particular instances; but he disapproved of all plans of employing the people attended with great loss to the nation at large.

Mr. S. Bourne said, that the plan of Mr. Salisbury, having for its object the advantageous employment of parish poor, might be submitted to the committee on the poor laws.

The motion for the petition lying on the table was withdrawn with the consent of the House; after which, Mr. B. Wilbraham moved, that it be referred to a committee.

Mr. Huskisson thought it very possible the House might not think fit to appoint a committee to enter on so extensive a plan as Mr. Owen's; but the petition before the House related to a specific plan of employment for parish poor, and it was of great consequence, at the present moment, to inquire whether it could or could not be realised. Every gentleman acquainted at all with Mr. Owen's plan, knew that it embraced far more extensive plans than the employment of the poor.

Sir W. De Crespigny said, that Mr. Owen had no wish whatever of deriving any emolument from his plan. He had no other object but to benefit mankind in general, and this country in particular.

Mr. J. Smith was happy that any plan for the employment of the poor was in the hands of the member for Dover: it could not be in better hands.

Sir C. Burrell wished to caution the House against allowing themselves to be run away with by their feelings of humanity. It had been said in recommendation of the spade husbandry, that the produce from it was the double of that of the plough. A case on which great stress had been laid, was that of a tenant of the hon. member for Newcastle, who was said to have obtained a produce by the spade, of  $17\frac{1}{2}$  quarters of wheat per acre. On inquiry into the subject, he learned from the tenant himself, that the produce had only been  $7\frac{1}{2}$  quarters per acre.

Mr. Brougham was extremely averse to the giving a sanction to any visionary scheme of general employment of the poor. If any practicable plan were proposed for the better employment of the poor, lying within a narrow compass; that might be a fit subject for the examination of a committee. But the idea of superseding the plough husbandry by the spade throughout the whole country, was altogether out of the question.

Mr. Lyttelton suggested the propriety of having the petition printed, that members might have an opportunity of considering it before the motion for a committee was submitted to the House.

Mr. B. Wilbraham had no objection to accede to this suggestion.

Mr. Wilberforce thought the House ought to be very cautious how they gave countenance to the mistaken notions which prevailed among many people at present, with respect to extensive plans for the employment of the people. It might, however, be possible to provide employment in public works for great numbers of the working classes. The disproportion between the demand for labour and the number of labourers, would thus be lessened, by which wages would materially rise.

Mr. B. Wilbraham having withdrawn his motion, the petition was afterwards ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS.] Lord Althorp said, in rising to move for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, he wished to explain some particular circumstances in which it differed from the bill passed by the House last session. The House would recollect, that the bill of last session subjected the debtor to a previous examination of his affairs before coming into court, and that it gave the creditor the power of compelling the debtor to come forward and surrender his property. In consequence of the opposition which that bill met with in another House, the old Insolvent act was renewed till April next. His majesty's ministers had not only removed the late commissioner of the insolvent court, but they had removed every clerk, and in doing so, he was convinced they had acted most properly. Whatever was the cause, what had passed had taken away all confidence in that court, and a complete change was absolutely necessary. As far as he could learn, the effect of the change had been every thing that could be wished. The present commissioner, as far as the provisions of the law would admit of it, had done every thing that persons engaged in trade could wish. In the bill of last session, he had assumed, that it was impossible for one commissioner to do justice between all parties; but from what had been done by the present commissioner, he thought one commissioner would be sufficient. He understood the bill was lost in another place, principally on account of the power which it gave creditors to compel debtors to take advantage of the act, and to sell their real property. It appeared to him, that the real property of debtors ought to be subject to the payment of their debts, and that a provision to that purpose ought to be adopted. But as such a provision might be fatal to the success of the bill, he now proposed that the real property of the debtor, instead of being sold for the benefit of the creditor, should only be sequestered for their benefit, the estate itself not being taken from the debtor. His object was to have the bill printed before the recess, that gentlemen might have time to consider it during the recess. The present act expired on the 23rd of April, and he wished to bring this bill before the House soon after the recess, as it was important that a measure of so much importance should have due consideration. He thought it absolutely necessary that a previous examination into the affairs of the insolvent should take place, and that the creditor should have the power of compelling the insolvent to take the benefit of the act, and unless he carried these two points he should consider it his duty to oppose any bill for the relief of insolvent debtors. He concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill for the relief of insolvent debtors.—Leave given.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL—PETITION OF THE BOOKSELLERS AGAINST IT.] Mr. J. Smith said, he had a petition to present, to which he took the liberty of requesting the most serious attention of the House, as the subject of it was of the greatest importance, and it was signed by some of the most respectable persons in this metropolis. It was a petition signed by 52 booksellers and printers of this metropolis, complaining of that provision in the bill now in progress through the House, for the punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels, by which a second conviction was punishable with banishment, and transportation for seven years. Many most respectable men were in the occupation and trade of bookselling, and invested large capitals in it. From their education and attainments, they were qualified, in point of fact, for the best society in this country; and they were in a state of the greatest distress and alarm on account of this bill. It was well known that the greatest uncertainty prevailed with respect to what was or was not a libel. That was a libel which was pronounced to be so by a jury. Those gentlemen were as desirous as any persons could be that the extensive circulation of blasphemous libels should be prevented as far as possible; but they humbly conceived that the punishment of transportation, which the law applied only to felons and persons convicted of the greatest crimes, and was, therefore, not analogous to the offence in question, was not called for to ensure that object, and would have the effect of preventing respectable persons from embarking their property in the trade of bookselling. Among the petitioners were individuals possessed of enormous capital; some of them had hundreds of thousands of pounds passing through their hands every year. Was it possible that men would embark capital in a trade which they could not carry on with security, if unfortunately they were once convicted of a libel, for the second offence sent them to New South Wales? Among the gentlemen who had subscribed this petition, many would abandon the trade were this bill to pass. They hoped that some other mode of punishment would be substituted to this severe one. Were this bill to pass as it was, it would be in the power of any discontented person, any person employed in a shop who had a dispute with his master, to put this individual in danger.

Mr. Bernal said, the literature of the country was inseparably connected with its prosperity, and any restraints on literature could not fail to be attended with the most ruinous effects. Speaking from his own personal knowledge, he could say, many individuals of great wealth and intelligence were engaged in the book trade in London. He hoped the House would pay serious attention to the petition. He hoped the noble lord and his colleagues would think it due to the intelligence and general loyalty of the petitioners, to pay some attention to the petition.

The Petition was brought up and read. It was to the following effect :

“ That we have observed with concern the increased and extensive circulation of certain seditious and blasphemous libels which have of late been printed and published, and are anxious that such remedy may be provided as to the wisdom of parliament shall seem fit ; but that we nevertheless view with great apprehension and alarm the provisions of a bill now under the consideration of the House of Commons, entitled “ An Act for the more effectual Prevention and Punishment of Blasphemous and Seditious Libels,” so far as it is proposed that it should be thereby enacted, that if any person shall, after the passing of that act, be legally convicted of having composed, printed, or published, any blasphemous libel, or any such seditious libel as therein mentioned, and shall, after being so convicted, offend a second time, and be thereof legally convicted, such person may, on a second conviction, be adjudged, at the discretion of the court, either to suffer such punishment as may now by law be inflicted in cases of high misdemeanors, or to be banished from the united kingdom and all other parts of his majesty’s dominions, for such term as the court, in which such conviction shall take place, shall order, or to be transported to such place as shall be appointed by his majesty for the transportation of offenders for any term not exceeding        years ; and that it should be farther enacted, that if any offender who shall be so ordered by any such court as aforesaid, to be banished or transported in manner as aforesaid, shall be afterwards at large within any part of the united kingdom, or any other part of his majesty’s dominions, without some lawful cause, before the expiration of the term for which such offender shall have been so ordered to be banished or transported as aforesaid, every such offender being so at large as aforesaid, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall suffer death as in cases of felony without benefit of clergy.

“ That the punishment of transportation and of death are punishments applicable only to felonies and offences, so specific and certain in their nature, as to exclude the commission thereof through ignorance or inadvertence, and necessarily to include the evil intent in the felonious or illegal act. But that the offence of libel is not specific and certain, and is incapable of being rendered previously certain by any specific definition ; and that libels may be, and frequently are, published by persons having no community of intention with the authors or composers thereof ; and being, from the nature of their business, necessarily unacquainted with the contents or probable effects of the same.

“ That questions of libel, both in law and fact, are determined by a jury on the prosecution thereof, and that the verdict of the jury upon a trial, is the sole criterion of judgment, as to the legal or illegal nature and effect of a publication ; and that such verdicts, depending upon individual opinion, are always uncertain and frequently contradictory, in so far, that the authors and composers and first publishers of political and other publications have, in some instances, been acquitted upon prosecutions for libel ; and subsequent venders, no way concerned in the printing or first publishing thereof, have been convicted by different juries for the publication of the same libels, and punished upon such conviction by fine and imprisonment.

“ That a verdict of acquittal, on a prosecution for libel, whereby the publication complained of is declared in the opinion of the jury to be obnoxious, does not legitimate the continued sale thereof, but that the same defendant is subject to prosecution for each subsequent act of publication of the same work, and in doubtful cases, is liable to probable eventual conviction and punishment ; and that a prosecution for libel, even in cases of acquittal, does therefore generally operate to restrain the continued circulation of the offensive work, and in some cases to suppress the same altogether.

“ That as general booksellers and publishers, we are more especially affected by the proposed act, and that the more extensive and respectable the trade carried on is, the more probable it becomes that we may, innocently and with good intentions, fall under the censure and punishment of the proposed law.

“ That instances are not wanting in which booksellers have been convicted, and have suffered punishment, for the sale of libellous works, by servants without their privity, and, it may be, even contrary to their command ; and that as no circumspection can guard against the malice of an offended, or the negligence of a careless servant, we shall be liable to incur the ultimate penalty of the proposed law, for acts of which we are not even cognizant, and against which prudence would be unavailing.

"That from the nature of our trade, we are daily employed to execute orders from customers as intermediate hands, in the distribution of new works, of the contents and nature whereof we are unavoidably ignorant, and that for each copy of such works so distributed by us, we are now responsible upon an indictment or information, and are liable, notwithstanding the perfect integrity of our intentions, to punishment, as in case of a misdemeanor; and that if the proposed bill should pass into a law, we may in such cases become liable to transportation for seven years, and to the punishment of death in case of return from transportation.

"That a very great number of historical, political, and religious works, are written and composed and published in London at stated periods, and that most of such works are of temporary and immediate public interest, and that such works issue from the press, and pass through the hands of several different booksellers, and many thousands thereof are delivered to the readers thereof within a very few hours after their first publication, and that a previous perusal or consideration of such works, by such venders of the same as are not the original or first publishers of the same, is impracticable.

"That many standard works upon historical, philosophical, and political subjects, which have now obtained a classical reputation, and are daily sold by respectable booksellers, under the licence of a long prescription, may be reasonably considered to be liable to question as libellous by analogy to more recent works which have been subjected to persecution, and that such standard works therefore do not present any criterion for judgment as to the effect of new publications—but may themselves be the subject of future prosecution, and may subject the venders thereof to the punishments proposed by the said bill.

"That the ignominy of a punishment which it is proposed to make common to authors, printers, booksellers, and felons, while it operates to deter learned and respectable writers of the most virtuous principles, from treating on political or religious subjects at all, will especially prevent them from engaging in the composition of reviews, magazines, and other vehicles of periodical discussion, to the great and permanent detriment of learning; and will seriously injure the trade of booksellers and printers, in which they have large capitals embarked especially in that extensive branch which embraces the most respectable periodical works in the country; and will tend to throw them into the hands of reckless and desperate men.

"That although we have the greatest confidence in the wisdom and integrity of the present judges of his majesty's courts of law, yet that the power to expatriate and transport for a crime not specific but indefinite in its nature, which exposes ignorance and inadvertence, equally with intentional guilt, is of too extensive and dangerous a nature to be confided to any authority whatever, to be exercised at discretion; and that, in relation to a crime whose turpitude is heightened or diminished by the political aspect of the times, such a power, especially if rendered permanent, might become the engine of great injustice and oppression, against which no character, however perfect, would be a protection.

That from the circumstances stated, our trade and means of living, if not totally destroyed by the intended bill, would be carried on under a state of hazard and insecurity, productive of constant mental inquietude, and destructive of the comfort of ourselves and our families.—They therefore pray that the bill may not in its present state pass into a law."

The Petition having been read,

Lord Castlereagh, with reference to the prayer of this petition said, he wished to state, that when they went into a committee on the bill now on the table, for the punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels, it was his intention to propose an alteration in it, which would in a great measure meet the views of the petitioners. He was sure there was not a more respectable class of men in the country than the booksellers of London. He did not mean to press the punishment of transportation. It was absolutely necessary that the country should be protected against the offence of publishing treasonable or blasphemous libels, by a punishment adequate to that object; but as the punishment of transportation had been particularly objected to, from its having been hitherto assigned to felons, and as he thought the interests of the country might be sufficiently protected by banishment, at the discretion of the court, he should introduce an alteration to that effect. The individual excluded from the country, would not be liable to transportation, unless he returned from his banishment without the consent of the Crown. This security, he trusted, would be found effectual, as transportation was one of the alternatives on a return from banishment. They would thus still adhere to the principle of the bill, as far as related to the second offence.

Mr. M. A. Taylor said, though some part of the obnoxious matter of the bill was removed by the removal of the punishment of transportation, yet till it could be shown that the bill was absolutely necessary, he for one, should oppose it. It was a measure which should be met, in the first instance, as introducing an offence not known to the law of England. Even if the present law were found insufficient for the suppression of those blasphemous and seditious libels, which it was the wish of every man to put down, yet it remained for the noble lord to prove the pressing necessity for introducing this with the other bills which he had brought forward. When such a change in the law was to be made, why not announce it, and allow time for the consideration of it? Why, but because he believed there would be but one voice in England upon the subject. He could conceive the propriety of introducing bills respecting meetings, upon the spur of the occasion, and if they had been limited to the time of exigency, there were those in the House, perhaps, who would not have made much objection to them. But the objection now was, that in three weeks we were actually to change the constitution of the country. Though the noble lord had made a concession by taking away the punishment of banishment, with a view to obviate the opposition of some, he deemed it his duty to state that the concession did not satisfy him.

Lord Castlereagh said, that he did not mention the alteration he had made in the idea that argument would be taken away, but because he deemed it right to apprise the House of the alteration he intended to propose.

Ordered to lie on the table.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] Lord Castlereagh rose to move the second reading of this bill, and observed, that in so doing, he might satisfy the object of the right hon. gentleman opposite, as well as his own, and the general convenience of the House. The bill might then be committed to-morrow and reprinted, so as to be in the hands of members on Friday next. On the question of the third reading the general principle of the bill might be discussed, and he apprehended that this course of proceeding would be found the most advisable which could, under the present circumstances, be adopted. The alterations which it was in contemplation to propose he would now endeavour shortly to explain. The first branch of the measure was that which rendered it applicable to all publications sold under a certain price and treating of political matters. There were two classes of works which he did not think it necessary to include in this description; the one consisted of occasional publications of a local nature, and involving only local interests; the other respected periodical works, published at intervals considerably distant from each other, and which were of considerable importance, both as they related to the diffusion of knowledge and the support of religion and morality. It did not appear to him that it would be proper to saddle such publications with the new duty of four-pence upon each separate number. The House would readily see that the great object of this measure was to apply only to works which were the channels of mischief, and the means by which sedition and blasphemy were propagated through the country. It was intended, therefore, to confine its provisions to periodical works published in succession within the term of 26 days, so as in fact to exempt all monthly and other publications not coming forth within that time. Still, in order to guard against the means of obvious invasions, it might be necessary that the periods of publication should be required to be uniform, and that the application of stamp-duties to all works conveying intelligence should not be avoided. The second branch of this bill referred to the subject of securities to be given by persons publishing facts or intelligence of a particular kind. It was not intended to press inconveniently on newspapers, the principle end in view being to put a responsibility on all persons who sent forth works of a particular description to the public. He certainly must adhere to the principle of requiring security from the publishers of all papers or pamphlets of less than two sheets, and sold under the price of 6d., and issued within the period to which he had alluded. At the same time he wished it to be understood, that the new stamp duties should only be coextensive with periodical publications. The security required as the bill was now framed was 500*l.* generally from the printer; it being at his discretion to produce it himself, or obtain it from three or four other persons. It had been stated to him that this sum was too large, and might be more easily raised or answered for in some places than in others. The times, however, in which we lived, seemed to him to require, that persons exercising the power of the press should be men of some respectability and property. But as it was represented that this sum of 500*l.* might press too heavily on persons of a moderate capital, or in distant places, he would propose to reduce the sum to 300*l.* in London and its vicinity, and to 200*l.* in the provincial towns. He was aware that it might be urged that there were persons not possessed of any capital, who were still anxious to address the public on political questions. Cases of individual hardship might certainly arise; but at a time like the present, it appeared to him necessary that the law should be made effectual for its purpose. An argument might certainly be raised as to the influence of pamphlet writing, upon the morals and interests of the community. Into that argument he would not now diverge. It affected entirely the general principle; and all that he now meant was to give a general description of the amendments or modifications which he was ready to support.

Mr. Tierney felt much obliged to the noble lord for the explanation which he had just given. Without abandoning his objections to the principle of this measure, he was willing to close with the noble lord's proposition as to arrangement.

Mr. Brougham wished that the ground upon which he assented to the second reading should be distinctly understood: the explanations which had been given did not at all remove his general objection to the measure; but he certainly could perceive no advantage which could be derived from discussing it until it was printed with its new alterations. After all that had been said, he still remained of opinion that the introduction of a new punishment into our law was the most dangerous innovation which had been attempted in his time. To another principle he must also decidedly object. It was that which held forth that the possession of a certain fortune was necessary before any man should discuss political questions through the press. The bill was then read a second time.

MISDEMEANORS BILL.] Lord Castlereagh, referring to the order of the day for the second reading of the bill regarding the right of traversing on indictments or informations for misdemeanors, stated, that if no objection was entertained, he should propose that it be now read a second time.

Mr. Tierney observed, that it must be within the recollection of the House, that in his former allusions to this measure, he had spoken in ignorance of its provisions. As he was now informed upon that point, he felt his principal objection removed.—A noble friend of his had, in another place, effected an alteration which would be more beneficial to the interests of society than any enactment for a long period. The power of prosecuting on the part of the Crown was at length defined and limited. He made these remarks with the more satisfaction, because the noble lord to whom he had alluded (lord Holland) was a Whig of the first distinction.

Mr. Brougham professed himself to be also desirous of acknowledging the merits of the noble lord to whom allusion had been made, and he felt it to be the more necessary on this occasion, because the credit of those modifications which the bill had undergone had been, he would not say taken by, but given to, another noble lord, who certainly had never shown himself an advocate for Whig principles; and it might also be remarked, that a similar provision had been submitted by his noble friend five years ago, and rejected by the other House.

Lord Castlereagh said, he was glad that the merits of the bill were acknowledged: whether they were to be ascribed to one noble lord, or to another, he would not then inquire.

The bill was then read a second time.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] The report of this bill was brought up. On the motion that it be now read,

Mr. Powlett said, that though he acknowledged the necessity of the application of the bill to the north of Durham, there was no necessity for it in the south and western parts. He hoped the noble lord would consent to exempt them.—There was an example for this, as the west riding of Yorkshire was the only part of that county subjected to the bill.

Lord Castlereagh thought it was necessary to take the districts which were or had been disturbed, in a large and liberal sense. Though the Bill was an encroachment on constitutional right, it was necessary for security's sake, not only to cover the part where evil prevailed, but so much of the sound part as would prevent the disease from spreading. Though it was unpleasant to resist such appeals from gentlemen, he thought the purpose of the bill could not be answered if counties were divided into districts.

Mr. Lambton said, he was extremely obliged to his hon. colleague for taking credit for the loyalty of the south-western part of Durham, in which he (Mr. Powlett) resided, at the expence of the northern parts. Now, he would say, that the northern part was equally free from disaffection. The western part just as much merited to be subject to this bill as the northern, that was to say, not at all. He moved, as an amendment, that the report be read, on this day six months.

Mr. J. Martin supported the amendment, on the ground of the clause in the bill allowing a search by night.

Mr. Ommaney begged to call the attention of the House to the fact, that the bill would take a different character, if the hours for searching houses were limited, according to the suggestion he had formerly offered. He hoped a clause to that effect would still be adopted, and in that hope he should vote for the amendment.

The House divided; For the Amendment, 38; Against it, 94: Majority, 56.—The report was agreed to.

Thursday, December 16.

MANCHESTER MEETING.—PETITIONS OF MESSRS. REDFORD, BOWKER, BARLOW, AND LEES.] Mr. Brougham said, he held in his hands a petition from a person of the name of Thomas Redford. He had not any acquaintance with this person, nor could he vouch for the accuracy of the statements in the petition, but it was couched in respectful language.

The petition was brought up and read. It purported to be the petition of Thomas Redford, of Middleton, in the county palatine of Lancaster, hatter; and sat forth,

“That for the purpose of agreeing to an address to his royal highness the Prince Regent, and of adopting such resolutions as might seem fit, the petitioner, with many others of his fellow townsmen, attended a meeting at Manchester, on the 16th day of August in the present year, which meeting was legally convened by public advertisement according to the form prescribed by a law recently passed in the House, and sanctioned by the other branch of the legislature, as well as by the executive power of the land; but though guarded by the solemn enactments of the legislature, though acting under, and confiding in, the stern mandate of the law, which saith to the ruthless and violent, ‘so far shalt thou go with impunity, and no further,’ though rudeness or insult had not been known that day, by the petitioner or his neighbours, nor outrage expected, yet, in the very commencement of their peaceable and constitutional proceedings, they were interrupted by an armed force, denominated the Manchester Yeomanry Cavalry, professing an extraordinary share of loyalty, which in the humble judgment of the petitioner is only to be found in a due observance of the law; by men thus circumstanced, disguised in military accoutrements, and with implements of death in their hands, was this sacred enactment broken, and the blood of his majesty’s liege subjects shed without cause without warning of any kind, and apparently without remorse; for be it known to the House, that the men disguised as aforesaid, rushed without delay into the crowd, cutting and bruising with their sabres, and trampling under the hoofs of their horses, the miserable victims of their fury, who were unable, through the intense pressure, to open a way before them, and after they had secured several persons as prisoners who were upon the hustings, even after this professed object of their interference had been accomplished, they suddenly wheeled round upon the astonished and defenceless multitude, and with a rage violent as it was unmanly and unprovoked, commenced anew the work of terror and destruction: in this moment of danger the petitioner was driven by the crowd towards some timber which lay upon the field, where, hemmed in on all sides by the military, and unable to escape, he received from one of the Manchester yeomanry Cavalry, named Alexander Oliver, a severe cut by the sabre, which separated his shoulder-blade, and penetrated deep into his back; that for this violent outrage and breach of the laws, the petitioner has not been able to bring the delinquent to the bar of his country, in consequence of the refusal of the local magistracy to receive depositions respecting the aforesaid transactions; therefore, to the justice and to the humanity of the House the petitioner now appeals, and humbly though earnestly, claims from it that indemnification which the law would award, but which is vainly sought for in the courts, and that protection from similar outrages to which every Englishman is entitled, but which the petitioner is convinced can only be obtained by the prompt interference of the House, in investigating the inhuman transactions of which he complains."

Mr. Lambton presented a petition from Thomas Bowker of Crawshawfold, in the county Palatine of Lancaster, setting forth:

"That on the 16th day of August last, the petitioner attended a public meeting at Manchester, which meeting the petitioner at that time supposed, and still believes, to have been perfectly legal, but that, notwithstanding its legality, and the decorum which prevailed, it was violently attacked and dispersed by the Manchester Yeomanry Cavalry, acting under the local magistracy; that in the confusion which ensued the petitioner was thrown down and trampled upon by the horses, and by the crowd who were flying in terror from their attack, whereby he was shockingly bruised in many parts of his body and his limbs, and he had no sooner recovered from his perilous situation than he attempted, as well as his disabled state would permit him, to retire from the scene of danger and confusion, but had not proceeded farther than a street near by, the name of which is to him at present unknown, than he was attacked by a foot soldier whom he believes belonged to the 88th regiment, and received a severe wound in the belly from a thrust of his bayonet, at the same time that another soldier of the same regiment made a desperate push at the petitioner, which he avoided by throwing himself on the ground; that for these severe bruises and wounds, whereby the petitioner was prevented for a considerable time from earning his livelihood, and from the effects of which he is not yet recovered, he has received no indemnification, and trusting in the wisdom and humanity of the House, which cannot see the liberties of Englishmen wantonly violated, nor their lives put in jeopardy, he solicits such interference on the part of the House as shall bring the authors and executors of the above outrage to the bar of his country."

The petition having been brought up and read,

Mr. Lambton said, he regretted extremely the troubling the House with anything relating to himself. But in consequence of what was stated the other night by a noble lord, he had written immediately to his agent. It would be in the recollection of that House, that the noble lord had stated he was informed that his (Mr. L.'s) agent had dismissed several individuals from his mines in consequence of their being radicals. By a letter which he had this day received from Durham, his agent positively assured him that no radicals had been dismissed from his employment, that he was astonished such reports should be propagated; that the men were never more peaceable than at the present moment.

Sir Robert Wilson presented a petition from Thomas Barlow, of little Henton, in the county Palatine of Lancaster, weaver, setting forth,

"That being at a public meeting which was legally convened at Manchester in the aforesaid county on the 16th of August last, and which said meeting was assembled in an orderly and peaceable manner, when it was assailed by an armed force, styled the Manchester Yeomanry Cavalry, and thrown into great confusion thereby, and a number of lives lost by pressure, by being trampled upon, and by wounds inflicted by the sabres of the yeomanry, aforesaid, and in the horrid confusion which ensued, the direct road of the petitioners retreat was obstructed by one of the said yeomanry, to whose humanity he appealed for that forbearance which in the day of battle himself had never refused even to the enemies of his country, but which, as a sailor and an Englishman, he now asked for in vain; for in attempting to pass the person aforesaid, the petitioner received from him a severe cut upon his head, followed by a lunge at his body, which with difficulty he parried from him with his arm, having no stick or weapon of any kind; that for this outrage and attempt upon his life the petitioner has not received indemnification, nor is he able to identify the person of his assailant, in consequence of his being disguised in the clothes and accoutrements of a soldier; wherefore the petitioner humbly prays, That the House would take such measures as may bring the authors, abettors, and executors of this unmanly outrage to justice."

Sir Francis Burdett presented a petition from Robert Lees, of Oldham, the father of Robert Lees, a young man who died in consequence of the wounds he received on the 16th of August, at Manchester, chiefly complaining of the manner in which the inquest on the body of his son had been conducted by the coroner, and of the impossibility of bringing the persons guilty of the violence by which his son lost his life, to trial.

Mr. Blake said, it did not appear that any application had been made for a criminal information against the magistrates who were said to have refused to interfere. The petitioner therefore had not done what he ought to have done. The conduct of the coroner was complained of. It appeared from what took place in the court of King's-bench, in consequence of the application for a mandamus, that the inquest was one of the most illegal proceedings which ever took place—as soon as the coroner perceived he had done wrong, he did what he could to redress that wrong.

Mr. Brougham said, the hon. gentleman was quite mistaken as to the particulars of the proceedings in the Court of King's-bench, with regard to the inquest. The court entertained the motion for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued to the coroner, and the only reason why the mandamus was not issued was, that the coroner came forward and stated his own irregularity as an excuse for not proceeding further with the inquest. The coroner had acted illegally

—he did not mean to say wilfully so—but he had acted illegally, first in proceeding with an inquest, which had been sworn by his deputy, and without having seen the dead body, and then adjourning the inquest for seven weeks. His own irregular proceeding rendered it impossible to proceed with that inquest. The coroner jumped at this. "O," says he, "if I have acted illegally, I shall stop here, and not go on any farther." The coroner himself had effected this—he jumped at it—and then they were to be told that the people were extravagant in their demands, when they were not satisfied with this mockery of all justice! He was always disposed to speak with respect of the courts of justice; but when he saw that called justice which was a mockery of all justice; when he saw a bare-faced collusion like that which had long been exhibited in the face of the country, when he saw a coroner questioning his own irregularity, and availing himself of his own breach of the law, to escape from the necessity of executing the law, he could not think of dignifying such a mockery of the people of England with the name of justice. They might depend on it, the more they probed these disgraceful transactions, the more infamous they would appear. Gentlemen might wish to stifle all inquiry; but they would never succeed in stifling the discontent which existed, till they inquired both into the proceedings of the 16th, and the proceedings of the coroner. He did not approve of the transactions of the 16th of August, but he was convinced that not half the agitation and disgust had been excited in the country by those transactions, as by some which unfortunately had followed them; the first, the unhappy fatality (for he blamed no one) by which the grand jury for the county of Lancaster threw out the bills which were presented to them. For if there had been a trial before a jury of the county, and one of the twelve judges of the land, not before a Lancashire magistrate, or an Oldham inquest, whatever the result had been, the country would have been satisfied with it. That was the first unfortunate circumstance; the second, was the conduct of the coroner at the different examinations, coupled with the subsequent proceedings at Warrington, and the ultimate adjournment of that inquest, as if with a view to prepare the way for putting an end to the inquiry altogether, in the way which was afterwards pursued: these facts, he feared, had made the breach between the people and the constituted authorities, if not irreparable, at least infinitely wider than it had been before. It was said by an hon. gentleman, that there were false statements in the petition, but this was no objection to the reception of the petition, nay, even in the present practice, it seemed to be no objection to a speech. When it was necessary to raise a false alarm, there was no objection made to a statement, that 100,000 men were in arms, out of a population of only 150,000 men, women and children, altogether. The physical impossibility was not thought of. It was rather deemed an argument to heighten the alarm. What! it was said, in so narrow a district as that between the Tyne and Weir, in a district with so few people, good God—100,000 men in arms! Then afterwards, in a place which he could not name, it was said by one noble lord, that the colliers on the Tyne were all in arms, to the number of 16,000. Another noble person immediately took up the subject, for both seemed on the occasion respondere parati, and said “yes, they are all in arms, not 16,000, but 16,600 exactly.” [A laugh.] But now it turned out on the statement of the hon. member for Newcastle, that the whole of the colliers in the district barely amounted to between 15 and 16,000: so that not only more than the whole male population were armed above ground, but more than the whole population were armed under ground also. The hon. member for Durham had also told them, that out of the whole of the colliers, his own amounting to more than 1,000, were not in arms. But it seemed that in the fervour and enthusiasm of alarm, gentlemen did not care what statements were made, or what statements were believed; it reminded him of the Hudibrastic couplet, so often quoted—

“ Certes, the pleasure is as great
Of being cheated as to cheat.”

The petition was then read. It purported to be the petition of Robert Lees, of Oldham, in the county palatine of Lancaster, cotton spinner; and sat forth,

“ That the petitioner's son John Lees, a youth twenty-two years of age, having attended the meeting held at Manchester, on the 16th of August last, was, as the petitioner is led to believe, without any just cause or provocation, most inhumanly attacked and cut by the yeomanry cavalry, and afterwards most unmercifully beaten by the clubs or batons of the police and special constables, and also trampled upon by the horses of the cavalry, whereby he was so much injured that he was from that time incapable of attending to his ordinary employment, and lingered in pain and debility until the night of the 6th of September following when he died; that the surgeon who attended the petitioner's son having certified that his death was occasioned by violence, several householders in Oldham and the neighbouring townships were served, late in the evening of the 7th of September, with summonses from the coroner of the district, to attend the next morning, at half-past ten o'clock, to serve as jurors on an inquest to be held on the body of the petitioner's son, and, at the time appointed, the said jurors assembled, and were met by a person named Battye, who attended as deputy for the said coroner for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the death of the petitioner's son; and, having sworn the jury, he attended with them to take a view of the body, but finding that several witnesses had arrived from Manchester to give evidence upon the said inquiry, he refused to proceed in the inquest; and having adjourned the same for three hours, he at the expiration of that time further adjourned the same until the 10th day of the same month, when the said Battye promised that either Mr. Ferrand, his employer, or Mr. Milne, a neighbouring coroner, should certainly attend and proceed in the investigation; that, on the next day, a surgeon attended by the direction of the said Mr. Battye, to open and examine the body of the petitioner's son, and he was then allowed to be interred; that, on the 10th day of September, the jury again assembled; but, although Mr. Milne attended, he refused to interfere, in the business as he said it did not belong to his district, and the inquest was farther adjourned until the 25th day of the same month; and during this interval some of the Manchester newspapers inserted the vilest falsehoods to depreciate the reputation of the deceased, with a view as the petitioner believes, to extinguish every feeling of sympathy for his fate; that, on the 25th of September, Mr. Ferrand attended, and after swearing the jury, and ascertaining from them that they had all seen the body, he proceeded to examine witnesses; but in the course of the investigation he adjourned several times for days together, without any reasonable or probable cause, and merely, as the petitioner believes, to harass and tire out the witnesses, who came day after day a considerable distance to give testimony; that in detailing his complaint to the House, the petitioner exceedingly regrets he should be under the necessity of impeaching the conduct of any individual, especially one employed in the administration of justice; but the petitioner is compelled by a regard to truth to declare that according to all the information he had received from numerous individuals who witnessed the proceedings of the inquest the coroner throughout evinced a manifest partiality for the magistrates and yeomanry cavalry of Manchester, to whose illegal and violent conduct the petitioner attributes the premature death of his son; that, among other things, the said Mr. Ferrand refused to allow the witnesses to give in evidence numerous acts of violence and atrocity committed by the said Manchester yeomanry upon the people so assembled at the meeting in St. Peter's Field, or to state the names of the said yeomanry, immediately before they entered the field, evincing a determination to perpetrate the violent acts of which the petitioner complains: that the said Mr. Ferrand prohibited the reading of the acts of parliament passed for the regulation of the conduct of coroners, whereby all coroners were directed to receive the species of evidence rejected by him on this occasion; that, in the progress of the investigation, the solicitor employed by the petitioner inquired of the coroner whether or no he had seen the body of the petitioner's son, to which inquiry he peremptorily and repeatedly refused to give any answer; but sometime afterwards he went secretly and clandestinely, in the middle of the night, and had the grave of the deceased opened for the purpose of seeing the body; by which extraordinary proceeding the town of Oldham, and the surrounding neighbourhood, were in some degree alarmed and agitated, whereupon the coroner stated that he found it necessary to adjourn his court to Manchester to pursue the investigation; that, at length on the 13th of October, when the evidence on both sides was, as the petitioner believes, brought very nearly to a close, the coroner, without offering even a pretext for such an unparalleled proceeding, adjourned the inquest until the 1st day of December instant; that the petitioner believes, from the evidence before the said coroner, that a verdict of wilful murder must and would have been given against many individuals engaged in the cruel attack before mentioned; and the petitioner is informed, that Mr. Ferrand the coroner, stated that he had no doubt such a verdict would be pronounced if he allowed the jury to come to a decision; and the petitioner has good reason to believe that the last mentioned adjournment was made solely with a view to screen and protect the delinquents who were likely to be affected by the verdict of the jury; that it being understood the said Mr. Ferrand, intended still further to adjourn the said inquest, an application was made in the last term, by the petitioner's solicitors, for a rule to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue to be directed to the said Mr. Ferrand, directing him to proceed forthwith in the said inquisition; but the said Mr. Ferrand showed cause against such a writ being granted, and the court discharged the rule, as the petitioner understands, on the ground that Mr. Ferrand had probably rendered the proceedings of the said inquest invalid and nugatory by neglecting to view the body at the same time with the jury, that the said Mr. Ferrand, gladly availing himself of, and seizing with avidity the suggestion as to the illegality of the proceedings, wholly neglected to meet the jury on the 1st instant as he had appointed by his own adjournment, but, his clerk, Mr. Battye, stood at the door of the inn, and told the jury as they arrived that their attendance was no farther required, and that they might go about their business, and thus has terminated the proceedings on which alone the petitioner relied to bring the guilty before a superior court of judicature for trial, and ultimately justice; that it has been intimated, as the petitioner is informed, that the course of justice was not impeded by the proceedings of the before-mentioned inquest being set aside, because it was still open for the petitioner to proceed, either by obtaining a writ directing the magistrates of the county to take the inquisition, or by indictment before the grand jury, but, independent of the delay which must result by adopting either of these modes, the petitioner humbly submits to the House, whether it is not mocking his already agonized and harassed feelings, to refer him for justice to the very persons against whom he con-

plains, or to a body who are likely to be composed of their relatives and intimate friends, especially when it is considered that the prejudiced opinion of a similar body has been already evinced by their throwing out bills of indictment against several of the Manchester ycomanry for maliciously cutting down the unarmed and unoffending people on the melancholy 16th August, and by their extra judicial denunciation transmitted to government at the very last assizes held for the county of Lancaster, wherein, after assuming that the people are misguided and disaffected, they impute to the lower classes in general, "that their object is to reverse the orders of society, and by force to seize and divide the landed property of the country among themselves:" that the petitioner, considering that he had no immediate legal resources to bring to justice the authors of his son's death, has presumed to lay a simple statement of the facts before the House; and he therefore most earnestly supplicates the House to listen to the facts he has detailed, and take them into immediate consideration, so that he may have the consolation to find that his grievances are heard, and that the House will afford him that redress which he cannot obtain or expect from the legal authorities of the country."

The several petitions were ordered to be printed.

MOTION RESPECTING MR. OWEN'S PLAN.] Sir W. De Crespigny, in pursuance of the notice which he had given, rose for the purpose of moving that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the plan of Mr. Owen for ameliorating the condition of the lower classes. He trusted that the same spirit of conciliation which had marked the debate of Tuesday last would be manifested on this occasion. Labouring under severe indisposition, he brought this question forward with increased embarrassment. It had been his hope that some hon. gentleman more conversant with the subject would have introduced it to the consideration of the House, and appeared in the character of an advocate for his distressed and suffering fellow-countrymen. Under these circumstances, the House, he doubted not, would extend to him its kindness and indulgence. He could assure it, that he would endeavour to contract his observations into the narrowest compass. The question was rather one of humanity than

of political reasoning; and if he should be so fortunate as to obtain the concurrence of the other side of the House, he should hail the circumstance as the harbinger of better times. The interposition of the legislature was most imperiously demanded. General poverty must produce discontent, and general discontent led often to revolt. It was necessary that the higher classes should condescend to inquire into the miseries of the poor with a view to the effectual alleviation of their distress. He saw no other means of preventing the country from being involved in bloodshed and confusion. The plan which he had to recommend would, in his opinion, prove, if adopted, beneficial for the purposes he had stated. All that was required by its friends and supporters was, that it should be submitted to experiment. Let it not be said, he implored the House, that they were prodigal in furnishing the means of destroying mankind, but were resolute not to listen to any schemes for their preservation. There were some, he knew, who, on the study of half an hour, pronounced that to be visionary which was deemed practicable and useful by a man, who had devoted to the inquiry the labour and consideration of thirty years. He called upon such persons to produce a better plan, before they condemned that which he was about to recommend. It was a most important subject for the attention of the House, to investigate the consequences arising from that mechanism which had within the last few years so extensively superseded human labour. To him it appeared, that mechanism should always be made subservient to human labour. The events of the last 30 years had made a change in the internal policy of the country absolutely necessary—and the question was, whether it should take place, step by step, by reason, or be brought about by prejudices and ignorance, or, perhaps, through the convulsion of revolution. Under the present system, the unemployed poor fed on the labour of the industrious, communicated the bad habits acquired in idleness, to the general mass of the poor, amalgamated with them, and taught them their vices. The only remedy for this evil was, the prevention of the mischief at the root. One part of Mr. Owen's plan, to which he wished particularly to direct the attention of the House, was the system of education which it embraced; for education, it could not be denied, was the foundation of all virtue and order in society. He had seen the effects of it in New Lanark, and should never forget to his dying day the impression which it made on his mind. The children were there instructed in those principles which were calculated to make them useful and excellent members of society. That which most struck his mind, and which could scarcely be credited by those who had not witnessed it, was, that the education of infants was begun in this establishment at the early age of two years. He had seen at New Lanark upwards of 100 children, on a large plot of ground, engaged in various kinds of amusements, each contributing its share to the comfort and advantage of the whole; there was among them no mark of malevolence or quarrel; they were vying in acts of kindness to one another. He saw them afterwards at school, some engaged in their letters, and others at more advanced stages of improvement. From thence they were instructed in the reading of the Bible, and taught the duties which they owed to God, to their parents, and to themselves. When the hours of amusement and those of instruction were ended, he had seen them going to their little labours with an alacrity which was really astonishing. He trusted the House would allow him to read a few of the letters which he had received on this subject. The hon. bart. then read the following letter, which he said he had received by the post of the preceding day:—"Sir William; Having deliberately considered Mr. Owen's plan, I am of opinion, that there is not any proposition yet made for the improvement of the morals and general condition of the country, worthy of a comparison with it; and I am induced thus to intrude my sentiments on you, to propose a measure which may be likely, not only to secure its trial, but its general adoption. It may perhaps be your intention to show the benefits of such a plan, and to move for a parliamentary grant, for the purpose of trying the experiment. However favourable the general opinion may be, yet in the present feeble state of the revenue, I am fearful there may be a difficulty in obtaining the grant; and should that not be the case, yet only one establishment would, by way of trial, be produced. I, however, consider it unnecessary that the country should wait whilst another experiment be tried. In addition to the plain reason of the thing, the experiment has been tried with the greatest success at New Lanark. I should therefore at once propose a bill, which should have the effect of rendering any application for a public grant unnecessary, and giving more facility to an immediate application of the plan on a general scale, as follows:—

"A bill to enable parishes, at a general (not a select) meeting, to make a permanent rate on the property, and to take up money on the security of such rate, for the purpose of raising an establishment on Mr. Owen's plan. To enable two, three, or four small parishes to unite for that purpose, each parish to have an interest in, and to derive a benefit from the establishment, in proportion to its amount of rate or contribution. The rates so mortgaged to be applied quarterly in the discharge of the interest, and the reduction of the principal money so borrowed, until the same be discharged. To enable lords of manors, and the parishioners, to sell and convey waste and commonable lands for such purpose, with such other clauses as the wisdom of parliament may devise. I see by a little pamphlet which lately fell in my way, and which I enclose, that 96,000*l.* are sufficient to found an establishment for 1,200 persons; and I lately saw in the public prints, that Mr. Owen considered an establishment for 1,000 more advantageous than for a greater or less number, and that would require 80,000*l.*, the interest of which would be 4,000*l.* for the first year, and as much less every succeeding year, as the principal sum should be reduced. As there is plenty of unemployed capital in the kingdom, I think the money would easily be obtained, and it would be much more creditable to capitalists (and more beneficial to the country) to lend their money on such security, than to place it in the funds of other nations. In the neighbourhood of Mr. Ricardo, there is plenty of commonable land, and the poor are very numerous; the measure would therefore be peculiarly beneficial in that district, and, although no alarmist, yet I am of opinion that the safety of property in a great measure depends more on an immediate attention to the plan of Mr. Owen, than on any coercive measures. I remain with the greatest respect, &c.

"Cirencester, Dec. 14. Jos. MOUNTAIN."

The letter also contained some calculations as to the time when the sum borrowed might be repaid, and the manner of repaying it, with which he did not feel it necessary to trouble the House. The next letter he would read, was from the bishop of Chester. His lordship "approved of a plan which would give to the poor an interest in the better cultivation of the land, and stated that he had tried the experiment by letting out from 70 to 80 acres to poor peasants, at about half an acre to each. The result was, that the lands so given were well cultivated, even with that time which the peasant could bestow after his usual daily labour. One of the great advantages of this plan was, the creation of a feeling of independence among the peasantry—a feeling which could not be too much cultivated, as it rendered them averse to any application to the poor laws; and in the instance alluded to, relief from the poor-rates was not sought by any of the peasants so engaged." If the House, in the present situation of the country, turned its back upon any plan which had for its immediate object the relief of the lower classes of the people, they would excite a general spirit of disaffection and discontent. He trusted, therefore, the noble lord would not show himself averse from this inquiry; there could be no mischief in it, for if, upon examination, the plan was found to be inefficient, it might be abandoned. It might not be acceptable as a whole, but it should be recollected, that there was no flower of the forest from which the industry of the bee did not extract some honey. He might, if he did not fear to occupy too much of the time of the House, go on reading to eternity the letters which he had received from various parts of the country in favour of this plan. He, however, should only trouble the House with the reading of one more. He then read another letter in favour of the plan, which described the great advantages that might result from it, by the practice which it would encourage, of spade cultivation. A gentleman in the neighbourhood of Newcastle had proved that by this mode of cultivation, the produce of land had been raised to 7 or 8 quarters per acre. Before he submitted his motion, he begged to make one observation further. At the period when Adam Smith wrote his treatise on the Wealth of Nations, the great object was to increase the wealth of the country. This object had been since achieved by the increase of machinery, so as almost to increase the production of some articles much beyond consumption. Now,

Mr. Owen's plan, to remedy this—to render the production of the necessities of life fully adequate to the increase of population—would effect a reorganization, and a remoralizing of the lower classes, which there was no man of virtue who would not, he was persuaded, be most glad to see. He concluded by moving, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the nature of the plan proposed by Robert Owen, esq., and to report thereon: and how far the same, or any part thereof, may be rendered available for ameliorating the condition of the labouring classes of the community, or for affording beneficial employment of the poor, by an improved application of the sums raised for their relief."

Lord Archibald Hamilton seconded the motion. He was so well acquainted with the practical effect of Mr. Owen's plan, and with the great distress which existed in that part of the country near which his establishment was situated, and particularly he so well knew the anxiety which existed among the great body of those who were so distressed to have the plan inquired into, that he conceived the House ought to take the matter into consideration. At the same time that he asserted this, he did not mean to give his support to those numerous theories which had been founded upon Mr. Owen's plan. He saw, however, that a great part of it had produced an excellent effect, and he conceived that one ground why it was entitled to an examination. He did not look upon the present motion as one which went to embrace the whole of Mr. Owen's plan (which he feared, if taken up in a national or general view, would be attended with too great an expense), but to extract and separate the useful parts of it from those numerous and extensive projects with which it was combined. He would support the motion, in consequence of the good effects which he understood to have resulted from some of Mr. Owen's exertions, and from the feeling which he was aware existed among the poorer classes, that a trial of it might be made with advantage to them. One thing had resulted from the operation of this plan at New Lanark—that it had united large bodies of human beings in the strongest bonds of kindness and affection towards each other; in such a manner indeed as he believed was never seen or known before. This was a strong reason with him in support of the inquiry, and he thought that inquiry alone was sought by the motion. He would strongly recommend the reference of the subject to a committee, to which it should be understood that every thing eligible should be submitted, and that the House should not be troubled with any details of improvement, except such as should appear in the report the committee might finally agree upon.

Mr. Brougham said, that he was anxious to state the grounds upon which he was disposed to vote for the present motion, without being understood in any degree to support the general principles with which it was connected. In the first place he thought, that in the present distressed state of the country, that plan which proposed to alleviate such distress should be very wild and exceptionable, indeed, against which the House should peremptorily shut its ears. It was no doubt among the misfortunes belonging to the distress of the people, that they were too ready to attend to any visionary scheme that promised them relief; that they were disposed, as it might be said, to catch at straws, in the hope of saving themselves from sinking. This was, however, too generally the consequence of popular calamity. But parliament should be guarded, not to give the sanction of its high authority to any visionary project, because that sanction might do considerable mischief, especially in this way, that if such an impracticable plan were recommended by the House, that recommendation would weaken its power of carrying into effect any plan of less extent, but more practicability, as the people would naturally be disposed to say — “What comparison do the advantages of this plan bear to the prospects held out by the project of Mr. Owen?” This was, therefore, with him one reason why the House should look with extreme caution to any of those measures which were proposed in the present shape. At the same time he did not wish that the House should reject all inquiry on the subject before them. He was desirous not to be understood as meaning to agree to Mr. Owen’s plan. He conceived the theory on which it was founded to be wholly erroneous. It was founded upon a principle which he denied—that of the increase of population being a benefit to the country. On the contrary, he had no hesitation in stating, that the excess of population was one of the great causes of the distress which at present afflicted the country. Yet this proposition, which, from the best consideration which he had been able to give to the subject, he was fully prepared to maintain was quite discarded by the theory of Mr. Owen. But it was amongst the most melancholy malpractices of the low part of the press, to depreciate this, which was the soundest principle of political economy. Nay, the worst expedients were used to calumniate the writers by whom that principle was mainly supported, although among those writers were to be found men of the most exalted morals, of the purest views, of the soundest intellect, and even of the most humane feelings. An endeavour was made to raise an outcry against those writers, principally upon the ground, forsooth, that they proposed to interfere with the main comfort of human life, by deprecating early marriages. But was it not incumbent upon any man who had enlightened views of philanthropy, or even a sense of common justice, to dissuade people from imprudent marriages — from forming connexions which they had not the means of subsisting? Could any thing serve more to aggravate the distress or mortify the feeling of man than the collection of a family for which he was incompetent to provide? Yet against the writers who sought to guard society against this great evil, the utmost obloquy was directed. Nay, an attempt was made to excite a clamour against the men who had the wisdom to devise, and the manliness to support, that which was agreeable to the soundest principle of political economy. The present was not, however, the time in which he thought it advisable to propose the adoption, or to enter into the discussion of that to which he had devoted a great deal of his time and attention, and which he deemed the true radical remedy upon the subject of population; for if a plan to remedy this evil were now brought forward, there was reason to apprehend, from the disturbed state of the public mind, that an outcry might be raised against it which would be but too likely to interfere with the usefulness, and prove detrimental to the interest of the plan itself. The proposition of such a plan must therefore be deferred to some calm period which would be more suitable for deliberate and candid consideration. But to return to Mr. Owen’s plan—although he differed from the theory upon which that plan was founded, especially upon the subject of population, and thought it would increase the evil of which it was the ostensible remedy, he still agreed with the hon. baronet who brought forward the motion, and the noble lord by whom it was seconded, that there were certain parts of that plan peculiarly entitled to the consideration of the House. He meant especially upon the subject of education. The system proposed and acted upon by Mr. Owen in training infant children, before they were susceptible of what was generally called education, was deserving of the utmost attention. This indeed was the sound part of Mr. Owen's plan, and agreeable to the wisest principles. By all means then, he would say, let the House appoint a committee to inquire into the means by which those parts of Mr. Owen's plan, against which no objections could be made, might best be put in general practice. That which was wild or visionary might be slighted; but the useful and the practicable ought not to be discarded. But with respect to education he must say, that the assistance of government or parliament was not so essential to its advancement: as the interests of that subject might be very safely trusted to the public spirit and private benevolence of the country. This, indeed, he found to be the case from his own observation, with regard to the education of children taken from their parents, who were thus enabled to pursue their own industry. But he had had some experience upon this subject, where education alone was given to children without any food or clothing, and where children were taught moral, attentive and cleanly habits at that period of life when curiosity, the great spring and element of all education, was most active and ardent—when in consequence, that which at another period of life would have been felt as a burthen, was enjoyed as a pleasure. Thus the children were educated while the parents, or at least the mother, who would have been otherwise obliged to stay at home and take care of them, was released and left at liberty to work. This system then was useful, not only to the children but to the parents, where they were disposed to industry. But the training up of infant children was in every view a point of great importance. He had given this subject a considerable degree of attention, and the experience of several years strengthened him in the opinion which he had been led to form on it. He had seen in Switzerland an establishment, the plan of Mr. Fellenberg for infant education, carried on with excellent effects. That gentleman's plan was, however, better suited to an agricultural district, where the population were scattered, than to a manufacturing town, where the population was crowded together. For Mr. Fellenberg took the children to his school both night and day, thus separating them from their parents. Mr. Owen proceeded upon the same principle as to education, but then he did not separate the children from their parents, unless for the day, and therefore his plan was more applicable to manufacturing or populous districts than that of Mr. Fellenberg in Switzerland. The plan of Mr. Owen was, indeed, so much better, as it was calculated to improve the domestic habits of the people; the child being allowed, by remaining with its father and mother, to acquire those social and domestic habits which were of so much value in life, which bind those strong ties of affection, some of the best and most secure bonds of mutual assistance. With the example of what Mr. Owen had effected on the subject of the education of children, it would, he conceived, be impossible to refuse an inquiry into the practicability of extending it. If it were not vouched by such undeniable proofs, it could scarcely be believed that so much good had been done by the plan as was known to be produced at New Larnark. The example set there was, he conceived, much better than that produced in Switzerland. This system tended also, by a sort of reflex operation, to improve the habits of the parents themselves; for in the presence of children so trained they would be ashamed of intoxication or swearing, or any habits that might pollute the minds, or offend the feelings of those who were the objects of their attachment. This consideration, then, combined with the improved impressions of the children, was likely to produce the most salutary effect upon the morality and general conduct of parents, by checking the expression or exhibition of any impropriety, and hence he preferred the plan of Mr. Owen to that which he had witnessed in Switzerland. With a view to make an experiment of this plan, the hon. member for Bramber, the hon. member for Nottingham, had, with himself and a few other friends, made up a stock purse. He had proceeded in this experiment with the more alacrity, as he had the highest respect and esteem for Mr. Owen, whom he really believed one of the most humane, simple-minded, amiable men on earth. He was indeed a rare character; for although a projector, Mr. Owen was one of the most calm and candid men he had ever conversed with. You might discuss his theories in any terms you pleased—you might dispose of his arguments just as you thought proper; and he listened with the utmost mildness. His nature perfectly free from any gall, he had none of the feverish or irritable feeling which too generally belonged to projectors. But to revert to the committee association, of which he had the honour to be a member, he had to express their acknowledgments for the assistance which they had received from the right hon. gentleman the chancellor of the exchequer, who was always found ready to promote that which was most useful, namely, any plan of practical philanthropy. Through this association a school had been established in Westminster, according to Mr. Owen's plan; and if the experiment of that school were found practically useful, as there was every reason to expect, it was fairly to be calculated that the same experiment would be made elsewhere. The establishment in Westminster was a day-school, for which Mr. Owen had furnished the committee with an excellent superintendent, and it was going on in the most satisfactory manner, so satisfactorily indeed, that although originating in the charity of individuals, it was soon likely to be supported by the interest of those who were immediately benefitted by its existence. This was a most gratifying consideration. For although charity might begin, interest alone could continue or perpetuate institutions of this nature. If any person doubted the practical success of this plan, let him go into the school at Brewer's-green, in Westminster, and he would see both the nature of the plan and the benefits that attended it. There was indeed reason to expect that the schools established upon this system would soon and very generally enter into competition with those dame schools which had heretofore proved so very useful, and to which (while children of nine or ten years old were too often allowed to walk about almost as ignorant as beasts) infants were sent, to keep them out of harm's way, while their mothers went to work.—Of this indeed there could hardly be a doubt, as the schools to which he alluded would be conducted upon a better plan, and therefore parents would naturally rather pay quarter-pence to the one than to the other. Satisfied as he was that the success of this plan was likely to be promoted by inquiry, he was an advocate for the appointment of a committee of that House, by which that inquiry might be fully gone into, and effectually concluded. With respect to the spade husbandry which was recommended in Mr. Owen's plan, he must confess himself incapable of forming any judgment upon that part of the plan, as he was wholly unacquainted with the subject; and this was another reason with him for supporting the proposition of inquiry. But he was an advocate for inquiry, with a view to separate the wild and impracticable part of this plan from that which was sound, useful, and practicable; and he trusted that the House would not reject the latter along with the former.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, there was nothing more usual, out of the House, than to see gentlemen of opposite political opinions uniting cordially and substantially in efforts for the benefit of the poor; and he was convinced that no spectacle could be more consoling than the display of the same spirit in parliament. It showed that that House did not act on party grounds when the welfare of the people was the subject of discussion; it showed that when they could see their way clearly, they would all agree in measures for alleviating the public distress. It would have given him great pleasure to concur in the present motion, if he had not thought that the House by going into the inquiry would give the sanction of parliament to a plan not only visionary and impracticable, but in the highest degree dangerous to the country. While he opposed the plan, however, he wished to do every justice to the character of Mr. Owen, whose humane and benevolent intentions could not be too highly praised. Though he was not particularly acquainted with the nature of the establishment at Lanark, he believed all that had been said of it. Indeed, some years ago he had visited Lanark, and though the establishment had not then attained its present state of excellence, the impression on his mind at that time was, that it was productive of great benefit, and reflected the highest credit on Mr. Owen. He had then thought the general system superior to any other that he had ever seen; and from what he had heard, he believed it to have been improved since that time. But, notwithstanding all this, he could not agree to the adoption of Mr. Owen's general system; and he should state to the House the grounds of his objections. In the year 1817, two public meetings were called at the city of London Tavern at Mr. Owen's request, at which he delivered a full explanation of the plan he had in view for the amelioration of society, and which explanation had since been given to the public. If he was incorrect in what he was about to state, he would thank a worthy alderman opposite, who was at the meeting, to correct him. At one of those meetings held on the 21st of August, 1817, Mr. Owen made a speech, from which he would now read the following extracts:—

“Why should so many countless millions of our fellow-creatures through each successive generation, have been the victims of ignorance, of superstition, of mental degradation, and of wretchedness?—My friends, a more important question has not yet been put to the sons of men. Who can answer it? Who dare answer it, but with his life in his hand; a ready and a willing victim to truth, and to the emancipation of the world, from its long bondage of disunion, error, crime, and misery? Behold that victim! On this day, in this hour, even now, shall those bonds be burst asunder, never more to unite while the world shall last. What the consequences of this daring deed shall be to myself, I am as indifferent about as whether it shall rain or be fair to-morrow. Whatever may be the consequences, I will now perform my duty to you, and to the world; and should it be the last act of my life, I shall be well content, and know that I have lived for an important purpose. Then, my friends, I tell you, that hitherto you have been prevented from even knowing what happiness really is, solely in consequence of the errors, gross errors that have been combined with the fundamental notions of every religion that has hitherto been taught to men. And, in consequence, they have made man the most inconsistent, and the most miserable being in existence. By the errors of these systems, he has been a weak and imbecile animal, or a furious bigot and fanatic; and should these qualities be carried, not only into the projected villages, but into Paradise itself, a Paradise would no longer be found.—In all the religions which have been hitherto forced on the minds of men; deep, dangerous, and lamentable principles of disunion, division, and separation, have been fast entwined with all their fundamental notions; and the certain consequences have been, all the dire effects which religious animosities have, through all the past periods of the world, inflicted with such unrelenting stern severity, or mad and furious zeal!—If, therefore, my friends, you should carry with you into these proposed villages of intended unity and unlimited mutual co-operation, one single particle of religious intolerance, or sectarian feelings of division and separation—maniacs only would go there to look for harmony and happiness; or elsewhere, as long as such insane errors shall be found to exist!—I am not going to ask impossibilities from you—I know what you can do, and I know also what you cannot do. Consider again on what grounds each man in existence has a full right to the enjoyment of the most unlimited liberty of conscience; I am not of your religion, nor of any religion yet taught in the world!—to me they all appear united with much—yes, with very much—error!—Am I to blame for thinking thus? those who possess any real knowledge of human nature know that I cannot think otherwise—that it is not in my power, of myself, to change the thoughts and ideas which appear to me true. Ignorance, bigotry, and superstition may again, as they have so often done before, attempt to force belief against conviction—and thus carry the correct-minded, conscientious victim to the stake; or make a human being wretchedly insincere.—Therefore, unless the world is now prepared to dismiss all its erroneous religious notions, and to feel the justice and necessity, of publicly acknowledging the most unlimited religious freedom, it will be futile to erect villages of union and mutual co-operation; for it will be vain to look on this earth for inhabitants to occupy them, who can understand how to live in the bond of peace and unity; or who can love their neighbour as themselves; whether he be Jew or Gentile, Mahomedan or Pagan, Infidel or Christian; any religion that creates one particle of feeling short of this, is false, and must prove a curse to the whole human race!—And now my friends—for such I will consider you to the last moment of my existence, although each of you were now armed for my immediate destruction—such, my friends, and no other, is the change that must take place in your hearts and minds, and all your conduct, before you can enter these abodes of peace and harmony, you must be attired in proper garments before you can partake of all the comforts and blessings with which they will abound.—Such are my thoughts and conclusions, and I know you will hereafter ponder them well in your minds, and truth will prevail! When you shall be thus prepared, if life be spared to me, I will be ready to accompany you, and to assist with all my power in every particular step that may be necessary to secure your immediate happiness and future well-being.—Now, my friends, I am content that you call me an infidel; that you esteem me the most worthless and wicked of all the human beings who have yet been born! Still, however, even this will not make what I say one jot less true, or more false. No name can make falsehood truth; how can any name whatever make truth more true? Of what use, then, can names be, except to give a false validity to gross error? The interest of those who govern has ever appeared to be, and under the present systems ever will appear to be, opposed, to the interest of those whom they govern. Law and taxation, as these are now necessarily administered, are evils of the greatest magnitude; they are a curse to every part of society; but while man remains individualised, they must continue, and both must unavoidably still increase in magnitude of evil.”

In reading these extracts from the speech of Mr. Owen, he did not wish to call down the spirit of persecution against him. He admired Mr. Owen's treatment of the persons under his care; and as to his religious opinions, he only regretted the aberrations of his mind. But it was evident, that he looked to the adoption of a plan subversive of the religion and government of the country; and however philanthropic his views might be, that House could not adopt the plan proposed by the hon. baronet, without countenancing those dangerous theories. But it appeared that Mr. Owen's plan was discountenanced by the unbiassed judgment of the public; for at the first meeting which he addressed at the City of London Tavern, his propositions were rejected. After Mr. Owen had spoken, several other gentlemen took part in the discussion. A worthy alderman proposed an amendment to one of the resolutions, and the purport of that amendment was, that no effectual relief could be given to the people without a fair representation in parliament. This amendment was adopted, so that it appeared, whenever a plan was proposed for ameliorating society, the grand panacea, parliamentary reform, was sure to be brought forward. He should regret, if the rejection of this motion led to the rejection of what was good in the plan; but he thought the hon. and learned gentleman who had preceded him in the debate, had cleared the way so well, as to show that this would not be a necessary consequence. It was, no doubt, true, that at a second public meeting a committee was appointed, for the purpose of considering Mr. Owen's plan, and a subscription had been opened for its advancement, to which the worthy baronet had liberally contributed. It appeared, however, that in this country of unbounded liberality—that in a city of unbounded wealth, the subscription completely failed. Only a small sum had been subscribed; and it was surely a strong prima facie case against the plan, that after it had been so long submitted to the public, it had received so little encouragement. He concluded by declaring, that as an official individual, he could not agree to a grant of the public money for the establishment of a plan that had been introduced to the public by a speech, in which all religions were pronounced false, and all systems of government bad.

Mr. John Smith eulogised the character of Mr. Owen, who had long exerted himself to alleviate the distresses of his fellow creatures. It appeared that the right hon. gentleman (the chancellor of the exchequer) was not disposed to give assistance to the plan, because it was proposed by a person who differed from himself on the subjects of religion and politics. In that respect he dissented from the views of the right hon. gentleman. No man could more lament than he did, the course which Mr. Owen had pursued; and indeed, he had told him, that if he introduced those obnoxious sentiments, he would prevent people from supporting his plan. Still he could not agree with those who thought this a sufficient ground for rejecting it. It was indeed a part of Mr. Owen's system to teach men to make allowance for such differences of opinion. He had never in the course of his life known a person so thoroughly exempt from prejudice or self-interest as Mr. Owen. The right hon. gentleman would allow him to remind him of an extraordinary circumstance attending the establishment at Lanark, and which particularly demanded his notice. Such was the nature of that establishment, managed as it was by a man of Mr. Owen's unfortunate religious belief, that during the last 14 years there was not one solitary instance of a man connected with it being convicted of a crime. Could the same be said of any other establishment in this country? Surely that system which produced such effects was at least worthy of consideration. He should perhaps have been silent on this occasion, had it not been for what had fallen from the learned gentleman (Mr. Brougham) in his excellent speech. On the subject of education he would speak out, and he denied that Mr. Owen's views on this point were visionary, for he knew them to be correct from the practical results which he had himself witnessed. Mr. Owen's plan embraced the education of children from the age of three years and upwards. He had seen the plan reduced to practice at Lanark, and Mr. Owen had there, by his system of instruction, taught those little creatures to do away all the contentious passions so common at that age. No man could see one of those little boys of nine years of age, without wishing that his own children had been similarly educated; that, he would freely confess, had been his own feeling. As to many parts of the plan of Mr. Owen, he did not pretend to understand them, and he could not give an opinion on what he did not understand. If a committee were granted to inquire into the subject, although he did not think they should go into the whole question of the poor-laws, still they might consider the present state of distress in which the population of the country was involved. He would take the liberty of asking the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, whether they were prepared to come forward with any plan for the relief of the poor? If they were not, with what face could they refuse this committee? He did therefore hope, that if the right hon. gentleman persisted in his opposition to the appointment of this committee, he would, for the satisfaction of those who were anxious on this subject, state what he intended to do.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained. He did not object to Mr. Owen's plan, because Mr. Owen himself rejected the authority of all religions and all governments, but because Mr. Owen had stated the plan to be founded on those principles. As to the relief of the poor, it was only necessary for him to say at present, that there was a motion on that subject already before the House, and when it came to be discussed, he should take that opportunity of stating his opinions.

Mr. Ricardo observed, that he was completely at war with the system of Mr. Owen, which was built upon a theory inconsistent with the principles of political economy, and in his opinion was calculated to produce infinite mischief to the community. Something had fallen from an hon. member on a former night, on the subject of the employment of machinery. It could not be denied, on the whole view of the subject, that machinery did not lessen the demand for labour; while, on the other hand, it did not consume the produce of the soil, nor employ any of our manufactures. It might also be misapplied by occasioning the production of too much cotton, or too much cloth; but the moment those articles ceased in consequence to pay the manufacturer, he would devote his time and capital to some other purpose. Mr. Owen's plan proceeded upon this—he who was such an enemy to machinery, only proposed machinery of a different kind: he would bring into operation a most active portion of machinery, namely, human arms. He would dispense with ploughs and horses in the increase of the productions of the country, although the expense as to them must be much less when compared with the support of men. He confessed he did not agree in the general principles of the plan under consideration, but he was disposed to accede to the proposition of a committee. Spade husbandry Mr. Owen recommended as more beneficial to production. He was not informed enough on the interests of agriculture to give an opinion, but that was a reason for sending the subject to a committee. For what did the country want at the present moment? A demand for labour. If the facts stated of spade husbandry were true, it was a beneficial course, as affording that demand. And though government or the legislature would not be wisely employed in engaging in any commercial experiment, it would be advantageous that it should, under present circumstances, circulate useful information and correct prejudices. They should separate such considerations from a division of the country into parallelograms, or the establishment of a community of goods, and similar visionary schemes. Before he sat down, he trusted the House would excuse his offering a few observations on what he considered the cause of the distresses of the country. He fully concurred in what had fallen from his hon. and learned friend on the subject of population. The proportion of the capital to population regulated the amount of wages, and, to augment them, it was important to increase the capital of the country. But when he heard honourable members talk of employing capital in the formation of roads and canals, they appeared to overlook the fact, that the capital thus employed must be withdrawn from some other quarter. The causes of the insufficiency of capital, and the consequent disproportion between wages and population, were to be attributed to many circumstances, for some of which government were not to blame. Supposing a country with a numerous population, large capital, and a limited soil, the profits of that capital will be smaller there, than in a country populous, with lesser portion of capital, and with a great extent of soil. This country was one of large capital, but of increasing population and of an extent of soil necessarily limited; of course profits would be lower in it than in countries which had not the same limitation: still, though the profits were smaller, the capital continued in this kingdom, not only because persons felt a solicitude to keep their property under their own eye, but because the same confidence was not reposed in the security of others: the moment, however, other kingdoms, by their laws and institutions, inspired greater confidence, the capitalist would be induced to remove his property from Great Britain to a situation where his profits would be more considerable: this arose from no fault in the government; but the effect of it was to produce a deficiency of employment and consequent distress. Then came the question, had we taken the proper steps to prevent the profits upon capital from being lower here than in other countries? On the contrary had we not done every thing to augment and aggravate the evil? Had we not added to the natural artificial causes for the abduction of capital? We had passed corn laws, that made the price of that necessary of life, grain, higher than in other and neighbouring countries, and thus interfered with the article which was considered the chief regulator of wages. Where grain was dear, wages must be high, and the effect of high wages was necessarily to make the profits on capital low. A second cause arose out of the fetters upon trade, the prohibitions against the import of foreign commodities, when, in fact, better and cheaper than our own. This was done in a spirit of retaliation; but he contended, that whatever line of policy other nations pursued, the interest of this nation was different: wherever we could obtain the articles we wanted at the cheapest rate, there we ought to go for them; and wherever they were cheapest, the manufacture would be the most extensive, and the amount of it, and invitation to capital, the greatest. Another cause of the existing disposition to send capital out of the country was to be found in the national debt. Instead of paying our expences from year to year, Great Britain had constantly pursued a system of borrowing, and taxes were accumulated not only to pay the simple interest, but sometimes even the compound interest of the debt; and the amount was now so enormous, that it became a matter of calculation, whether it was worth a capitalist's while to continue in a country where he not only obtained small profits, but where he was subjected to a great additional burthen. Every pecuniary motive impelled him rather to quit than to remain. For a great many of the various causes of the evil, some of the principal of which he had touched upon, there might not exist any immediate remedy. We had, however, a beneficial precedent in the proceedings of the last session. He alluded to the measures taken for a return to payments in specie; and he saw no inconvenience in keeping stedfastly to that system. Parliament had wisely extended the operations of that system over a number of years. They should follow the same course as to the corn laws. After the quantity of capital employed under the faith of legislative enactments in agriculture, it would be a great injustice to proceed to an immediate repeal of those laws. But that House should look to the ultimate good, and give notice, that after a certain number of years, such an injurious system of legislation must terminate. The same observation applied to our prohibitory commercial code. From the variety of interests now in operation under that system, it would not only be necessary to look, but to look stedfastly, to a distant but certain period for its repeal. With respect to the national debt, he felt that he entertained opinions on that point which by many would be considered extravagant. He was one of those who thought that it could be paid off, and that the country was at this moment perfectly competent to pay it off. He did not mean that it should be redeemed at par; the public creditor possessed no such claim—were he paid at the market price, the public faith would be fulfilled. If every man would pay his part of the debt, it could be effected by the sacrifice of so much capital—With respect to the objection, that the effect of that sacrifice would be to bring so much land into the market, that purchasers could not be found for such a glut, the answer was, that the stockholder would be eager to employ his money, as he received it, either in the purchase of land, or in loans to the farmer or landowner, by which the latter might be enabled to become the purchaser, particularly when the government was no longer in the market as a borrower. He was persuaded that the difficulty of paying off the national debt was not so great as was generally imagined; and he was also convinced that the country had not yet nearly reached the limits of its prosperity and greatness. It was only by a comparative reference to the state of other countries that the opposite opinion could be entertained, and such opinion would gain ground as long as so many unnatural temptations, by our policy at home, were held out to withdraw capital from the country. He repeated his conviction that Mr. Owen's plan was in many parts visionary, but yet he would not oppose the appointment of a committee, if it were only for the purpose of seeing whether it was probable that the advantages which that gentleman expected from the use of spade husbandry could be realized.

Mr. N. Calvert opposed the motion. He saw no benefit that could arise from the appointment of a committee. Spade husbandry, whatever good effects it might otherwise be attended with in some places, would not afford permanent relief! because it would not afford permanent employment.

Mr. Alderman Waithman disapproved of the plan as a general one. It was however much more objectionable when first brought forward than at present. With all the prejudices that were entertained against it, he saw no reason why it should not be sent to a committee, if it were only for the purpose of satisfying the public, and showing the impracticability of it. Mr.

Owen having succeeded in one instance upon a small scale, was convinced that he would be successful upon a larger one. This he (Mr. Waithman) was convinced was a visionary expectation. He would not follow his hon. friend who had spoken last but one through the various topics upon which he touched with so much ability. His hon. friend had gone over a large extent of matter worthy of most serious inquiry. The distress of the country might be traced to various causes; but the great one was the excessive and exorbitant taxation. The consequence was, that the profits of every species of produce were greatly reduced, and vast numbers, whose income was not sufficient to support them in this country, went to reside on the continent; so that what they received from the taxes here, as the interest of their capital, was sent abroad.

Lord Althorp was sorry to differ in some respects from his hon. friend the hon. member for Portarlington. He agreed with him however, in the leading principles he laid down with respect to the causes of the present distress, and the mode of applying a remedy. He was not of the same opinion with his hon. friend on the subject of the corn laws. In principle they were wrong; and he opposed them when the subject was before the House. Still, he felt that in a period of war they would be of advantage in procuring an independent supply of that most necessary article. It was also a great object to secure the employment of capital in agriculture. It might indeed be said that it was bad economy to grow corn at home when it could be had cheaper from other countries. The answer to this was, that they could not secure a supply at home in time of war unless by imposing some tax on corn of foreign growth. He agreed with what was said respecting their commercial system, and was surprised that no means had been adopted for opening a more extensive market with foreign countries, particularly France. He did not allude to a commercial treaty; that, in his mind, was not desirable; but by admitting the wines and silks of France, the produce of this country would be taken in return, and produce mutual advantage. He did not think it would be prudent to agree to the present motion. All were agreed that the plan proposed was absurd; where, then, was the necessity for appointing a committee to prove its absurdity? If they were to engage in inquiry upon such grounds there would be no end to committees. With respect to spade husbandry, if advantageous it would soon be adopted. The public were sufficiently awake to their own interest, and it was better to let individuals pursue it in their own way. An experiment, if necessary, might be made by the board of agriculture, whose funds were adequate to the purpose.

Mr. Calcraft said, that the wording of the motion, supposing it were otherwise unobjectionable, would induce him to vote against it, as it in fact recognized Mr. Owen's plan. It was impossible that he could give his support to any plan, which in its results could only, he thought, tend to delusion and disappointment. He did not intend to delay the House by entering at all into questions of employment of capital, or amount of revenue, to which indeed, he felt quite incompetent. Unquestionably a great deal was expected of them by the country; of that hon. gentlemen must be aware; and while he must admit that there was much which they could not do, he was not the less disposed to assist most warmly in the developement of any measure which might have a tendency effectually to relieve the suffering poor.—But he really thought that, if the hon. baronet had the interest of Mr. Owen warmly at heart, he would not make an unfavourable impression on the public mind with respect to it, by pressing his motion to the division, which must, if he persisted, shortly take place.

Sir Charles Burrell opposed the motion. He was desirous to offer a few observations on the state of husbandry, in reply to some remarks which had been made upon the subject. In many cases, spade husbandry had been already tried, particularly in the hop counties, and most especially in Kent. This, therefore, was no new system. With regard to the printed papers which had been widely circulated—drawn up with the intention of displaying the large benefits likely to arise from, and the property to be rapidly accumulated by, the practice of spade husbandry, they were founded in mere delusion. It was quite impossible, he would venture to say, that any such quantity of corn could have been grown upon the same extent of land, as was said to have been raised by the superiority of spade husbandry. In particular instances, no doubt, much good might be effected by these means; but their general practice would be, in fact, the bringing back of agriculture, generally, to a state of nature. There were, besides, many parts of the country where lands could not be so tilled. It had been said that this sort of husbandry would increase the food of the whole people. He denied that assertion; but suppose it did, what good would be done? What sale could there be for it, while no encouragement was given to the home growth of the British farmer—while foreign corn was allowed to be imported at a price which must defeat the British grower?—As to the corn laws, he thought it would be well to revise them in such a manner as to make corn yield a revenue to the British grower; and by doing so, he had no doubt, the state of the country would be materially improved.

Mr. Wilberforce could not give his consent to this plan. His right hon. friend opposite, had already stated, as part of his objection to Mr. Owen's plan, the nature of his religious principles. This observation did not appear to be correctly understood by his hon. friend on the bench behind him. It applied, as he apprehended, not to the principles of any particular sect of any religion, but to those avowed by Mr. Owen himself; and if Mr. Owen, as he understood, objected to all the systems of religion at present established—if his whole plan proceeded upon a system of morals founded upon no religion whatever, but rather upon considerations of moral rectitude of conduct only, he was of opinion that it behoved the House to be cautious how it gave its sanction to an institution, which did not acknowledge as one of its essential features, that doctrine, on whose truth and piety it was not for him now to enlarge. In the year 1817, he had read a paper connected with this subject, which he presumed all who heard him had also seen. Till that paper came under his observation, he had really felt disposed to vote for the plan. That paper had, however, altered his opinion. It seemed an object of Mr. Owen, to establish a number of little communities, with each a certain allotment of ground throughout the country. This, it was contended, would increase the quantity of sustenance. The conclusion implied that man would labour more diligently for the advantages to be distributed throughout a little community, than for his own individual profit. It was a position at variance with daily practice and constant experience. Societies which were to enjoy a sort of community of goods. He (Mr. Wilberforce) had not had the benefit of attending personally at the Lanark institution, but he had seen those who had; and he thought he understood the nature of it, from the very admirable speech in which it had that night been described. He was ready to admit that all those who visited it expressed themselves favourably of the system that prevailed there. It, had been brought to its present state however, not by any particular rules of Mr. Owen's (though the exclusion of public houses and other circumstances must have greatly assisted) but by the good old system of christianity. He trusted, however, while he could not support the present motion, that the House would not break up without at least expressing its inclination to devise some measure which might alleviate, if it failed to remove, the grievances of the lower classes. With respect to what had been said by the hon. gentleman about the misapplication of the public revenue, it was with the profoundest respect that he differed from a gentleman who had so greatly distinguished himself upon questions of political economy which had exercised the pens of some of the ablest writers this kingdom ever could boast of, and who, in that science, if he had not advanced any great new principles, had yet applied existing ones in such a manner as to claim for him the warmest esteem and admiration from his contemporaries. But, for himself, he must deny that we were in "an unnatural state." The idea of the application of capital to the prosecution of public works had been very generally entertained; but as to the capital, which some persons seemed to imagine as identified with land, it was well known that from various circumstances the value of land was too fluctuating and uncertain, to be considered as a species of fixed capital. Without instancing any particular cases, he would say generally, that when he saw great wealth on the one hand, and great distress on the other, he could not but be solicitous that some mode should, if possible, be devised of bringing them together; so as to render them mutually productive and beneficial. He believed, with an honourable gentleman who had spoken in the course of the debate, that this country had not yet seen her best days. He did trust, and think, that she would go on increasing in strength, in greatness, and in happiness. We were, in fact, journeying in that road which was sure to conduct us to wealth, prosperity, and power; we were diffusing education. The reason why former states had been in all ages assimilated to the human frame, in its advance from infancy to youth, from youth to manhood, from manhood to decay, was this—the parallel proceeded upon this fact, that the religion of those states was founded on false principles. They went on from stage to stage of intellectual improvement, emerging from ignorance to knowledge, till the light of day beamed upon the fabric, and betrayed the rotten imposture upon which it was built. The pillar of our greatness, however, was raised upon that basis of all intellectual and religious improvement—the christian religion. The pledge of our superiority was in the support of those doctrines, which, the more they were examined, were found to be the more excellent in their truths, the more beneficial in their effects. He was confident that the country would proceed in her mighty march of improving excellence, as she had hitherto proceeded; and that she would remain, to the end of time, the sanctuary of morals, the refuge of liberty, and the region of peace and happiness.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, he would not detain the House more than a few minutes. The objections urged against Mr. Owen's plan were general, and yet almost every person so objecting, made some admission in its favour. It certainly ought not to be thrown out, as seemed to be the prevailing disposition, merely because it was Mr. Owen's plan. The great difficulties under which the country laboured, as had been repeatedly acknowledged, was the want of employment for labour and capital. This subject had been frequently before parliament, and, in some instances, it was deemed proper for government to interfere and lend its assistance to remedy the difficulty. Now, what said the excellent report of the commissioners who had been four years in Ireland, to examine into the state of agriculture, and to ascertain the quantity of waste lands? According to them, there were 2,500,000 acres lying waste in Ireland. And what did they assign as the cause of its so lying waste?—Why, the want of capital. There were, besides, the waste lands in England. He knew of one waste spot, which, if properly cultivated, would yield sustenance for 20,000 families, valuing them as 80,000 persons, and return 200,000*l.* to government besides. Although he objected to many parts of Mr. Owen's plan, he thought that the part which related to the cultivation of the waste land was highly deserving of attention, especially when it was considered how large was the annual importation by this country of foreign corn. The plan ought certainly to be referred to a committee. It had been successfully adopted in commerce; what should prevent its efficacy in agriculture? Those who objected to it, from the dread of too greatly increasing the quantity of grain, did not consider that the country paid thirteen millions annually for grain beyond what the country could produce. Many more millions were also paid out of the country for flax and other commodities, and which he insisted might be and ought to be produced from the waste land and surplus labour of the country. This was the first motion that had been made for the appointment of a committee to consider of the best means of employing the poor, and it ought not to be rejected by the House merely because they did not altogether approve of the plan recommended. All who had seen the establishment at new Lanark, admitted that the course pursued by Mr. Owen had succeeded there; and why might not its benefits be extended? He was by no means partial to the whole of that gentleman's plan, but he conceived that a portion of it might be adopted with great advantage to the country. If his Majesty's ministers would come forward and say that they were prepared with any measure which might equally benefit the poor, by employing them in redeeming the waste lands of this country, he had no doubt the hon. baronet would cheerfully withdraw his motion: but he trusted he would not do so in any other case.

Sir C. Burrell in explanation observed, that no surplus grain was grown, simply for want of encouragement.

Mr. Maxwell expressed his hope that the House would not refuse to grant the committee moved for by the hon. baronet.

Mr. D. W. Harvey contended, that the hon. member for Bramber had wholly misrepresented Mr. Owen's intentions, and his theological views. He had read the paper drawn up by a committee who had been appointed at Leeds to inquire into the nature of the establishment at New Lanark, and who had declared, that they never saw a purer system of morality than was there practised. While Mr. Owen did not disguise his own views of polemical subjects, he was not so extravagant as to think of introducing those views into his infant institution. To state, therefore, that it was an infidel institution, and almost an atheistical college, and that its tendency was to undermine Christianity, when the little community were as celebrated for their religious and moral deportment as for their intelligent useful, and industrious habits, was a gross misrepresentation. For himself, he was never aware that Christianity was aided by secular support, but on the contrary, he always imagined that it was wholly independent of it. The House were not called upon to discuss Mr. Owen's polemical or theological views. They had before them the fact, that a community of above 2,500 persons were, by that gentleman's system, brought into a state of great morality, of happiness, at a moment when the whole of the rest of the country was, comparatively speaking, in the greatest distress. Were they to be blind to that fact, because one honourable member thought that Mr. Owen wished to undermine Christianity, and another conceived that there was some miscalculation as to the advantage of spade cultivation? Unless his majesty's ministers would say that they had some other plan to propose, he thought the House bound to acquiesce in the honorable baronet's motion, were it only to show the people that they sympathized with them under the diversity of misery which they were suffering.

Sir W. De Crespigny replied. An argument had been urged against the motion, which was scarcely to be justified.—He owned that he felt extremely sore at that argument; recollecting, as he did, that in his life he had never witnessed a purer religion than that established at Lanark. It was true that more of the inmates belonged to the Methodistical church than to the Established; it was, however, a fine sight (and had the hon. member for Bramber been present he would have thought the same) to see them on each Sunday proceeding to their different places of worship. A right honourable gentleman, who had attacked Mr. Owen's plan, had coupled with it parliamentary reform. Now, he understood that to parliamentary reform Mr. Owen was decidedly hostile. Something had also been said about a community of property. There was no such thing at Lanark. Every man had his little cottage, purchased what he required, received his profits, and either deposited them in his own name] in the savings banks, or did with them what he thought fit. Undoubtedly, such a general combination as that recommended by Mr. Owen would, in his (sir W. De Crespigny's) opinion, be highly beneficial; but that was not his present object. It was evident that something must be done for the relief of the poorer classes of the community. This was the first time that a proposition for considering a particular plan for that purpose had been submitted to parliament. He now asked his majesty's ministers, whether they had themselves any plan to propose on this important subject, as if so he would consent immediately to withdraw his motion?

After a pause, sir W. De Crespigny repeated his question. No answer being given, the House divided: Ayes 16. Noes 141. Majority against the motion 125.

STATE OF THE SCOTCH MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS—[RENFREW MEMORIAL.] Mr. Maxwell rose, pursuant to notice, to bring forward his motion relating to the Manufacturing Districts in Scotland. He said, that at the time of his return from the continent he found the county of Renfrew labouring under a most severe pressure; but the pressure was most heavy upon those who were engaged in the manufacturing interest. They were wholly unable to support themselves by their exertions. Those who were appointed to relieve them had recourse to plans of artificial labour, such as the making of roads, &c. A large sum was subscribed for the purpose of that relief, under the idea that their distresses would prove to be only of a temporary nature; but after expending that, unfortunately another was found necessary to be demanded. In consequence of the situation in which Renfrewshire was placed, it was determined that a petition should be agreed to, stating the nature of the local distress, and pointing out to ministers that spirit of insubordination which began to manifest itself, and which would ever be found to prevail where such distress existed. This course was adopted principally for the purpose of giving to the House an opportunity of declaring what reason, if any, existed, for not bestowing on the northern parts of the kingdom that species of relief which had been granted to other districts of this country. It was felt that, if parliament took up the question, and showed an earnest desire to alleviate the wants of those individuals, the very fact that they had considered their case, would induce those who were visited by an accumulation of evils, to bear up against them with more fortitude than they would perhaps otherwise do. It was evident, that persons of moderate property, in those neighbourhoods where distress was strongly felt, could not, for any considerable time, continue to grant relief; for, if they did, the whole rental of their property would be consumed. In many instances, indeed, the relief afforded to the distressed operators swallowed up nearly the whole rental of the estates of well-disposed persons. When, in addition to this, he stated, that a great many individuals, who had made their fortunes by a connexion with trades and manufactures, had not felt it their duty to come forward and subscribe in this season of distress, and that a vast number of landholders in the distressed districts did not conceive that they were obliged to step forward with relief. When he declared this to be the fact, he felt that he was warranted in calling on that House to pay some attention to those who were now suffering, and to extend their fostering care to those districts in which the pressure of want was most prevalent. Such a proceeding would tend, in a great degree, to prevent the inroad of tumult and disaffection; and it would also operate in hindering the great defalcation of the revenue, which, under existing circumstances, was too much to be apprehended. If the House did not make any great sacrifice—if it showed that it was anxious, willing, and ready to take such measures as appeared best calculated to ameliorate the situation of those parts of the country, which, from various causes, suffered under almost unparalleled distress—if it granted even a trifling aid, much benefit would be derived from the manifestation of that feeling. For a long period an immense revenue had been circulating through the country—sums arising from loans, and from various other transactions, had been afloat. These encouraged industry, by the employment of many individuals in the different manufactures connected with war. This employment was the cause of a superabundant population; and, when war ceased, the population which had been thus created were left unprovided for. Other causes, the existing system of apprenticeship, for instance, tended also to increase the number of manufacturers. He felt it necessary, in calling the attention of the House to this subject, to advert to these points, in order to show that the House would be warranted in making some grant, since the necessity for it arose out of particular circumstances, which were not likely to occur again. The great point of complaint was, that gentlemen of landed property were called on to support those operative manufacturers; and very many of those who were obliged to contribute to their subsistence, had never derived any benefit from their labours. It would, therefore, be well for the House to consider what relief could, in such a case—a case of great hardship—be fairly and prudently granted. Even if his motion were not acceded to, the fair and liberal discussion to which he hoped it would give rise, would have a powerful effect in removing the discontent which prevailed. He conceived that it would be extremely proper to grant pecuniary assistance to those individuals who were desirous to emigrate from Scotland. There being no poor-rates in that country, many individuals were unable to procure the ten pounds which were necessary to enable them to leave the country. There were, in his opinion, certain points of taxation which demanded revision. Those who were scarcely able to procure a scanty subsistence, ought to be relieved from taxation altogether. He could never consider that a wise, just, or salutary taxation, which bore heavily on the lower orders, and augmented the pressure of that distress which originated in causes that could not, perhaps, be entirely removed. It should certainly be an object of great moment with the House, to consider how the immense superabundant population of the country could best be employed or relieved. He did think that some relief should be afforded to the poor in the distressed manufacturing districts of Scotland. It was extremely unfair that almost the whole burden should be placed on the shoulders of the landholder. Various modes might be pointed out by which this severe pressure could be avoided, and he hoped the House would adopt one or other of them. He thought it would be well if they seriously considered whether it would not be better to sanction some relaxation from the strict principles of political economy, in order to alleviate the evils which now confessedly existed in different parts of Scotland. The assistance hitherto derived from the land-owners was likely to be very much narrowed, if not wholly done away; because one-half of the produce of the land was frequently uncalled for; and, for the other half, the farmer was, in many instances, unable to obtain an adequate payment. If things went on in this way, it was clear that the source from which the operative manufacturer derived his subsistence, would soon be dried up. If this most important subject was not taken up warmly and zealously, those who were borne down by the pressure of distress would be led to think, that there was no sympathy for their situation. Feeling thus, the tie of their alliance would become weak; and, instead of acting on the doctrines of religion and morality, they would perhaps be incited to form themselves into bands of thieves. What must be the feelings of many fathers of families, when, owing to the extreme pressure of the times, they found it necessary to withdraw their children from school—when they were obliged to leave them in a state almost of nakedness, and saw them without food and without clothes in the midst of an inclement winter?—Would not such a state of things tempt men to question the excellence of those civil institutions under which they lived, and that form of government under which their rights were supposed to be protected? Would not individuals, thus overwhelmed by distress, throw aside the system of good morals, and the love of pure character which they had previously cherished, and adopt other principles and sentiments? There had been instances in which the misfortunes of the people had produced such effects; and he much questioned whether the measures pending at that moment would prevent a similar result, unless they were accompanied by acts which would prove that their situation was not treated with coldness and apathy. He begged the House to consider, before they came in contact with the people, whether it would not be wise and prudent to look, with an anxious eye, to the circumstances which led to the present state of affairs, and to devise some means by which the affections of the people might be secured, and the great body of the population taught to reverence the laws of the land. There were circumstances which should induce every man of feeling to contribute his share towards alleviating the misfortunes of the labouring community. Whether he was in favour of a small pittance, or a large and liberal grant, he would have this consolation—that his efforts tended to reduce the sum of human suffering; that thereby discontent would be removed, and the interests of religion, of law, and of social order, would, in a proportionate degree, be asserted and preserved. Whatever feeling of discontent existed in the country was, he believed in his conscience, to be attributed to want, and to want alone. Individuals were to be found who were anxious for what was called radical reform; others called out for some new and undefined change in the constitution of the country; and the dissemination of their tenets had produced an alarming effect on the minds of the people. But he was firmly convinced, that such of the great mass of the population as had been brought to admire and to join in those tenets, acted more from the feelings engendered by want, and from the natural hope of having that want relieved, than from any disaffection to the government, or any dislike to the constitution of the country. The middling orders of society, though attached, on account of their property, to the existing government, were, by their feelings, strongly connected with the labouring classes; and he did not believe that, at the present moment, there was an individual in the former rank who would not contribute to any fair system of taxation, if he were satisfied that it would be the means of affording permanent relief to his less fortunate fellow-creatures.—The hon. member concluded by moving for “a copy of any memorial which has been transmitted to the Lords of the Treasury, relative to the distresses of the manufacturing part of the population of the county of Renfrew.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had no objection to the proposition of the hon. gentleman. It was obvious, however, that the object of his motion was pecuniary assistance; and he would state very shortly to the House the course which his majesty's ministers deemed it necessary to pursue on an occasion of considerable difficulty and delicacy. Every person must agree in the truth of the observation, that considerable distresses existed in the manufacturing districts of Scotland and of this country; but the mode of granting them relief was a matter which required serious consideration. Those distresses arose at different times, and from very different causes. Sometimes they were the effect of war, sometimes the result of peace. Fluctuations, created by a variety of causes, must have a powerful effect on manufactures. The demand for them would, at one period, be exceedingly large, and then the population would be generally employed; while at another, that demand would shrink and decrease so much, as to render it impossible to keep the manufacturing population at work; and of course, a considerable pressure of distress must be produced. The House must be aware, how much that distress was likely to be aggravated in a country where no law existed, which could be carried into effect, when the working population were thrown out of employment. When cases of this kind occurred in England, the poor tradesmen found relief by the operation of the poor-laws. In Scotland, where such a system did not exist, the pressure was, undoubtedly, much more severe. He was afraid that if parliament were to introduce the system of poor-rates among the people of Scotland, it would be very ill received; and, on the other hand, if they departed from the existing principle, and bestowed relief on local districts, there was no place that would not expect to have its distresses alleviated in the same way. To show the view which ministers took of this subject, he would read the answer which had been sent to an application made by the duke of Hamilton for a grant to relieve the distresses of the inhabitants of Lanarkshire:—“Fife House, 14th December 1819. My lord; I have had the honour of receiving your grace's letter. I informed you some days ago of the course of proceeding which had been adopted in consequence of the application from the city of Glasgow. A petition has been presented to the House of Commons from that place, and measures are in progress for carrying into effect the prayer of that petition. As soon as the question of security can be settled to the satisfaction of parliament, government will have no difficulty in making an advance, with a view to immediate relief. Your grace does not seem to be aware that the government of this country has no fund at its disposal for the relief of the distresses of the poor; that the people of England provide for their poor by local assessments, and that it never could be expected in reason or justice that they should be called upon gratuitously to provide for the poor of the other parts of the united kingdom (where no assessment exists) in addition to their own. If the district of Lanark, or any other of the distressed districts of Scotland, will apply to parliament for leave to assess themselves in aid of their poor, government will have no difficulty in recommending, under the special circumstances of the case, that advances shall be made on the security of such assessments; or, if any plan can be proposed to parliament for giving employment to the poor, by means of local improvements, government will have the same disposition to forward the object by temporary advances, where reasonable security can be given for ultimate repayment. With respect to emigration, your grace is already acquainted with my sentiments. The object, important as it is in itself, can from its nature only admit of gradual accomplishment, and to attempt a too extensive and hasty execution of such a plan could only lead, in addition to unlimited expense, to the ruin and destruction of those whom it is wished to relieve. I request that your grace will communicate these sentiments to the gentlemen with whom you correspond, and at the same time inform them, that if they will come forward with some specific proposal, on the principle of that of Glasgow, government will have every disposition to give the most liberal and indulgent consideration to it, and to recommend it, if possible, to the adoption of parliament.—I have, &c. (Signed) Liverpool.”—From the nature of this letter, the House would perceive that the government was not inattentive to the distresses of that part of the empire; and he could further add, that every possible consideration would always be bestowed on the question by those who had the guardianship of the public interest.

Mr. Primrose said, there was a great difference between the distress of the manufacturing districts in England and in Scotland, inasmuch as in the one country it was relieved by poor-rates, which had no existence in the other. Now, some relief ought to be granted to the population of Scotland; for if they were permanently out of bread, they would be permanently seditious. At present, there was not only a want of employment amongst the manufacturers, but in the warehouses there was an excess of their commodities. This surplus of goods rendered the master-manufacturer incapable of paying the labourer as usual, and therefore the labourer was obliged to work more hours than customary in order to gain wages sufficient to supply the wants of nature. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the distress existing in the manufacturing districts of Scotland would be made the subject of inquiry, and that the House would enter into that inquiry, devoid of all political views, except as far as regarded the effects of taxation upon the manufacturing interests.

Mr. Kirkman Finlay said, that every attention was paid by lord Liverpool, and the right hon. the chancellor of the exchequer to every remonstrance and memorial presented on the part of the distressed operatives of Scotland.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that while distress so generally pervaded the whole country, he could not refrain from observing on the contracted, and unstatesman-like policy pursued by his majesty's government. Two special considerations had been omitted in their views of that great question, namely, the want of provisions for those persons whose families were in a state of starvation, and the general interests of the community. Ministers seemed inclined to throw the support of the distressed upon the more opulent, without considering that every pressure on them, would necessarily re-act upon the people. It would be no answer to those who could not procure food, that the army was increased, that coercive measures were necessary to be enforced, and that an increased expenditure was requisite to meet the general exigencies of the times. All that might be the case; but it would never satisfy the people, nor procure them the means of subsistence. Their distresses should be looked to, and the causes that produced them probed to the bottom; if any serious intention was entertained of effectually removing them. In a season of such emergency as the present, the government and the parliament should interfere; for the poor and the distressed were not only concerned, but the general peace and prosperity of the country. Society was only established, and governments created for the purpose of the general good, and the evil of starvation should not be thrown on one particular class of persons.—If the evil were distributed more equally, its pressure would be less severe; and if owing to the line of policy hitherto adopted, distress had multiplied to a most alarming height, the time was arrived at which measures should be taken for its diminution and relief. He could not forget the grants which were made to the Portuguese, the Russians, and the Germans, and even to persons nearer home—the weavers of Spitalfields. How, then, could it be said, that the present demand was new? or that the case submitted to their consideration did not loudly call for legislative interference? While aggravated misery existed, they should not sit with their arms across, and say, leave it to the natural cures for an overgrowth of population. These natural cures would be, famine and pestilence. But were these to be their remedies? Why was society at all invented, if not to provide remedies of a safer and a better nature? The present distresses were not confined to any one particular district: the causes that produced them operated but too generally; and when people were dying for want, it was high time to consider of the best means for the prevention of increasing evils. If a ship at sea was reduced to short allowance, no one would think of throwing a part of the crew overboard, in order to make ampler provision for the rest. No, the scanty provisions would be equally divided; and the same thing should be done in the present situation of this country. Temporary relief about two years ago was found of great assistance towards the mitigation of distress. Why then not try the same experiment on the present occasion? The peace of society, and the stability of the government depended on the exertions which might now be made to relieve the people from those calamities by which they were oppressed. He was a friend to all necessary measures for the repression of disaffection; but he called upon them, for God's sake, not to give the people to understand that no attention would be paid to their distresses.

Mr. Huskisson repelled the charge of inattention made on the government by the hon. member, and added that the letter which had just been read must have satisfied any man of the disposition of ministers to use their best endeavours to procure relief. Distress existed in certain districts of Scotland, perhaps from the over-growth of population; but those very districts had increased in prosperity more than one hundred fold, by the industry of that very population, whose distresses had been so much dwelt on. In looking at the distresses of the manufacturers, they were bound to look at the state of the foreign markets, particularly that of America, one of the greatest consumers of British manufacture; and if they fairly looked to that, they would find no legislative measures of the government that could remedy those evils, whose existence he regretted as much as any member in that House. Violent speeches could not reduce distress, but would rather tend to increase that discontent, that feverish excitation, which were now so visible throughout the country. The parliament could do but little by direct relief; but much could be done by restoring that confidence and security to the capitalist, which recent measures had so much shaken. If this were not effected, capital would be naturally withdrawn from its accustomed channels of circulation, the industrious classes would be left without employment, and the general decay of commerce would most ruinously ensue. To prevent this accumulation of mischief should be the desire of all; and he felt satisfied it was the sincere and heartfelt desire of his majesty's ministers.

Mr. Tierney thought it extraordinary that government, knowing all this distress to exist, had not been prepared with some measures to relieve it. He was not at all surprised that those who were connected with that part of Scotland, and who had themselves been eye-witnesses of the misery and starvation which prevailed there, should express themselves in warm language; and he trusted that the House, on taking that circumstance into consideration, would pardon any warm expressions that might have been used. There were occasions on which government was glad to employ the distressed part of the population on works of general importance. This had been done at Glasgow and elsewhere; but in the county of Renfrew, no public works could be undertaken; and thus the principle which was good in one part of Scotland, was bad in another, from being totally inapplicable. He was ready to admit that Scotland was as much bound to provide for its poor as England; but if there was any difficulty in raising a sum there to relieve them, (and he did not say that there was any such difficulty), government might be justly called upon to assist in obviating it. The right hon. gentleman had denied, with considerable vehemence, that any of our existing evils arose from the policy of ministers. Now he (Mr. T.) thought that some of them had. A principle of political economy had been violated by an issue of paper, that was not convertible into money: and this, as they all knew, had not been productive of any advantage to the state. The people of part of Scotland were now allowed to be in jeopardy of starvation. Was he, when they were in such circumstances, to understand that no relief would be granted to them, unless the gentlemen of landed property came forward in their behalf? No; that was not exactly the case: all the gentlemen on the other side said that something ought to be done, but they could not tell what. So said the poor and famished manufacturers, but with a meaning rather different. This something, which was to be done when the people required relief, appeared very like nothing; but when something was to be done to coerce the people, that something came before them in the shape of six or seven bills. Did gentlemen think that it was only by dint of law and a military force, that they could restore strength, and health, and soundness, to their convulsed country? He hoped not. It was too monstrous a proposition to be seriously entertained for a moment. They were now receiving complaints from different parts of the kingdom, not of imaginary miseries or fictitious evils; they were receiving petitions, not for absurd theories of representation, or wild changes in the constitution; but complaints of actual misery, and that, too, of the very worst nature—of starvation. It was a dreadful state of society to live under, and would become still more so, if relief was not granted. It was said that this relief ought to come from the landed proprietors; but was it not too much to ask, that the calamities arising out of the decay of the manufacturing interest, should be entirely relieved at the expense of the agricultural, which was not itself in the most flourishing condition. If ever there was a case in which the House ought to seek to extend redress to the people, either by granting a committee, or in any other way, this surely was one. He did not think this a party question; and if a committee was granted, he should not enter it with party feelings. He recommended it, because he believed it would be the best way of conciliating the disaffected, and restoring tranquillity to that part of the country which was disturbed.

Mr. Marryat said:—Mr. Speaker; I regret that language should have been used in this debate, the tendency of which is rather to aggravate than allay the discontents that prevail among the labouring classes of the community. I also regret as it is admitted on all hands that these discontents originated chiefly in distress, that his majesty's ministers have it not in contemplation to bring forward any measures by which that distress may be alleviated. I admit that the safety of the state is the first object that demanded their attention; but that being provided for by the various bills now in progress through the House, I think measures of relief, as far as relief is practicable, ought to go hand in hand with measures of coercion. It has been stated in many loyal addresses to the throne, echoed back again to us in the speech from the throne, re-echoed in our address, and repeated in various speeches in this House, that this distress is only of a temporary nature. Often as I have heard this asserted, I have never once heard it attempted to be proved; and I believe for this plain reason, that to prove it is impossible, because this distress is inherent in, and inseparable from, the situation in which this country is now placed. We are in an artificial and extraordinary state of things, different from that of any other nation on earth. We have to provide for the interest of an immense national debt, in addition to the expenses of our regular peace establishment, so that the ordinary sources of revenue, derived from taxes on internal consumption, which served to defray the expenses of other governments, will not suffice for our wants; but we depend also upon the revenue derived from manufacturing, to a great extent, for the consumption of foreign powers. This resource is of immense importance, as may be seen by the single instance of the cotton manufactory. The raw cotton annually consumed in this country costs about six millions, which in its manufactured state is sold for at least six times its original value, or thirty-six millions, leaving a profit to this country of thirty millions. At the close of the war, about one-third of the profits or income of every individual, found their way into the exchequer, as appears by the returns under the Income Tax act. That tax was paid on nearly 150 millions, for it produced 14,800,000*l.*; adding one third or 75 millions, for short returns and exemptions, the total income of the inhabitants of this country will be something more than 220 millions, and the amount of the public revenue at the same period exceeded 70 millions, or nearly one third. Since the repeal of the income tax, the proportion is reduced to about one fourth; so that the cotton manufacture now produces an annual revenue of 7½ millions. Extend this calculation to our other great staple manufactures, wool, leather, glass and earthenware, hardware, and various others, a large proportion of which is exported, together with the produce of our mines, lead, iron, copper, tin, and coals, and it will be seen how much our revenue depends upon the export trade of the country. During the war, we commanded a monopoly of the commerce of almost all the world, and increased our manufactures to such an extent, that they actually occupy a much greater part of our population than are employed in agriculture. Every thing then wore the appearance of prosperity, for the workmen obtained high wages, for which the master manufacturers indemnified themselves, by the high prices they obtained for their goods in foreign parts. But when peace returned, and we came into competition with the manufacturers of every nation on the continent, where labour was much cheaper than in Great Britain, a great and sudden revulsion took place. Our master-manufacturers found themselves undersold, and were consequently obliged to reduce the price of their goods. To relieve themselves from this loss, and enable themselves to afford their goods as cheap as their rivals in foreign markets, they reduced the wages of their workmen, and at length even this resource has become ineffectual; for although the workmen who continue to have employment, are only paid a pittance insufficient for their support, the export of our manufactures is so much diminished, that great numbers of them are without any employ whatever.—I know there are many individuals who think that British skill, capital and enterprise, will carry all before them; but I can assure those gentlemen that they under-rate the exertions of our rivals, as I can show them by referring to the trade of the Havana, which being open to all the world, is as fair a criterion as can possibly be furnished. From the returns of the vessels that arrived at that port for the six months ending in July last, it appears that out of 99 which came from Europe, only fifteen sailed from Great Britain; eighteen were from France, and twenty-one from Holland and the Hans towns. This enumeration shows that six parts out of seven of the wants of the inhabitants of the island of Cuba, can be supplied cheaper from other parts of Europe than from Great Britain; and confirms the positions I am endeavouring to maintain, that manufactures can be afforded cheapest where labour can be procured at the lowest rate, and that labour will be lowest where the taxes are the lowest, because the rate of taxation necessarily enhances the price of every commodity that men eat, drink, wear, or consume. Peace brought the same distress upon agricultural as upon the manufacturing classes, by exposing the British farmer to a competition with the foreign grower of corn, but the land-holders relieved themselves by passing the corn laws, which raised the price of bread upon the lower classes, at the very moment when their means of paying for it were diminished by the reduction of their wages. I impute no blame to the landed interest, for their distress required relief; but I contended at the time, that they helped themselves with rather too liberal a hand; and the present state of things proves that the public burthens now press too heavily on the labouring classes of the community. The longer we attempt to go on upon our present system, the more, I fear, will our financial and political difficulties increase. Six years ago, the right hon. gentleman the chancellor of the exchequer, published a pamphlet entitled "Outlines of a New Plan of Finance," in which he predicted that according to his new plan, the whole of the national debt would be liquidated in the year 1837; and told the public "that he had found out a new discovered treasure of 100 millions, such as no country ever before possessed, raised without the impoverishment of any individual, or any embarrassment of the general circulation." Does any man, in his sober senses now believe, that the whole of the national debt will be paid off by the year 1837, or that the right hon. gentleman has these 100 millions in his pocket? Sir the fallacy of the right hon. gentleman's plan consisted in his taking it for granted, that taxation might be increased to an indefinite amount; his calculations were founded on an addition of 21 millions to all the then existing taxes; and one of the first acts of John Bull, after the peace, was, to kick off seventeen millions from the load of taxes he already bore. Thus vanished at once all the right hon. gentleman's visions of liquidating the national debt, and his newly discovered treasure. This retrospect is important, as it may serve to bring the right hon. gentleman to true principles of finance; and to show him that if he means his next plan to succeed, he must found it on the basis of reducing, not augmenting, the present weight of taxation. This appears to me (to use a proscribed term), to be the only radical cure for the evils under which the country now labours; and in my opinion would be best accomplished, by a general contribution of property of every description, for the purpose of paying off a considerable portion of the national debt, and thus getting rid of those taxes which render it impossible for our labouring classes to afford their labour as cheap as their continental competitors. I know of no other means of reviving the foreign demand for our manufactures, and thus securing constant employment to the distressed part of our population. The measure, though severe is certainly practicable. I happened to be in Holland in the winter of 1802, and the inhabitants of that country had then paid ten per cent upon their capital, besides a very considerable per centage on their income. Some gentlemen have recommended a renewal of the property tax, for the purpose of taking off those taxes which press most heavily upon the poor, and this would certainly give them considerable relief, but it should be considered, that the property tax must be perpetual, the other measure temporary that the relief given by the former would be only partial, that by the latter effectual; that by imposing a property tax in time of peace we exhaust a resource which ought to be reserved for time of war, and may be obliged to submit to insults from foreign powers which we dare not resent; on the contrary, this country would stand in a prouder situation than ever, if after incurring such a vast expenditure to deliver Europe from the most gigantic despotism that ever attempted to crush the liberties of mankind, she made such an unexampled sacrifice to relieve the suffering classes of her own population, on whom the public burthens pressed with too disproportionate a weight. I shall not go into any particular details on this subject. It is the province of his majesty's ministers to propose specific plans of relief, for the distresses which have produced such alarming symptoms of discontent; and I trust they will shortly bring forward some general and well digested plan of this description, such as will meet the full approbation, as I am persuaded it will receive the most serious consideration of this House. In the mean time, I cannot concur in any local or partial measures, such as that we are called upon to adopt by the present motion.

The motion was then agreed to.

SEIZURE OF ARMS BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Calcraft stated, that he had been extremely desirous, if it had been possible, to give his support to this bill. The object of himself and the friends with whom he acted, in the opposition which they had given to the present measures was the security of the public peace; but even though such was their object, neither he nor they could support a bill which authorized the searching of a man's house by night for arms. If the noble lord on the other side would call to his recollection what had passed in another country, he would find that arms had been seized more easily by day than by night; and without any of those violations of decency and decorum which must naturally take place when a man's doors were broken open, and his whole family suddenly exposed to the gaze and inspection of official intruders. For these reasons he should vote against the measure.

Sir Joseph Yorke wished to explain the vote which he intended to give this evening, as some gentlemen might not know how to reconcile it with his vote of a former evening. He could have wished the words "by night" to have been struck out of the bill; but, as it had seemed good to a large majority to retain them, he should vote for the bill, rather than allow so necessary a measure, as it was to be lost altogether.

Mr. Dickinson said, that no man was more anxious than he was to justify the right of the people of England to have arms; but, in the present state of the public mind, he thought it expedient to place this right under some restriction.

Lord James Stuart could have wished the government to have come forward with some more conciliatory measure. He would have agreed to the bill now before the House if the clause, allowing the search by night, had undergone the amendment which an hon. friend of his had proposed. The bill in its present form contained something so hostile to the spirit of the constitution, that he could not possibly support it. He was not sufficiently acquainted with the forms of the House to know how to proceed, in order to throw it out; but he trusted, that some gentleman of greater parliamentary experience than he possessed, would take the proper course to effect that object.

Mr. Tierney said, that he should move to leave out the words "by night," if for no other reason at least for this—to give an hon. baronet on the other side (sir J. Yorke) the opportunity of voting twice in 29 years against the government [A laugh].

The Speaker then put the question, that this bill be now read a third time, which was agreed to without a division. on the motion that the bill do now pass, Mr. Tierney moved to leave out the words "by night," on which the House divided—For the motion, 46; Against it, 158: Majority, 112. The bill was then passed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, December 17.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] Lord Sidmouth rose to move that the bill for more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies be referred to the consideration of a committee. After all that had passed in the course of the session, he was unwilling to suppose that there could be any opposition to the present measure. He could indeed with confidence say, that notwithstanding all the measures which had already been adopted, their lordships would very imperfectly perform their duty, unless they added to them the present, which was calculated to avert one of the greatest dangers to which this country was exposed. Considering, however, the discussions which the measures proposed by his majesty's government had already undergone, and considering the manner in which the public attention had been called to them, he should feel himself warranted in taking up but a small portion of their lordships' time in explaining the details of this bill. The principle of the measure was founded upon the preservation of one of the most important rights of the people—a right which he hoped would ever be maintained—and to secure its exercise in a manner consistent with the free constitution of this country. He could not better describe the evil which it was the object of the bill to prevent, than by referring to the words of its preamble, which stated, that "in divers parts of this kingdom assemblies of large numbers of persons collected from various parishes and districts, under the pretext of deliberating upon public grievances, and of agreeing on petitions, complaints, remonstrances, declarations, resolutions, or addresses, upon the subject thereof, have of late been held, in disturbance of the public peace, to the great terror and danger of his majesty's loyal and peaceable subjects and in a manner manifestly, tending to produce confusion and calamities in the nation." It was matter of perfect notoriety, not only that meetings of such a description had been held, but that for the last few months scarcely a week, or even a day had passed without some of these meetings being assembled. Supposing therefore that their lordships should approve of the principle of the bill, which proceeded on the admission of the danger described in the preamble, their next consideration would be, whether the existing law were sufficient to prevent it. He had a right to take it for granted that their lordships would admit the principle. Assuming, therefore, the danger, they would have to inquire what regulations were necessary, and whether the provisions of this bill were capable of answering the end proposed. Those who had inquired into the state of the existing laws on this subject were satisfied that there were many dangerous features in the meetings referred to, for which no remedy could at present be found. The existing law did not prescribe any mode of giving notice or superintendence by magistrates. It in no way regulated the manner of attending meetings; it did not prohibit going to meetings in military array, or carrying to them weapons; it did not prevent simultaneous meetings, nor the continuance of meetings by adjournment; it did not prevent assembling with flags and banners: if seditious or treasonable language were spoken, it did not, besides empowering a magistrate to order the person offending into custody, also enable him, in the case of resistance, to declare the meeting illegal; it did not provide against a great abuse, the evil effects of which had been extensively experienced, namely, that when the inhabitants of a particular town or district, were summoned to a meeting, so many strangers attended, that the majority of the meeting did not consist of such inhabitants. Neither did it provide against the most pernicious practice of itinerant orators attending public meetings, and collecting vast multitudes to hear their harangues. Now their lordships would find, that all these great evils for which the existing law had no remedy, were provided against by this bill. It required that six days notice of the intention of holding any meeting should be given to a magistrate, and that that notice should be signed by at least seven householders. It forbade all military array bearing of arms, and the display of banners and flags. It put in the power of the magistrate, under certain limitations, to alter the day and place of the meeting. It prohibited the holding of meetings by adjournment. But what was most important was, that this bill, in reserving to the subject all his rights, the better secured them. It established by law, what had hitherto been only matter of practice. It sanctioned the free assembling of the people to petition the throne or either House of Parliament, and to discuss any public grievance of which they might have to complain, it guarded, however, against simultaneous meetings, and other abuses of that important right. In all these guards the existing law was deficient, and the deficiencies were supplied by the present bill. He therefore could not but persuade himself that while their lordships would admit the existing law to be inadequate, to meet the present danger, and to require amendment, they would think the provisions in the bill contained satisfactory remedies for the evil which was to be corrected. There were two points with regard to which objections had been urged against the present measure. Upon these he should not say much. The first regarded its locality; whether the bill should be general or limited. On this subject he should only remind their lordships of the bill brought into parliament for regulating meetings in 1796. The introduction of that bill followed the meetings at Copenhagen-house, which were supposed to have a connexion with the atrocious attack made on his majesty at the opening of that session. But if a general measure were thought necessary to meet the evil in 1796, how much more requisite must it now be to bring in such a bill as the present, when their lordships recollected the state of the country, and all that had within these few months occurred; when they knew that meetings, against which it was then thought necessary to guard, now took place, week after week, and day after day, in different parts of the country. Whether the bill ought to be permanent, or of shorter duration than that to which it was now limited, was the other point. As it at present stood, it was limited to five years. He should think that he acted disingenuously with their lordships, if he did not state that he thought the measure ought to continue beyond that period; and he must express his hope, that the time would never arrive when the legislature, let the government be in whose hands it might, would permit the country to be without the means of guarding against danger which this bill afforded. In the mean time, he was persuaded that their lordships would allow the bill to go into the committee, in which all its details would come under their consideration. In stating the great difficulties and dangers against which their lordships had to provide, he never was one of those who despaired of the country; but feeling, as he did, great anxiety for the public safety, his mind was much relieved by perceiving, that their lordships, and the other House of parliament, had proceeded to investigate the evil, and to apply remedies with an energy suited to the occasion. Their lordships, he was confident, would not temporize, but would meet the crisis with the firmness and energy which the times required; for, by so acting, the country would overcome all its difficulties. He would not detain their lordships longer than to move that the bill be now committed.

The Earl of Carnarvon, in rising to address their lordships on the motion, observed, that from the hurried manner in which the measure had arrived at this stage, little time had been allowed him to decide in what way he should proceed. He considered the bill so objectionable in all its parts, that if he consented to its going into a committee, that consent would arise from the necessity in which he was placed by the previous proceedings of their lordships. He could not, however, allow the measure to be any thing else than an evil which ought not to be acceded to, unless farther limited. It was only upon that condition that ministers ought, if the state of the country required it, to have the advantage of such enactments. He was aware he could not apply the principles of the old law of the country to every new emergency. Although he was cautious of every proposition which might appear to modify that law, he could not deny that, within the century which followed the revolution of 1688, when the principles of the constitution were settled, the situation of the country had undergone considerable change, and that not a little difference had taken place in the state of society. He felt himself, therefore, bound to admit, that some difference might be necessary in the details of the laws, in order to make them answer the great purposes for which the revolution was accomplished; but when he came to this admission, it did not follow that he should agree to severe and restrictive measures without proof of their necessity. If he admitted the principle at all, he could not but the more strongly feel the necessity of great deliberation in carrying it into practice. In the present case their lordships would do well to recollect, that they were called upon to sanction the measure without having had sufficient time afforded them for its consideration; and that this call upon them was accompanied by the expression of a hope, that the time would never come when the law should be repealed. If the danger to be provided against arose from delusion, the cause of that delusion ought to be the first object of their lordships' attention. Under these circumstances, although he did not mean to oppose the bill's going into the committee, because he was ready to allow that some measure might be necessary, it was his intention to move, that it be an instruction to the committee to restrict the duration of the bill to the 1st of July, 1822. To that period he would consent, though it was his wish, if he could carry it into effect, to render the time of its duration as short as possible; but considering the state in which the country was represented to be, he was willing that one session more should pass away before the law expired. When he looked at the bill, he could not agree with the noble secretary of state in wishing it permanent. It appeared to him, that it could only be endured as a particular remedy to meet a temporary evil. Viewing it in quite a contrary light from the noble viscount, he sincerely hoped that, when it expired, such enactments would never again become the law of the land. By this bill their lordships were told, that no county meeting could be called except by the lord-lieutenant, the sheriff, &c. or by five or more magistrates. Cities and large towns could have no meetings except in parishes, unless under the authority of the mayor. Indeed, with regard to large towns, it appeared to him very doubtful, whether, in any one consisting of more than one parish, a general meeting of the inhabitants could be assembled. In a large town like Manchester he was not sure that, under this bill, any meeting, having for its object the general interests of the place, could be called. It was not to be presumed that every meeting in that town must necessarily be a political one. It might be desirable to call one with reference to local interest and trade. The inconvenience thus created by the bill would alone be a strong objection against it. When he observed that by the clause, no meeting could be held in any county, stewartry, or place, except by the authority he had already mentioned, he could not but strongly feel the difficulty that was thrown in the way of county meetings, that ancient and constitutional mode of assembling. It was said, however, that if the lord-lieutenant and the sheriff refused to call a county meeting, five magistrates were empowered to call it. When the jurisdiction given by the bill was conferred in this manner, it was necessary for their lordships to look at the magistrates who were to possess it. He had already expressed his doubts, whether in a town which had more than one parish, any general meeting could be held; and their lordships would do well to consider, whether such partial restrictions might not tend to create the disaffection it was wished to repress. He would not discuss whether parish meetings would be advantageous for political purposes or not. They might be beneficial, or not; but that could only be seen by the result. This, at least, appeared—that the division into small portions was likely to give less weight and energy to public meetings. Their lordships, in viewing this question, should consider whether it was not possible that a time might come when it might be necessary for meetings to be called to defend their own privileges, and whether they might not then have reason to regret the having done something which deprived these assemblies of all consideration and importance. To return to county meetings—with respect to them, all their respectability was destroyed. In the first place, the lord-lieutenant was an officer of the crown, and their lordships had been recently shown, that if ministers were not satisfied with a lord-lieutenant, he was to be immediately dismissed. If he simply differed from ministers on a constitutional question, he was no longer to hold his office. So much for the situation of one of the persons authorized to call a county meeting. The next officer was the sheriff, and with regard to his appointment, considerable influence was always understood to be exercised. It was probable, therefore, that few instances would occur of county meetings called either by a lord-lieutenant or by a sheriff, for any object not agreeable to ministers. What remedy did the power given to five magistrates afford? As the magistrates were at present constituted, he was ready to admit that it was difficult to suppose that in any, except perhaps some small counties, five justices of the peace could not be found willing to put their signatures to a requisition for any purpose for which a county meeting ought fairly to be called; but when the law in which this power was given was to last for five years, and when their lordships were told that it ought to be made permanent, it would be well for them to consider, not only what the magistrates, to whom the people must at last have resource for the exercise of a constitutional right, were, but what they might become. Their lordships, doubtless, knew that the whole of the magistrates were nominated by the lord chancellor, on the recommendation, but not exclusively so, of the lord-lieutenant of the county. What a lord-lieutenant was, their lordships very well knew; what a chancellor might be, they had yet to learn. If the noble lord who now held the seals were always to make these appointments, he should fear no partiality. But it was not by the lord chancellor of the present day their lordships were to judge. They had to look not at the individual, but at the office. If this measure were to be made a part of the permanent law of the land, their lordships must look to this consideration, that at some period or other it might very probably be wished to call county meetings to arraign the conduct of the ministers of the crown, and that the lord chancellor, who had the appointment of magistrates, was one of those very ministers of the crown of whose conduct it was sought to complain. It might therefore happen that hereafter the magistracy would not be selected in the manner they had hitherto been. This view of the subject afforded strong reasons against the adoption of a measure which might have a tendency to alter the character of the magistracy. Their lordships all knew the laudable manner in which the unpaid magistracy discharged their important duties. The institution was one peculiar to this country; for in no other state of Europe could the materials for composing it be found. Consisting, as it did, of gentlemen of property and character, the country were indebted to it for the transaction of great part of its judicial business, and of much of its public business, and that too in a manner the most satisfactory, and the most beneficial to the public interests. It was, therefore, of the greatest importance to keep this most respectable body of men as much as possible out of the vortex of the influence of the crown, and to prevent their conduct from being liable to the operation of party feeling, which might injure their character in the eyes of the population of the country. As it was a most important duty of magistrates to avoid carrying their political feelings with them to the bench, he objected to the power given to a single justice of the peace to put an end to meetings. This might be done too by under-sheriffs, who were very often merely attornies, and sometimes ready to become the tools of power. He objected also to the clause making persons liable to fine and imprisonment who might from mere curiosity go to a public meeting in a place of which they were not inhabitants. But what would the House say to another clause which had been introduced into this bill—a clause which he thought demanded their serious attention? This clause provided, that if any one magistrate present at a public meeting, should hear any speech made at such meeting which should appear to him “to propound or maintain any proposition for altering any thing by law established, otherwise than by the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, in parliament assembled,” he should have the power of committing the person who delivered such speech to prison; that was to say, that a single individual, upon his own authority, and unsupported by any other magistrate, perhaps acting from ignorance, perhaps from malevolence, should have the power of taking into custody any individual, however great his talents, however high his rank, or however distinguished in virtue, whom he might suppose had said something at variance with the principles laid down by this act. He would ask, could any thing be more preposterous or less consistent with those rules of action by which society had hitherto been governed? Would not, under such a provision, many of the noble lords whom he then saw around him be liable for the expression of sentiments which had hitherto been permitted without an observation, to be ignominiously seized and thrown into a dungeon; and this too at the discretion of a single magistrate, perhaps incapable of drawing a fair inference from what he had heard? He would suppose that such a sovereign as James 2nd now occupied the throne, and that a meeting was called under his sanction for the purpose of passing resolutions to overturn the Protestant religion, which, he believed, if that sovereign had continued to preside over these realms, he would have attempted; would not the people, in such a case, be justified in resistance? In such a case, would any of their lordships say, that the people had been guilty of treason? And yet, such was the nature of the power which this act vested in the magistracy, that any hot-headed individual of that class might, upon a supposition that he had heard alterations proposed otherwise than with the consent of King, Lords, and Commons, take the supposed offender into custody. The clause, however, did not stop there; it proceeded in this strain:—“or if any person shall wilfully and advisedly make any proposition, or hold any discourse, for the purpose of inciting and stirring up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his Majesty, his heirs or successors, or the government and constitution of this realm as by law established, he shall be taken into custody, and dealt with according to law.” So that any thing which a man said, even to bringing into contempt the government of the country, was to render him equally liable to incarceration; and this too upon the judgment of one individual, who would be thus entitled to draw a conclusion as to what was, and what was not a libel, although that House, after repeated discussions upon the same subject, had been unable to come to any practical definition of it. He could only say, that if this law were to pass, it would not be safe for any individual, however elevated in station, or independent in principle, to trust himself at a public meeting. He was willing to admit, that the exercise of some coercion was necessary, and with that feeling he should not object to the bill going into the committee; but he should make a motion, that the committee should be instructed to limit its duration. He thought that he had a right, from what had been proved by the returns on the table, to assume that a great part of the mischiefs which had been described were attributable to the supineness of the government during the year 1818; and he also thought, that if the present distresses were great, they were aggravated to a greater degree than really existed, with a view to justify the measures upon the character of which he had so repeatedly spoken. If this were not the case, why were their lordships told that these measures were absolutely necessary to be adopted, and that measures of conciliation would be of no possible avail? Had this spirit been acted upon throughout? Had not his majesty's ministers yielded to arguments in favour of conciliation, the force of which they were in the first instance prepared to deny? That clause in the misdemeanor bill for limiting the period during which a prosecution could be brought against an individual to one year, was, in his opinion, a concession of infinite importance: it at once relieved the subject from the incertitude in which he must exist under the previous state of the law, which empowered the attorney-general to suspend a prosecution over his head to an indefinite period. A few years ago, when a similar concession was demanded, they were told they were asking for that which was in direct opposition to the prerogative of the Crown; and yet, within the last few days, this doctrine had been exploded, and the prerogative of the Crown on this subject, if it had ever existed, was abandoned by the ministers of the Crown themselves. With respect to another bill which had been before that House, and which contained the monstrous provision, that a person convicted of a second political libel should be transported for seven years—a provision which both himself and other noble and learned lords had laboured in vain to have excluded, and which the House had at length decided in deference to his majesty's ministers, was a provision which was absolutely necessary. After their lordships House had been dragged through the mire for the purpose of attacking a most obnoxious punishment to political libel, in what state was the bill about to be returned to them? It was about to be returned to them with that obnoxious clause expunged, and this, too, by the concession of one of those ministers by whom it had been introduced. He was happy therefore to perceive that ministers were at length, and in some respects disposed to conciliate. That disposition had been tardily evinced; but "Dum vita, spes est." He believed that, by judicious conciliation, the spirit of discontent which prevailed in the country might yet be altogether subdued; and he was happy to find that in another place, a first effort of this description had been made. He had seen that, in the other House, leave had been given to bring in a bill upon that question of parliamentary reform, to which the noble lord opposite never heard any allusion without dismay. Leave had been given to bring in a bill to destroy one of the most venal and corrupt boroughs in the kingdom, and to transfer its right of representation to one of those populous towns which had hitherto existed without that advantage; and this too, he was told, for he had only read it in the reports, was a concession which had been made by one of the ministers of the Crown. Upon the question of parliamentary reform, he hoped he might be permitted to say a few words. He thought it was intimately connected with the state of public feeling at this moment. He had long been a member of parliament, but he was not aware that he had ever given a vote on this question; if ever he did, he was sure he must have given it against any general question for a reform of parliament. He was far from thinking that any part of the difficulties that existed in this country were to be ascribed to the construction of the other House of Parliament: still less did he believe that any of those difficulties could be removed by a reform of any description. It appeared to him, that the excellencies of our constitution consisted in its anomalies, all descriptions of persons who were at all essential to public business finding their way to the House of Commons; ministers and their opponents, financial man, lawyers on each side, all found their level in the House of Commons, and any ill consequence from the ambition of individuals was thus prevented. As to war, he was satisfied that were the House of Commons more popularly elected, there would still be a greater disposition for war than that House had hitherto displayed. He had read upon this subject an article of considerable merit in a number of the Edinburgh Review, about two years ago, in which it was plainly demonstrated that the great practical excellence of the British representation arose from its diversity; and that if we adopted any one system of general representation, it would be found defective in its result, inasmuch as it would give excess of power at particular times to particular interests. The great practical benefit of a constitutional parliament, as it now stood, was, that it placed the talent of the country upon an equal footing, and the ministers of the Crown were at all times met by persons of equal ability, in whatever course they might think proper to proceed. This principle, he trusted, would ever be most studiously preserved. But while he entertained these feelings on the subject, and while he did not wish to advocate any specific principle of change, still he could not extend this principle so far as not to feel the necessity of admitting, that where they found any parts of the constitution practically bad, it was their duty to proceed to the amputation of such tainted parts. In this view, he conceived that if a system of corruption were found to exist under local circumstances, it would be wise to transfer the right of representation to some of those great commercial towns which had hitherto been excluded from that right. To that extent he was willing to concede; and he believed that this was the true spirit of conciliation which was calculated to suppress the discontents of the people. It was temperate, and it was all they could rationally ask for. It was peculiarly worthy of remark, that this important concession had been made by one of his majesty's ministers; and from that he was induced to come to the conclusion, as he had said before, that the discontents which prevailed were more the consequence of bad government than of any other definable cause. He had now only to say, that if the situation of the country really demanded the adoption of these measures, his motion would only go to limit the necessary duration of this bill. If the bill went into a committee, he should move, that its duration should be restricted to the 1st of July, 1822.

Lord King said, that every thing he had heard from the noble viscount tended to confirm his objections to the bill. He objected to it as part of a system of coercion of the very worst nature, the effect of which was to alter the constitution of the country, without even the formality of an examination. After the speech from the throne at the commencement of the session, in which parliament were told that it had been necessary to make a large addition to the military force, and in which the existing distresses and discontents had been so strongly insisted on, he had expected that ministers would come down to the House, in order to move for a committee to inquire into the state of the country, and the propriety of adopting the measures which they considered necessary for its protection. To his surprise, however, he found that the general practice of parliament was in this instance to be departed from; that no committee was to be appointed; and that ministers having committed themselves by a rash approbation of the transactions at Manchester, were resolved, upon that account, to prevent parliament from the exercise of one of its most important and necessary functions. The fact was, that it was impossible that any examination could take place without their conduct becoming a subject of reprehension. If a disease was of such a nature as to require a strong remedy, he thought it was first incumbent to examine the patient, and to see to what extent that remedy should be applied. When their lordships were called upon to pass such bills on the ground of the prevalence of discontent, they were bound to inquire into the cause of that discontent; they were bound to inquire whether it had its origin in the distress of the people, or whether it arose from their distrust in parliament itself? If it arose from distrust, the passing of such measures by acclamation, and merely on the notoriety of the case, was calculated to aggravate the evil, by furnishing new proof of the subserviency of parliament. It was possible that strong measures might be necessary, but they could not be necessary without examination, and without the accompaniment of a conciliatory spirit on the part of government. He was glad to find that some concessions had been made, but it was to be observed that they did not originate with ministers, who so far from manifesting a disposition to conciliate the people, had taken advantage of the panic into which the country was thrown, to alter the constitution. One of the greatest dangers existing at the present day was this disposition of the government to adopt measures of severity and coercion. The ministers had forgotten or confounded the distinction between a free and an arbitrary government, which was, that the one rested on conviction and affection, while the other relied upon the strong arm of force. If they acted on the bona fide intention of protecting the constitution, they would pass those measures as a temporary experiment, and limit their operation by the extent of the danger. In his opinion, even a stronger measure would be less objectionable, if confined to a limited period. To abstain from taxation was, after all, the best mode of restoring tranquillity, and therefore he should vote with his noble friend, for limiting to the shortest possible period the duration of an act by which the constitution was violated.

The Duke of Athol declared it to be his firm persuasion that the situation of the country was most dangerous—a circumstance which he thought was mainly attributable to those scandalous libels which had found their way into every part of the kingdom. It was the duty of parliament in this state of things, to exercise their wisdom, in adopting measures calculated to meet the evils which existed. Upon such measures only, did the salvation of the state depend. On the first division which had taken place in that House on the address to the Prince Regent, the overwhelming majority by which that address had been carried, in his humble opinion, justified the apprehensions which had arisen in the public mind; and the subsequent overwhelming majorities upon the measures which had followed that address, confirmed him in the wisdom by which those measures had been dictated. He was glad to perceive the facetious spirit with which a noble baron attended to his speech; but though he had great respect for the talents displayed on that bench, he might say, that the measures to which he alluded had been approved of by men as wise and as constitutional. He had never interrupted the noble baron, and therefore he hoped the noble baron would not interrupt him. He firmly believed that the measures which had been brought forward by his majesty's government had already produced a most salutary effect, and had tended greatly to diminish the mischievous spirit which was abroad. They were measures which had been called for by the country, by the parliament, and particularly by that House; and ministers, in obeying the call had done their duty, and he hoped would continue to do so until all was accomplished which the situation of the country required. Whatever differences might exist upon other points, they were all agreed in one view—that the constitution of the country ought to flourish, and to be handed down unimpaired to posterity. The noble lords who had proposed to limit the act to two years instead of five, had, by declaring that in such a case they would have no objection to the bill, admitted that the other clauses were not so objectionable as was sometimes represented. He thought, however, that two years was too short a period, and that there would be much inconvenience in being obliged to fight the battle over again at the expiration of that time, if the circumstances of the country should require its re-enactment. He believed in his conscience that the recent effusion of British blood which had unfortunately taken place, was owing to the want of such bills. The prevention of the meetings at Manchester, Glasgow, and Paisley, was owing to their adoption, and he trusted the time was gone by when the enemies of the constitution could hope to intimidate the government. That the alarm was not unfounded there was sufficient proof; and he hoped that when the flame was extinguished by the operation of these measures, some course would be taken to relieve the distress which was unhappily too general throughout the country.

The Earl of Morley regretted that that unanimity which was never so absolutely necessary as it was at the present moment, in consequence of the dangers by which the country was surrounded, did not seem likely to be procured. Facts had been falsified in a manner the most unprecedented, and the characters of magistrates acting on the purest principles, had been assailed by calumnies as gross as they were unwarranted. Many had censured the conduct of the magistrates at Manchester as intemperate: many had censured it as illegal; and not a few had condemned it as originating from the influence of fear. The illusion, however, which had blinded the minds of the people was now however, fast dispersing, and the idea of any impropriety of behaviour on the part of the magistrates would soon be abandoned by men of all parties. This was partly occasioned by that amelioration which had taken place during the progress of these bills through the House, and which was mainly attributable to them. They had been called bills of severity, bills of violence, bills of coercion. Now, he would just call the attention of the House to what they really were. The first of them was the bill against military training, which was already an offence under the existing laws: the second was a bill for the search of arms, which the state of the country rendered absolutely necessary: the third related to the law of traverse, and was of such a nature that his noble friend opposite had declared, that he thought it upon the whole an amendment of the old law: the fourth related to the prevention of tumultuous and seditious meetings; and he would ask whether this was a time for such large meetings as had been recently witnessed—meetings of fifty or sixty thousand persons, assembled together by itinerant orators, meetings which had no parallel either in ancient or in modern history, and which were calculated for any purpose rather than the purpose of calm and tranquil deliberation.—

A noble earl who had spoken before him had passed high encomiums upon our unpaid magistracy; but in the objections which he had made to the authority given by this bill to them, he had both done and said much to their disparagement. Happily for this country, its magistracy was of such a character, that no persons could be more safely entrusted with discretionary power. The noble earl had also misunderstood what had fallen from the noble viscount. The noble viscount had never said, that the bill ought to be re-enacted at the end of 5 years, whether or not circumstances should be such as to require it: but whether it was to be so re-enacted or not, it was of importance that the industrious part of the population should not be kept in a state of perpetual alarm by the machinations of those who were so frequently calling these turbulent meetings. The measure might, in some respects, be contrary to the spirit of the constitution; but there were cases, and he thought the present was one, in which all theory was bound to yield to dire necessity. The principle of vitality was, however, so strong in our constitution, that he did not entertain any doubt of the evils under which the country now laboured being soon surmounted, and of our again enjoying that tranquillity which we were entitled to enjoy, from the success of our arms, the civilization of our people, and the excellence of our laws and general institutions.

The Earl of Donoughmore declared, that though he was glad that the country was to be afflicted by this measure for a shorter period than was at first proposed, he must object to it both as a part of a whole, and upon its own demerits. If it did not absolutely take away one of the most important rights of the people, it certainly limited and narrowed it considerably: it vested in the ministers of the

Crown, or at least in those whom they appointed, the right of calling all public meetings, which was the next thing to taking away that great constitutional right altogether. The people had not been convicted before either House of parliament of any such offence as to demand so severe a punishment. But supposing the facts proved relative to the meetings at Manchester, and in the other northern counties, was that a sufficient ground for divesting every subject of the realm, from one end of it to the other, of the most valuable constitutional right which they inherited from their forefathers? He said to their lordships, "No." The noble viscount who had opened the debate had taken every thing for granted: he had said that every noble lord was convinced of the existence of the evil, and of the necessity of repressing it; and therefore that he would not trouble their lordships with any argument upon it. Now, he would tell the noble viscount, that he, for one, was not conscious of the existence of the evil. But even if he was convinced that the evil did exist in England to as great a degree as was stated, and that the present measure was calculated to repress it, he must be allowed to ask why it was to be extended to Ireland? Ireland did not deserve these severe measures. Was there any proof that the people of Ireland had sinned in any way against the constitution. But even if there was such proof, still he should say, that these were not the remedies which fitted her condition. Ministers had of late been in the habit of panegyrising his unhappy country, and as a proof how well the panegyric was deserved, they now introduced pains and penalties to follow it. Now, the inhabitants of that country must have acted either rightly or wrongly; if they had acted rightly, they did not deserve to be burthened with enactments like these; if they had acted wrongly, these were not the enactments to produce their amendment. He did not, however, object to the bill now before the House, solely because it was bad in itself, but also because it came in bad company. It was part of that system which had lately been introduced into the two Houses of Parliament, and by which both of them had been polluted. It was part of a whole system of coercion—of a systematic restriction of the liberties of the people. The country was first frightened by an exaggerated statement of disaffection; the most watchful centinels of the constitution were thrown off their guard; and in this state of things ministers came down and proposed the severest measures, without even a pretence of inquiry into the circumstances which called for them. They brought forth witnesses of their own, whom they would not allow to be cross-examined, and had prevented other witnesses from being called forward to contradict the garbled, imperfect, and anonymous statements which they had put forth to deceive the public. In short, ministers had selected such evidence as best suited their purposes; and without allowing the slightest investigation into its character, had proceeded to pass bills of pains and penalties. He felt bound to object to the introduction of a system of coercion without any appearance of legal proof of its necessity. He objected to the unsupported statements laid before their lordships, but he objected to them the more because they came from ministers. A still stronger ground of objection was, that these measures were introduced by ministers in order to protect themselves—they wished to show that they had not been asleep upon their post in the hour of danger. But he must say, that if ministers had wisely and properly exerted the power vested in them, the evil might have been prevented; it might have been stopped before it got to the pitch to which, according to their own statements, it had now arrived. If in times of difficulty ministers, from fear, or from any other motive, neglected the duty imposed upon them for the purpose of putting down disaffection, was it proper that they should be allowed to turn round and claim the assistance of parliament? Were they to allow the vessel to get into a sinking state, and then to cry out for assistance? Were they to be permitted to say: “The laws are inefficient; we can do nothing with them; we have done nothing; we now therefore shelter ourselves behind parliament, and call upon it to support us by passing bills of pains and penalties, in order to control the people.” Were they to be allowed to do this without any inquiry into, or censure of their conduct? What were their lordships to think of the attempts made to arrest Harrison at Smithfield, and of the dispersion of the Manchester meeting? Were their lordships not bound to suppose that government were anxious to produce not and disturbance, in order to give countenance to their measures. Was it possible that such a state of things could uncontrollably exist in a civilized government? Was it possible to suppose that such practices could be carried on with impunity in the metropolis, and immediately under the eye of government? Could it be imagined that meetings, said to be seditious, should be allowed to be held, bearding the constituted authorities, and subverting the peace and order of society; and this without any timely attempt at prevention on the part of ministers? Was it a want of energy which caused this—was it a want of experience? No. Why then were there no exertions made to prevent such meetings, unless there was a motive for it; unless these meetings were to be made a pretext for the introduction of measures of coercion and restriction? From the manner in which the bill was drawn up, it evidently was not the intention of the original framer of it to include Ireland in its operation. There were directions how it was to be carried into execution in England and in Scotland; but not one for the manner in which it was to be executed in Ireland. But on reconsideration ministers were of opinion, that though there was no necessity to include Ireland in the bill, yet they might as well make one business of it, and throw the whole empire into their system of coercion. He wondered, indeed, they did not include the remote dependencies of the Crown, as well as the more immediate parts of the empire: they had just as much right to do the one as the other. To include Ireland was merely for the sake of insult—it could be for nothing else; for in the state and character of Ireland there was nothing to which this bill could be at all applicable. The Irish, indeed, knew how to plan rebellion much better than the English; the latter had large meetings and paraded the streets with flags and music: the former had private meetings, secret committees, and associations of a nature which he should not describe, as the noble lord opposite knew them very well. It almost appeared as if it was the noble lord's intention to teach the radicals how to do this business—to show them that it was not by marching in large bodies in military array, and in the lock-step; but by proceeding in conclaves of fifties—ays, or even of twenty-fives, for that number in his country had been found effective.

The Earl of Harrowby reminded their lordships, that the question now before them was not on the principle of the bill, but whether they should go into a committee, where its provisions might be discussed. It was pleasing to see that the objections of the noble lords who had opposed the measure applied rather to the date of continuance than the nature of the enactments. But the objections stated by one noble lord to the principle of the bill, and by another noble lord to its duration, rested on the same basis. One of those noble lords said, "I cannot agree to the enactments of the bill, because it is a bad bill;" and the other said, "I must have its operation limited to two years, because it is a bad bill." If it was a bad measure, he called upon their lordships not to pass it at all. This measure did not come before the House like another that had lately received the sanction of parliament, as an invasion of the constitution, and therefore enacted only for a duration commensurate with the period of necessity on which its justification rested. It came before their lordships, not as an infringement of long enjoyed privilege, nor as a curtailment of the rights of Englishmen—not, in short, as having any thing in its nature opposed to its perpetuity; but it came before them as a temporary measure, because, though framed to protect rather than infringe the constitution, it contained provisions new to the late practice of the country, and therefore requiring to be brought under the review of parliament at no distant period, when their operation should be known. The noble earl had contended, that the right of meeting ought to be subject to no restrictions; but in doing so he had gone a little too far, and had destroyed the consistency of his speech; for in a subsequent part of his remarks, he had found fault with ministers for not having used military force to disperse those meetings which were said to be seditious ["No," from the earl of Donoughmore.] He was sorry to have mistaken the noble earl.

The Earl of Donoughmore said, that he had found fault with ministers for not having taken the necessary steps to prevent meetings of a seditious nature.

The Earl of Harrowby continued—He was sorry to have mistaken the noble earl, but what he admitted was sufficient for his argument. The noble earl, then, found fault with ministers for not preventing these meetings. There could be no doubt about the right of the people to petition the legislature, or to carry their addresses to the foot of the throne; and, therefore, there could be no doubt of their right to assemble, so far as was necessary, to agree to their petitions or addresses. This right was usually grounded on the Bill of Rights, but it existed long before. This provision in the Bill of Rights which asserted it, was made to meet a particular case, that of the Seven Bishops who had been persecuted for petitioning; whereas the right of petitioning had always existed; it was grounded on no concession; it originated in no statute; it was founded on the principle that no man ought to be restrained from that which was not prohibited, and that what was not forbidden by law was lawful. The bill before the House imposed no restrictions on the legitimate enjoyment of the privilege; it only regulated the meetings at which it was to be exercised; but the noble lord objected to its duration, and wished to limit it to two years, ornandum, laudandum, tollendum. The discussion of public measures at public meetings, he was willing to allow, had been one main cause of producing that manly character, and fostering that national spirit, to which our greatness, our prosperity, and our glory, were owing; but how were these meetings originally, and up to a very late period, composed? Had our rights been asserted and our laws defended by such meetings as those of Manchester, of Spa-fields, or of Smithfield? Was it by assemblies of that sort that the sense of the country had been taken in any of its glorious struggles? No; they were unheard of till the beginning of the long train of revolutions that we had lately witnessed. Great meetings on public affairs began about 1779 or 1780. At no period were meetings more common than then to address the throne or to petition the Houses of parliament on subjects of national interest. The first great assembly of this kind took place in Yorkshire, and it was mentioned by sir G. Saville in the House of Commons, and the marquess of Rockingham in this House, that the rental of the 600 requisitionists who called it amounted to 800,000*l*. But was that meeting held in the open air, and attended by all persons who chose to attend it? No. It was a county meeting, called by the sheriff, and attended only by freeholders. What was the nature of the meetings to which Mr. Fox addressed himself in Westminster? They were meetings of householders paying direct taxes to government, and convened by the constituted authorities. Such were the assemblies of the people that formerly conveyed their wishes and prayers to the throne and to parliament, before the present mode of assembling was practised. In contending thus against meetings like those of Manchester or Sheffield, did he wish to deprive the class of persons who attended such assemblies of the means of expressing their opinions? No certainly. Neither did the present bill prevent them from meeting to express their ideas of public matters, and to convey their petitions to the throne or the legislature, if called together by the lord-lieutenant, the custos rotulorum, the sheriff, the grand jury, or five magistrates. It was stated in objection to this, that those officers were appointed by the Crown, and might oppose a meeting to petition against the conduct of the advisers of the Crown; but it ought to be recollected that the meetings formerly held to petition against the measures of government were called by the same constituted authorities with whom the power of convening them was lodged by the present bill. It had been made a strong objection to this measure, that one justice should have it in his power in certain specified circumstances, to dissolve a meeting legally convened, and attended by those who had a right to call it. But that provision applied to such meetings only of which the giving of notice was necessary (which was not the case with meetings called by the constituted authorities); and even at these there must be language of a seditious nature used before the magistrates could interfere to arrest the person; and resistance offered to the arrest of the person, before the meeting could be dissolved. Resistance must be offered before the meeting became unlawful; and after it had thus become unlawful and riotous, it might have been dispersed by the existing law. But the noble earl objected to the bill, because the necessity for such a measure was not made out by sufficient evidence. The noble earl said that it rested on the unproved assertions of noble lords on the ministerial side of the House, and on the authority of the documents on the table. He did not admit that this was all the evidence. But if there had been no one paper brought forward, still he maintained that it only required eyes to see and ears to hear, in order to be satisfied of the danger which existed. Unless people were wilfully deaf and blind to what was passing around them, they must feel the necessity of resisting and putting down the disaffection which was fast spreading through the country. Was it not notorious that meetings were held at many places, which threw the whole neighbourhood into confusion and alarm? Was it not notorious that two counties on this account were nearly in a state of siege? Was it not notorious that thousands had assembled in military array, under leaders, with flags and music? Did it require any documents to prove these facts? Documents might have been produced; but it was needless to prove to their lordships facts which were self-evident, and on which their lordships could not feel a doubt. He was sensible these meetings took place with the professed object of petitioning, and he was not disposed to deny or undervalue the right; but had British subjects no other rights to protect equally valuable? Was the security of our lives and property to be regarded as nothing? Why did we surrender any of our natural rights but to obtain the blessings of society in the safety of our lives and property? Had not every British subject as much a right to protection as some claimed of petition? But could we be safe if these numerous and menacing meetings were allowed to go on? Could the government maintain one army at Manchester, and another at Glasgow and Paisley; and were those who objected to military establishments to be the individuals who would oppose a measure without which our military power must be increased? It had been stated by a noble lord in a previous debate, that a great change had taken place in the state of this country during the last 50 years. It became their lordships to consider what that change had been with a reference to the policy of this bill. In the year 1750, the whole population of the country did not exceed 7,000,000 of souls. Lancashire alone now contained 1,500,000. In 1750, Lancashire contained only 300,000 inhabitants: the manufacturing population of the hundred of Salford, inclusive of the township of Manchester, now contained upwards of 300,000, or as many inhabitants as the whole county about 70 years ago. In the west riding of Yorkshire the manufacturing population amounted to more than 1,000,000. Let their lordships consider of whom this population was composed. It was composed of persons whose labour was expended in the production, and whose subsistence depended on the disposal of manufactures, the value of which might be affected, and the sale of which might be interrupted, by a variety of causes over which government could have no control. A change of fashion or the caprice of a foreign state might ruin or throw out of employ whole classes of manufacturers. This tendency to fluctuation had been much increased by the use of machinery. Formerly, if an order came from abroad for a great assortment of manufactured goods, it would have required six months to execute what could now be done in so many weeks in consequence of the perfection of our machinery. These fluctuations were the cause of great distress; and distress and disaffection were often nearly allied. There were instances of disaffection where little distress was felt, but in general they were joined. Unless, therefore, there was some restriction imposed upon the right of holding public meetings in places where the population was crowded, and where the employment of the people was liable to great vicissitudes, these could be no safety or security. The noble earl had charged this measure with being a part of a system by which the constitution was invaded, and had said that it originated in the design of ministers and of parliament to trench on the liberties of the subject. But how was the charge made out against ministers? The army had been reduced as much as was desired by the greatest enemy of large military establishments; at least, he had a right to presume so from no motions being made for a farther reduction. In no other case could it be proved that parliament had shown a disregard to the wants or interests of the people. This sort of general accusation against ministers and parliament had assumed a serious aspect, and ought to be discouraged, from the effects which it might produce. What prepared the riots which took place in 1780? They were produced by telling the people that neither government nor the legislature would attend to their complaints. This language was held in the beginning of April, and in June parliament was itself treated with disrespect, insult, and violence, by a riotous mob, and on the following day the city was set on fire. Had such a bill as that now before the House been then passed, these melancholy events would not have happened. For want of preventive laws, such calamities were experienced. The bill allowed all the meetings which in the best times were allowed, and only prevented those that created alarm, or threatened the public peace. Neither he nor any of his majesty's ministers wished to put an end to fair and free discussion. If any subject arose, on which the public might entertain a wish to meet, for the purpose of discussing its merits, the provisions of this bill gave them an ample opportunity of doing so. No unfair restriction, no unjust opposition, was called into action, in order to destroy the privilege of meeting. It should be recollected, that the provisions of the bill were not applicable to meetings in rooms. In former times, with the exception of riotous and tumultuary assemblages, every expression of public feeling emanated from meetings which were never too numerous to be included under the roof of a building. If the public desired to meet for the purposes of fair discussion, the provisions of this bill would be highly favourable to that object, by preventing the congregation of numbers so great as to render all discussion impracticable. He agreed with the noble earl, that if this bill would have the effect of putting an end to public meetings, if it essentially interfered with that great popular privilege, if it prevented the people from expressing their feelings in a just and constitutional manner, it would be highly objectionable, and might lead to the worst consequences; because if those fires were not permitted to blaze above-ground, they would, perhaps, occasion a dreadful explosion. But the right of meeting was not prevented. Those who meant well could still assemble at parish and county meetings. Those only who wished to meet for bad purposes, would be affected by the bill. The noble earl stated, that that part of the empire to which he more immediately belonged, was perfectly free from any taint of disaffection—that the people there were perfectly quiet. He did not doubt the correctness of this statement. He would go farther. He was ready fairly to admit, that the conduct of the great mass of the population of England had been most excellent, most praiseworthy. He conceived that the exemplary manner in which they had undergone the greatest privations—privations that were rendered necessary for the good of the state—entitled them to the utmost gratitude. But, because he thought so, he felt it necessary that the protecting arm of parliament should be stretched forth to shield those parts of the country which were not yet assailed by the principles of disaffection, from an evil that otherwise would reach them. Had Cornwall, or Devon, he would ask, been disturbed? Certainly not. Yet, upon the principle laid down by the noble earl, they ought to be excluded from the operation of the bill. Was it possible for their lordships to say, that this, which was intended to be a preventive measure, should be marked out for, and confined to, particular counties and districts? What would be the consequence? It would be this—that the principle of disaffection, when put down in one place by the operation of the bills, would speedily arise in another; and thus they would be called on to legislate over and over again. He should be extremely sorry to make any difference or distinction with respect to the operation of this measure. He thought every part of the country entitled to the same degree of protection from government. Their measures intended for safety and security, ought to be alike extended to all. It was for the legislature to render their measures effectual; and, with that object in view, they could not exclude counties situated on the other side of the Channel, because they were not visited by tumult and disaffection, more than they could, for the same reason, exempt districts on this side of it from the operation of the measure. He hoped their lordships would pass the bill in its present state. He did so, because he felt that, so far from its being part of a system of coercion, it was, in fact, part of a system of protection. It was introduced, not with reference to any body of men, or to any district, but for the good of the entire country, of the whole community. It was introduced in behalf of the quiet, peaceable, and loyal inhabitants of the country, who formed the infinitely greater portion of our population. Not alone would he have the bill passed for the safety and security of the quiet, peaceable, and loyal; he would also have it passed for the sake of those very men, against whom, as the noble earl asserted, it was peculiarly directed. He would pass it, that those persons might be deterred from adding to their own distress by debating on political topics, when they should be attending to their business; he would pass it, that such persons might be deterred from attending meetings in such vast numbers as rendered it necessary to call out military force in order to assist the civil power. Although it might be the duty of government sometimes to call out the military force, it was, he would declare, a most painful duty; for he could assure their lordships, that the present government was as unwilling to recur to the employment of a military force, if they could possibly avoid it, as their ancestors were. But if it were found necessary to use that force, if the exigencies of the time demanded it, he trusted government would not be deterred, by attacks from any quarter, to do their duty firmly and vigorously, for the decisive and vigorous protection of the state, and the constitution of the country. He felt that the system of coercion, as it had been called, unjustly as he conceived, had already produced a very good effect. The measures which had been submitted to parliament, had wrought much benefit to the country. He believed that popular discontent was fast subsiding; but that it would subside within the short period to which the noble earl wished the bill to be restricted, he was not sanguine enough to suppose. He was firmly of opinion, that the House would protect themselves and the country from some of the greatest dangers by which a kingdom could be visited, if they passed this measure. Many persons revolted at the idea of a military despotism. The fear was groundless, because, if a military force was employed, it was in defence of the laws, and not with an intention of destroying them. But even military despotism was better than the despotism of a mob. The despotism of the mob was in itself worse than military despotism; in addition to which it invariably led to military despotism. If anarchy were allowed to prevail, that anarchy must end in arbitrary government. If, therefore, life and property could be secured only by an arbitrary government, it would be better to go to it by a direct, than by that dreadful road, to which the path that led to the gates of hell was alone superior in horror. But he was persuaded that to no such danger would the proposed measure tend. It would merely aid the executive authority in the suppression of that evil, the continuance of which was utterly incompatible with private happiness and public order. It was a love of rational freedom which prompted him to support this measure, because he wished that rational freedom to be guarded by the arm of the law; and as the law now stood, it was not sufficient to ward off the danger by which the country was threatened.

Earl Grosvenor said, he should be obliged to detain their lordships longer on this occasion than he had done during the progress of other measures connected with the present through that House, because he conceived the bill of infinite importance, tending as it did to a radical alteration in the frame of the constitution. The noble earl near him who had so ably exposed the true character of the measure under their lordships consideration, had called on the noble lords opposite to exempt Ireland from the operation of this act. That country had been represented by ministers, and by all who had delivered their sentiments on this subject, as being in a state of perfect quietness; and therefore he thought it should not be affected by such a measure. But the noble earl who had just sat down, declared that the bill was a favour and a boon to the people of Ireland. How far he would extend that favour and that boon, he could not say. Was it to be extended to the settlements abroad? There were one or two places to which perhaps ministers might suppose the favour would peculiarly apply. Would they extend it to the Cape of Good Hope, to which they were exporting so large a proportion of the population of the country? Would they also extend it to the inhabitants of Botany Bay?—A noble duke had congratulated himself and those around him, on the overwhelming majorities by which the measures of ministers were supported. If great majorities always proved the truth, then indeed would the excellence of the system now introduced be decidedly made out, and ministers might be considered as the best and wisest of all human beings. But in the course of his own experience he had found, in one or two cases, that positions, supported by overwhelming majorities were in the course of six months afterwards overturned by majorities as overwhelming. Therefore he inferred, that great majorities were not always an undeniable proof of the excellence of measures; and he doubted very much whether, in this case, the large and overwhelming majorities by which ministers were supported would be a satisfactory answer to those who viewed the measures under consideration with distrust and suspicion. The noble earl rejoiced in the effect which the introduction of these measures of coercion already had throughout the country. He stated his belief that it was owing to them that the late meeting at Manchester passed off without mischief. He felt very differently. In his opinion, those measures were likely to excite discontent—to excite a strong feeling of indignation in the minds of the people, instead of producing good humour and quietness. The noble lord spoke of an army at Manchester—he spoke of an army at Glasgow; but if a military force were thus employed in every part of the country, must not the inference be, that these meetings were put an end to by violence, and not by the operation of the law? Instead of curing the evil, would it not render it necessary to keep on foot, in a time of peace, still more immense armies? It was not by measures such as these—it was not by means of violence and oppression—it was not by employing large armies—that the people would become quiet and contented. It was by measures of conciliation, and not by acts of violence that the affections of the people were to be won. Those who proceeded in a different course would, in the end, perceive that it led to results very different from those which they expected. The noble earl had adverted to the French Revolution—a subject perhaps too much touched upon in their lordships' debates. If that event could at all be quoted with effect, it went to prove that by timely conciliation, and not by violence, the feelings of the people were likely to be soothed. Previous to the French Revolution, meetings of numerous bodies of the people were prohibited; they were put down by force; and this was one of the causes which occasioned that great convulsion. The noble earl said, that meetings of disaffected persons had lately taken place to an extent that could not, without running the risk of great danger, be any longer allowed. Let their lordships, in answer to this assertion, look at the meetings in Yorkshire, and other places. They might there see that persons of large property, as well as those who felt the severe pressure of the times, assembled together. Did the noble earl really mean to say that meetings of this sort were never to take place? Did he mean to declare that persons of this description were never to be heard—that they were never to discuss points of grievance, except when the meeting consisted of certain numbers? Were their lordships surprised, could they be astonished, at the meetings that had recently been held in Yorkshire, and in other districts, when they considered the impoverished state of the country? If the country was, as all persons must acknowledge, in a state of distress and suffering, was it not likely that persons who were affected by the pressure of the times, would meet in large bodies, for the purpose of petitioning? He differed from the noble earl in his opinion that it was not expedient that public meetings should in any case be attended by any but freeholders and persons of property. When the inferior classes were distressed, was it fitting that parliament should turn short on them and say, "No! you shall not meet, because you are poor! you shall not meet, because you are that portion of the people who are most likely to be distressed! you shall suffer, but you shall not have the privilege of complaining?" The people were now in circumstances essentially different from those in which they had heretofore been placed—they were oppressed by circumstances which formerly did not molest them. The mode proposed by ministers was not the fair way of meeting the circumstances of the time—it was not the just way of viewing the question—since the people were now in a situation that was never before thought of. He thought the power now vested in magistrates was quite sufficient for every useful purpose, while, at the same time, it was completely consistent with the rights and liberties of the subject. The bill then before the House did, on the contrary, fritter away the rights of the subject; and when it was passed, it was easy to see that no meetings would be called except such as would enter into resolutions complimentary to ministers. Democracy was unquestionably to be deprecated. But it would be well for their lordships to take care, that while they avoided the rock of democracy, they were not drawn into the whirlpool of arbitrary power. The increase of the military establishment was one of the most appalling features of the new system. They had at present an army of 20,000 men, which cost the country 4,000,000*l.* a-year, and to that force a large addition was about to be made. Were the finances of the country capable of supporting such a burden? Were not the finances, on the contrary, in such a state as rendered it impossible to bear this additional expense? Did not they see the yeomanry cavalry rising in all parts of the country? Were they not sufficient to preserve the peace, if a military force were at all wanted? Did not one troop of cavalry disperse the meeting at Manchester? It would be well worth their while to consider, whether the danger was not increased by the proceedings that took place in the north. He would not say much more, because he should have other opportunities of considering the general nature of all those measures; but he must observe, that he certainly was not one of those who approved of the system which was acted on towards the people,—a system which, throughout its whole progress, betrayed an utter contempt for conciliation. He was a friend to wise and salutary regulations, but not to such measures as those now proposed. They ought to take care that neither the ultra-zealous loyalist, on the one hand, nor the pestilent reformer, on the other, should be allowed to force parliament to the adoption of measures injurious to liberty. It was their duty to devise the best means for correcting any thing that was wrong in the frame of society: but they ought to be cautious and more especially with reference to the most valuable of our privileges, the freedom of the press, that, in rooting out the poisonous weed, they did not destroy the wholesome and valuable plant which flourished near it. He believed that no bad spirit existed in the country; he did not think that a bad spirit had been generated by political causes. He was of opinion, contrary to what many noble lords asserted, that an evil revolutionary spirit did not prevail throughout the kingdom. If he believed that such a spirit was in existence—if he imagined that a bad feeling towards the constitution was operating throughout the country, he would not be found debating about this bill or that. If a revolutionary spirit were manifested, he would at once endeavour to subdue it. In his opinion no spirit of the kind existed. On the contrary, it appeared to him that if there ever was a period when the minds of the people were more particularly enlightened than they ever before were—if there ever was a period when they were more deeply impressed with the purity of the great precepts of the Christian religion than they had ever previously been, it was the time at which he was speaking.

He knew no case in which juries had not conscientiously performed their duty. The case of Hone had often been adverted to. He referred their lordships to that case, as a proof of the truth of what he asserted. The jury, he was quite convinced, viewed the pamphlets which that individual was prosecuted for publishing, as matters of a political nature, and therefore acquitted him of any intention to revile the Christian religion. Again, if they considered the case of Carlile, they would see that the jury acted justly. They decided as every religious man must have wished them to decide—as every honest man must have rejoiced that they did decide—against that individual. To prove still farther the feelings by which the people were actuated, he begged leave to mention the way in which a posthumous production, “The bones of Thomas Paine,” had been treated in this country. The person by whom that vile experiment had been tried found that he had a little mistaken the feeling and the character of the people of England. Was there ever any subject treated with more laughter, contempt, and derision, than the introduction of those miserable bones—whether the bones of Tom Paine, or not, he would not undertake to decide. From every circumstance which had come under his observation, he had a right to contend, that there was nothing in the present state of affairs, that there was nothing in the feelings of the people, nothing in the frame of society which called for such bills as those which were now under consideration. Measures of this nature did not tend to the security of the subject, but gave rise to one general feeling of suspicion and distrust. Where was the danger that threatened the country at this moment? For his own part, he could not perceive where it existed. They all knew that mankind were surrounded with dangers. For instance, they could not tell but that meteoric stones might fall on their heads as they passed through the streets. They did not, however, on account of such a remote possibility, live always in a state of fear; neither would he consent that severe coercive measures should be put in force, because ministers were apprehensive of dangers from the ferment of popular feeling. He believed that there were dangers of another sort—dangers meditated against the constitution, which it would be well for the legislature to guard against. They were told of persons who wished to overturn the present state of things. Some of them were, in derision, called radicals. What he would ask their lordships, did the conduct of these people proceed from? It might be traced entirely to their distress, out of which discontent and dissatisfaction had naturally grown. There were various causes to which that distress might be attributed, although those persons declared it was entirely the fault of the legislature.—They stated that it would be peculiarly proper that the voice of the people should be more distinctly heard in the House of Commons. Then, they argued, there will be a better chance of real efforts being made for the benefit of the people, and that a reduction would be effected in the expenditure of the country, which was now weighing heavily on all ranks of society. He believed, if the wishes of the people were fairly met and considered, if their claims were attended to, instead of being opposed by measures of this kind, that the whole mass of the population would be conciliated, not even excepting those radicals of whom ministers appeared to be so much afraid. He was convinced that whatever danger threatened the country was not lessened by the events of the 16th of August.—It appeared clear to him, on the contrary, that the conduct of the magistrates on that occasion greatly increased the peril. When the meeting was dispersed, the people endeavoured to obtain legal redress, but they were in the end satisfied that they could not procure justice. Then came their last, their only hope, that justice would be done to them in parliament—that there their case would be sifted to the bottom—that there their grievances would be properly redressed. In that hope they were most grossly deceived: they were deceived because it was not found convenient for ministers to undertake such an investigation. He believed that if the transactions of the 16th of August were inquired into, it would be found that the whole was a matter of police—an affair that lay entirely between the police and the home department. It would be found that the persons employed by the police on that occasion, under what immediate direction he could not say, were the first to create tumult and alarm. What did the principal officer do on that occasion? He proceeded to execute his warrant, and when he came near the crowd that surrounded the platform, which he described to be so close that he could not get through it, he immediately returned and called for military force; whereas he contended, that the officer ought, in conjunction with the constables, to have endeavoured to open his way to the hustings. He did not, however, struggle to get through the press of the people. He retired without making an effort, and then stated to the magistrates that it was necessary to employ military force. He could prove, if necessary, at their lordships' bar, that long after the removal of those unfortunate persons who were wounded and mangled on that melancholy occasion—and he begged to say that this was the evidence of those upon whom he could most implicitly rely—a large crowd collected round the hospital to which they had been conveyed, anxious to inquire as to the fate and sufferings of their friends and relatives; and whilst they so stood near the hospital gates, a party of yeomanry cavalry rode over, and injured many of them. Much exaggeration appeared to have discoloured the statements which their lordships had heard, relative to the many thousands of men who were said to have been under arms. He had the satisfaction, on the other hand, of stating to their lordships that a great number of county meetings had been held, at which resolutions had been agreed to, abundantly testifying the loyalty of those who subscribed them. As to these “loyal meetings,” as they were called, they always appeared to him to be, to say the least, very insipid meetings, for those who did not join in the resolutions were considered as of course disloyal. They had the further disadvantage, that they were very impolitic things; as in the case of another set of resolutions—not that originally proposed—being carried by, as it might happen, “an overwhelming majority.”—At a late meeting of this sort, certain resolutions of so very strong a character were moved, that it was found impossible to pass them; several others were proposed, and a gentleman observed, that the least which could be done with those who refused to support such loyal resolutions, would be to transport them; another gentleman declared that while he could not approve of those which had been first submitted, he was ready to sign any other declaration whatever. A noble earl had declared, that he felt less alarm at the “vultus instantis tyranni,” than at the

“civium ardor prava jubentium.” For his own part he could not help observing to their lordships, that when they looked at our foreign allies, and remarked the close and near connexion which subsisted between this government and governments abroad, they must view with indignation and astonishment, and at the same time with distrust, the ingratitude of those powers who had promised, in their hour of adversity, a free and representative government to a valiant people; but who, in their season of prosperity, had forgotten to redeem their sacred pledge. What were they to think when they saw governments alarmed at the diffusion of knowledge, and hostile even to the practice of those gymnastic exercises in schools and villages, which had always been considered the best adapted to the improvement of the strength and spirit of mankind? What were they to think of our own government when they saw them assisting the court of Spain in all its measures of tyranny and oppression; when they looked at the horrible state of that devoted country, and saw her bravest patriots, with Arguelles at their head chained in dungeons and languishing in darkness? When their lordships beheld those brave and noble champions of freedom, of whom their country should have been proud to boast, and each of whose little fingers should have been more dear than the whole flesh and sinews of their oppressor, tortured by a man who had once so noble a part to take; and who might, in the moment of his restoration to the throne of his ancestors have given to his people a glorious constitution; when they beheld this close, this intimate connexion subsisting between him and his majesty's ministers; and, above all, when they coupled this last circumstance with the exertions made to pass the foreign enlistment bill, they could not but concur with him in thinking, that there was more of the “vultus instantis tyranni” in the government of the country, than of the “civium ardor prava jubentium” in the spirit of the people. But most especially when they adverted to France, the only free nation of the continent, and, as he feared, it would very speedily prove, in Europe, and found, that immediately upon the return of the duke de Richelieu to it from the congress, measures were adopted tending to destroy, or at least, to restrict the existing state of things there as regarded political liberty, it was impossible not to anticipate the greatest dangers to political liberty. He would refer their lordships to some of the features which the internal policy of the government exhibited; to the attempts made for the renewal of the income tax; to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus; to the enormous military establishment maintained in time of profound peace; and particularly to one act, on behalf of one of its members, which had done more harm to the royal family than any other measure he could remember, however unadvised; and he would then ask their lordships, whether they were not far more strongly impressed with the "vultus instantis tyranni," than with the "civium ardor prava jubentium?" He had one word to say upon a subject of very deep importance—the distresses of the people. It had been always declared by the noble lords opposite that they were not to blame if the people were distressed. It was not less remarkable, that if any appearance of prosperity manifested itself in any part of the country, the same noble lords directly took to themselves the credit of it. Why, then, it was but reasonable to assume, that they, by their conduct, were the great causes of that distress. Time was, when the poorest class of the people brought home to their families, the honest and productive earnings of their daily labour; when that which had been acquired by toil was shared with joy; and when the industrious labourer might view with pride the comforts which rewarded his daily exertions. Those comforts, that subsistence, however, were now to be obtained by other means—means at which their indigent but manly ancestors would have blushed. It was impossible not to revert, in the contemplation of the general distress which pervaded so large and invaluable a portion of society, to those beautiful lines which Goldsmith in his boundless acquaintance with the feelings of the human heart, had so felicitously introduced in the "Deserted Village." He would beg their lordships permission to quote the passage; premising, that the mournful necessity under which so many of his countrymen had lately found themselves compelled to leave the country of their birth, was exactly imagined in them:—

"Ah no! to distant climes, a dreary scene,
 "Where half the convex world intrudes between,
 "Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
 "Where wild Altama murmurs to their woe."

"Far different there from all that charm'd before,

"The various terrors of that horrid shore."

"Far different these from every former scene,
 "The cooling brook, the grassy-vested green,
 "The breezy covert of the warbling grove."—

"Good heaven! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,

"That called them from their native walks away;

"When the poor exiles, every pleasure past,
 "Hung round the bowers, and fondly look'd their last;

"And took a long farewell, and wish'd in vain,
 "For seats like these beyond the western main."

All this, he feared, was but the poetical anticipation of a scene which would but too soon be realised. He could not forbear adding two lines, which contained a precept, the truth of which was too unfortunately felt at this moment, to make it necessary for him to enlarge upon it; "That trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,

As ocean sweeps the laboured mole away."
 When they heard of 300 wretched beings being "massed" together, as it was emphatically termed, in transports destined to distant and almost unknown shores; upon the uncertain chance of finding there the subsistence which they could not procure at home; and packed and "massed" like so many bales of indigo or tobacco, what were they to think of the government under which their misery had accumulated to such a height? Could they acquit ministers of all blame? Good God! they would not surely have the audacity to say, that it was brought on by Providence! No; it was brought on by the measures pursued by the noble lords opposite; the human means were to be found in their conduct. The sole escape for the vessel of the state, the only chance of her preservation among the rocks and perils which encompassed her, was in that moderate reform, which would advance and increase the purity, without endangering the health and vigour of the constitution. Before he sat down, he would observe, that the magistracy were now vested with powers, so increased, that he might say they reached to the farthest verge of the island; but he sincerely thanked God that there still remained to Englishmen, even when the Crown itself had enlarged its prerogative, one means, and one only, of legally resisting, to a certain degree, the power of the Crown;

by those means, he meant, not adverse force; not the sword, nor the dagger; but one small thing (in his idea, however, a most powerful one)—the influence of public opinion. It was that which, when arrested, compressed, and confined, would in its expansion carry all before it; it would break opposing bayonets and bolts, and bars to atoms; and still more powerful gold would vainly endeavour to restrain it. Let them heap Pelion upon Ossa, it would dash them in its struggles to fragments. If it held that national freedom was the right of a people, they would become rationally free; if it deemed that moderate reform was necessary, moderate reform would prevail; if it considered that abuses should be rectified, abuses would cease. All history proclaimed the triumph of public opinion. What, he would ask, put down the tyranny of James 2nd? A single shout, the echo of the public opinion, which resounded from Westminster-hall at the acquittal of the Seven Bishops. What accomplished the French revolution? Not, surely, the small handful of men who stormed the Bastille; but the sentence which public opinion had pronounced upon the tyranny of the government, the vices of the state, and the condition of the nobility. What brought back Napoleon Buonaparté from Elba? Was it any expedition, any armament? No, but some opinion; and what was that?—That after his restoration the king had sacrificed his sincerity; and, indeed, the French had reason enough to think so. Nobody could respect more than he did the king of France; but at that time he had been guided by bad advisers. The king of France had since acted in such a manner as all in his situation should do; and that circumstance alone had kept him on his throne: if ever he departed from those principles the loss of the affections of his people must prove his overthrow. For himself, he wished all nations to be free, whatever the consequence might be. If the liberty of France straitened our own means somewhat, or even detracted something from the glory of Great Britain, he should still be most happy at the event. The noble earl had been boasting that night of the course pursued by himself and his colleagues; of retrenchment of expenditure, of the abolition of sinecures. But it was to public opinion that any alteration of the system was owing. As long as ministers could resist public opinion, they had resisted it: among its warmest opponents were the noble and learned lord (whom he did not blame for the interest he took in the question), and the noble earl opposite. The abolition of sinecures, however, they coupled with pensions to an immoderate amount—a way of proceeding which considerably detracted from the merits of their retrenchment on the other side; for instead of effecting a saving of 280,000*l.* their pensions reduced the amount to between 30,000*l.* and 40,000*l.* What produced an alteration in the traverse bill? Certainly, it was not due to the noble lords, but to public opinion. In the other House, not all the great eloquence of the noble lord who had brought forward the Grampound business; not all the talents which had distinguished his conduct in that instance (and great, he understood, they were); not all the abuses in the elections which himself and his hon. friends had so forcibly described, would ever have caused any thing like a successful termination to their labours, but for the influence of public opinion, which his majesty's ministers must have felt. Even to those who advocated annual parliaments and universal suffrage, he would say, rest on your oars; if you are right, by public opinion you must succeed: if you are wrong, by public opinion you will fail; and then you must be satisfied with defeat. As to the subject of the distress which prevailed throughout the country, he well knew that a noble lord, in his eye, would turn round and say, "What we do for them, we do as a favour: we cannot help their distress; but we will extend to them our protection from plunder and outrage." Protection! Yes; such protection as Pizarro extended to the Peruvians: and as for plunder, he was not quite sure that they were not in almost as much danger in that respect from other quarters as from the radicals. There was not much prospect of increasing the property of those who already complained of burthens, by the additional expense of 10,000 additional men; and it was pretty clear that, so far from relieving those who suffered most, this expense was another tax upon those who had not yet experienced the same extent of distress. He begged leave to apologize to the House for the length at which he had detained them.

The Earl of Westmoreland called the attention of the House to the real question, namely, the object of the bill, which he contended was no invasion of the privileges of Englishmen, or of the Bill of Rights, but only a regulation of the right of petition, although it had the misfortune of meeting with the severe disapprobation of the noble lord. After the many and able speeches which their lordships had heard, he should not detain them very long, but observe, that this bill was framed with a view of preventing those seditious meetings of which they had heard so much, and which were so greatly to be deplored. The effect of the humane principle of the present measure would be to disperse tumultuous meetings by the operation of the law, and not by force; and it was drawn with that care in its provisions, that no meetings which could reasonably be wished for, were prevented by its operation. There were none, if acting under constituted authorities, but what it permitted to take place, whether summoned by lord-lieutenants, sheriffs, or magistrates. With respect to the regulations of the bill, he defied the noble lord to point out any meeting that ought to assemble, which was prevented from doing so by the present enactment: it regulated those only that were calculated to excite intimidation and terror. He would not, at that late hour of the night, pretend to argue on the legality or illegality of the meetings that had already taken place. Independently of the statute law, he took it to be the common law of the land, that all meetings which gave terror and alarm to the king's subjects were illegal. It was no matter how the alarm was produced, whether by numbers, threats, devices or arms; still, if alarm was excited, the meeting was illegal, and it was in the power of magistrates to disperse it. This he conceived to have been the law of the land before any statutes were made on the subject. The first statute relating to public meetings was the 16th of Henry 4th, which declared, that all routs and riots were to be dispersed, and that the magistrates were to arrest the persons causing them; it went even further, for it inflicted heavy penalties on the magistrates if they were within reach, and did not disperse such routs and riots. The next act on the subject was that of Henry 8th, which gave magistrates the power to disperse riotous meetings by force and violence. This act lived till the time of Elizabeth, when it was allowed to expire. Its provisions, however, were renewed by the Riot act of George 1st, which was in fact nothing new; it only warranted magistrates to disperse riotous meetings by law, while formerly they did so at their own discretion: now the present law was simply to follow the course of former statutes, and to enable magistrates to disperse dangerous meetings by law; and its object was to save the lives of persons who might attend those meetings without knowing that they were unlawful. As to the duration of the act, he should not take up the time of the House in arguing on the propriety of not limiting it to a shorter period than that proposed. All he should say on the measure in general was, that it appeared from the communications of lord-lieutenants, justices of the peace, and others, that the country was in a state of discontent, disturbance, and alarm, and that his majesty's loyal subjects looked to government for protection. It had been said by the noble earl (Grosvenor) that these discontents proceeded from distress, and from the misconduct of government, and the noble earl had prescribed a simple cure for the evil; first, by an inquiry into the transactions at Manchester; secondly, by a change of measures; and thirdly, by a reduction of the army. He (the earl of Westmoreland) should briefly advert to the evil and to the remedies proposed. It was well known, that in those parts of the country where the most distress existed, the people were suffering with the greatest loyalty and patience. On the other hand, it did not appear to him likely that persons under the pressure of great distress could afford to pass whole days and nights in drilling; that they could afford to purchase seditious pamphlets, or that they could go about the country attending seditious meetings. This conduct surely did not indicate great distress; for he could not conceive how persons in a state of want could either have the pecuniary means, or the physical strength requisite for such proceedings. But allowing that it was distress—if such were the results, and that parliament saw capital withdrawing from the north and the west, was not that an additional motive for the interference of the legislature, to recal the people to peace, order, and loyalty, by dispelling the delusions that prevailed. But the remedy, forsooth, was an alteration in the frame of the government. Did they forget that the frame of that government which they would alter made England the envy and admiration of surrounding nations; that made the name of an Englishman more respectable than that of the ancient Roman; that gave them the Bill of Rights—the Habeas Corpus act—and the proudest privileges of a free constitution? This would be considered at least a set-off against the noble lord's assertion, and would perhaps induce him to advance his proposition with some limitation. These privileges, notwithstanding all the clamour raised elsewhere, it now appeared, from the language of the noble lords opposite, ministers were entirely acquitted of any attempt to violate. Nay, these noble lords accused them of a dereliction of duty, not only because they did not institute more criminal prosecutions against the press, but because they did not, of their own authority, order the dispersion of all the large meetings which had taken place for the purpose of exercising the privileges conferred upon the people by the Bill of Rights. The next proposition of the noble lord was, that distress indicated misrule, and a misconstruction of the government of the country, and that therefore there should be a change of system. [Here lord Grosvenor interrupted the noble lord, and said he had never used the expression, 'a misconstruction of government']. He begged the noble earl would allow him to proceed with his argument, and when he had done, the noble lord would have an opportunity of explaining. This country was the first in the world for the employment it afforded to the labouring classes, and for the provision it made for the poor, and he would defy any person to show another country in which the security of property to the rich was so combined with the protection of the poor. These were his reasons for desiring the noble lord to pause before he proposed any alteration in the frame of the government. There were two periods within which it was proposed to review the conduct of ministers; the first with respect to what took place previous to the last prorogation of parliament, and the second, as to what occurred since that prorogation. The noble earl gave an historical detail of the proceedings of administration during each of those periods, maintaining that no censure could attach to them, as they had acted throughout, in concurrence with the opinion of parliament and the prescriptions of the law of the land. He ridiculed the idea that 48 yeomen at Manchester could have produced such an effect as was stated upon a meeting of 48,000 people at Manchester, observing that if this small band could have performed such an achievement it must have done more even than was ascribed to the warriors of Cressy and Waterloo. Those who complained of suffering at Manchester were, he observed, very clamorous for inquiry, and yet when it was proposed to bring the case of any individual to trial in the ordinary course, that individual traversed to avoid inquiry [hear, hear!]. But with respect to the parliamentary inquiry, proposed upon the subject of those transactions, he was satisfied that great injustice would have been done if such an inquiry had been acceded to; for there must have been one of two results, namely, either that the meeting would have been declared, and the magistrates and yeomanry consequently wrong, or the meeting would have been declared illegal, and the parties against whom bills had been found would be pronounced partakers, or rather leaders in that illegality. So that in the one case, the magistrates and yeomanry would have been liable to prosecution with a public declaration of the opinion of parliament against them, while on the other hand, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Harrison, and others against whom bills of indictment had been found would be brought to trial with the weight of a parliamentary denunciation to operate against them. It was clear then that the proposed inquiry could not have been gone into, as the result in either case must be so injurious to public justice, and however he disapproved of the conduct of Mr. Hunt or Mr. Harrison, he could not but wish as an Englishman that they or others should enjoy the benefit of a fair trial without any of that undue prejudice against them which was too likely to result from the authoritative declaration of a parliamentary committee.

Earl Grosvenor, in explanation, apologized for having interrupted the noble earl in the progress of his speech. He had never used the words "misconstruction of government." He trusted that he could not possibly be comprehended among persons wishing to disturb the frame of government; his only object being to promote such a reform in the system of the representation in the House of Commons as should make the voice of the people more distinctly heard.

The Earl of Lauderdale expressed his surprise and regret that the noble duke, who appeared to be in so much doubt as to the causes of the present state of the country, had not supported the inquiry, which would have enabled the House, as well as the noble duke, to ascertain the real cause of the existing evil. He acknowledged that he differed from his noble friend near him in thinking that the sinecures or pensions upon which his noble friend dwelt, formed any material cause of the present distress of the country. On this subject he would admit that a great deal had been done by the noble lords opposite. He would, however, assert, that a great and almost unparalleled distress did exist, and he would endeavour to point out its cause. If the noble lords opposite denied the existence of such distress, they would be stating that which would not be believed in the country. He maintained that such distress and privation extended over a great part of the land, and the real cause of that distress was to be found in the policy of the government which involved a departure from every sound principle of political economy, by allowing the national expenditure to exceed the revenue. The House had lately heard so much of the question of political economy, that he would not then enter into it, but would state generally, that it was impossible for any country not to suffer, whose expenditure had for a length of time been suffered to exceed its revenue. What was the state of the country in this respect under the system of the noble lords opposite? The excess of expenditure had been such, that from the year 1794 to the present period, an amount of debt had been imposed upon the country of no less than 670 millions. From the year 1794 to the year 1819 there had been a nominal debt contracted of from 700,000,000*l.* to 800,000*l.*; and if only 75*l.* was received for every 100*l.* of debt, it would be found there had been an extra expenditure of 670,000,000*l.* in that time; which if divided by 24 would give an annual expenditure of 28,000,000*l.*, besides the usual taxation. Now while this excess of expenditure was going on, an additional demand was created for labour, and when the excess ceased the labourers were left without employment. Through the additional demand for labour an increase of population naturally arose, and upon the cessation of this demand the country became liable to its present embarrassments. But the other nations of Europe had suffered also from the same cause, and their suffering produced an aggravation of our calamity. The natural consequence of a diminished demand for labour was a reduction of wages.—While the demand consequent upon the war prevailed, and the wages were high, the operative manufacturers generally worked only four days in the week, reserving the remaining days for relaxation; but when wages were reduced, they were compelled for subsistence, to work the whole of the seven days, and thus the produce of their labour was increased, while the demand for it was comparatively reduced. Hence arose another cause for the distress of the manufacturing classes. The whole of these evils, he maintained, arose out of the system which had been pursued by the noble lords on the other side. A part of them had been charged on noble lords at his side; for his part he felt no uneasiness under that charge, and he was convinced as little would be felt by his noble friends around him. He had never given a vote which sanctioned the measures or the general policy out of which those accumulated evils arose. Those evils had been the result of the long and ruinous system of warfare in which we had been engaged; but he trusted that we should at least derive this lesson from them—that it was impossible for any country to continue long in a state of war with safety or prosperity to itself. It had been said, that labour in Lancashire was as well paid now as some years since—that was, that the proportion existing between the price of those necessaries which the working classes consumed, was such as to render the present wages equal in effect to the former. But there was a fallacy in this: the manufacturer did not and could not receive the same profit as before. In looking to the price which the manufacturer received for a piece of goods, consideration should be given to the time which it was on hand before it was disposed of, and the additional hours of labour which were devoted to produce that price, supposing it to be the same; but he denied that there was any thing like a fair proportion between the means of subsistence enjoyed by the working classes now, and those they possessed in the period to which he had alluded. If it were so, whence arose all that distress which existed in the manufacturing districts. What was the opinion of the five magistrates, whose letter to the noble secretary of state was among the papers on their lordships' table? Was it not that a great portion, if not all the discontents to which they had referred, had arisen from distress and hunger? Was it not also the opinion of earl Fitzwilliam that the want of employment was generally and most severely felt in his district? Indeed, it was impossible to deny the fact. If there was any doubt left on the subject, it would be removed by the document which had been published by the principal master-manufacturers of Lancashire. In this they declared, that they felt obliged to reduce the wages of their workmen, and they expressed their fears that a farther reduction would be rendered necessary, to the great injury of the weavers; but they added a hope that the circumstances of the country would so improve as that they might be enabled to raise their prices. They could not have meant by that, to raise their prices higher than those of former years, but so comparatively high as to be suited to the means of procuring adequate subsistence for those whom they employed. When one looked at the respectable names by which that document was signed, it was impossible not to feel that they would raise their prices if they thought they could do so with safety. From these facts then it clearly appeared, that severe distress existed in various manufacturing districts. He himself knew that it existed to an almost indescribable extent in the west of Scotland. Indeed, he might at that particular moment make use, in support of his argument, of an opinion which he had often heard on other occasions—that there was an authority behind the throne greater than the throne itself. [His lordship here alluded to the circumstance of several ladies who were then seated behind the throne, where they had been the greater part of the evening listening to the debate;] for there was not a woman in the country who could not state from experience the great depreciation which had taken place in the prices of the articles of manufacture, of the places which he had named. There was not a woman in the country who now went into a retail shop, who must not know that she bought those articles of cotton, &c. which she had usually required upon such terms as could not enable the manufacturer to pay high wages. The assertion, then, that there had been no reduction in the wages of the operative manufacturers, could never be seriously maintained. With respect to the measure before the House, he should for himself say, that he would have no objection to support any measures deemed necessary by government to meet the supposed danger of disaffection, if such measures were accompanied by propositions evincing a due degree of sympathy for the sufferings of the people. But he could not endure the idea of being told that the House should pass such bills as that before the House, while no hope even was held out of any measure for the relief of the distress of the people. It was at least to be expected, that measures of coercion should be accompanied by some proposition of benevolence and conciliation. But no companion of the kind appeared—while the House was called upon to impose restrictions on the people, ministers did not afford it any means of mitigating the severity of the infliction by the slightest offer of beneficence. There was no proposition to soften the ungracious task which the House was required to perform—there was not even an intimation of any pecuniary grant to relieve the severe distress of the operative manufacturers. It was said, no doubt, that such a grant—that to take from one class of the people for the relief of another—would be contrary to the principles of political economy. But did it become those ministers to be so tenacious of the principles of political economy at present, who had been violating those principles in their general conduct for no less than twenty-four years? Were they to tell the country, that although they discarded the principles of political economy, while they were squandering the public resources in war, they would pertinaciously adhere to those principles when the most industrious class of the people required sympathy and relief in distress. But would the means which had been spoken of be a departure from the abstract principles of political economy? He denied that they would. If the land-holder and the fund-holder were taxed for the means of employing the manufacturer, he should be glad to know what principle of political economy would be violated, particularly when it was not denied that the persons who would be so relieved were at present in a state approaching to starvation. He did not mean to say that capital should be laid out, in giving employment for the sake of manufacturing articles, of which the produce already exceeded the consumption, and thereby overstocking the market, and throwing others out of employment. But there were other ways of affording employment to the thousands who wanted, and who would be glad to embrace it. Could no public useful works be engaged in? Might not the distressed be employed in labouring on the highway, or in canals, or in cultivating the forests, or in agriculture of any description? But in whatever way they were employed, these poor interesting people should not be left in their present melancholy condition, and no bill of this nature should have been brought before the House without some plan for their relief. While no such means of relief were afforded, he would not support any measures of severity; for severity alone would, he was convinced, be found wholly unavailing. The bill before the House he thought was ineffectual for the object which it proposed; but suppose it succeeded in putting down large public meetings, would it not in the same ratio create private cabals? As a measure of government, he thought it highly impolitic. The proper instruments of a good government were reward and punishment. Reward those bills could not be said to be; or, if they were looked upon as such, they should be considered a cruel one for the patience with which the nation had borne its long privations and distress; but he would ask whether they were as a measure of punishment against a starving population? The object of the bill, if he understood it was, to destroy one of the ancient rights of Englishmen, that of free public discussion in large bodies. It was said to be to prevent the abuses of that right, by prohibiting large bodies to come together for discussion, except under particular circumstances; but if men wished to assemble in small bodies, and in private (and it was from such meetings that there was most to fear), what clause of this bill prevented such assembly? His noble friend had described the most mischievous meetings in Ireland, in the period preceding the rebellion, as having been held in private. According to the statement of his noble friend it appeared, that no meeting in that country, previous to the insurrection, was numerously attended. Let what had occurred in France be referred to, and what appeared? Not that meetings of large bodies were held in the fields or other public places; no, but that small assemblies, of from twenty to thirty persons, were held within-doors and in secret, and that it was in such assemblies that all the mischiefs of the revolution were hatched. What was there in this bill to prevent the people, if they were ill-disposed, from assembling without discussing any political topic, and still to show their physical force, from which so much was now apprehended? Provided they came together without flags or music, they might assemble and produce all the mischievous effects which it was now wished to be got rid of. So much as to the inefficacy of this measure. But again he said, that he should not so much object to its adoption, if it were accompanied by any proposition for the relief of the distressed manufacturers. And if the principle of political economy, to which he had before referred, were pleaded against the grant of pecuniary relief to these poor people, he would ask, why should they not have that relief as well as other classes of the community, to whom, on some occasions, it had been extended? But why should that principle of political economy, which was set aside when the public money was voted for the relief of the people of Prussia, Saxony and Russia, be so tenaciously insisted upon when relief was required for the extremely distressed manufacturers of our own country. He implored the House and the government to consider the propriety of promptly granting the relief to which he had alluded. There were but two ways of governing mankind—namely, reward or punishment, conciliation or coercion; and as reward and conciliation were best adapted to a free state, he trusted that course of policy would be pursued which was most congenial to the constitution of England and the feelings of Englishmen, as well as best calculated to secure the stability of its institutions. Let them recollect, that if they did not evince a disposition to feel for the poor, the poor would not be disposed to have any respect for them or for the tranquillity of the country.

The Earl of Liverpool assured their lordships, that it was not his wish, at that late hour, to trespass long upon their attention; but as the noble earl who had just sat down had adverted strongly to those principles of policy which his majesty's ministers had adopted, he felt it necessary to offer a few remarks. He should also trouble their lordships with a very few observations on the bill then before them. The noble earl had not followed the example of another noble earl on the same side, in attributing the distresses which now existed to the continuance of particular places and pensions. It certainly did seem impossible for any man, competent to judge of the relation between cause and effect, seriously to maintain the position, that the present state of this country was owing to sinecures and pensions, or that a cause so inadequate could have been followed by such an effect. But the noble earl who had just sat down had disavowed that position. The noble earl had, however, maintained that the distress of the country was owing to the general policy of ministers, and that this distress was the cause of the disaffection to which the present bill was meant to apply. When he heard this charge, he was anxious to learn the grounds upon which it was made; as all allusion to those minor topics which had been so strongly referred to on other occasions had been disclaimed, he wished to know what particular line of policy which had been pursued by his majesty's government was fixed upon as the cause of the distress. He had at former periods, and would now again shortly state what he conceived to be the cause of the distress complained of. But first a word or two as to the disturbances which existed in particular districts. He denied that these disturbances were caused by distress alone, although he allowed that those who were most active in exciting them could not have effected their object so well, if such distress had not existed. With the information which he possessed, he did not, nor ever could believe, that the distress of the people was the sole cause of the disturbances; for in England, and in Scotland also, the disturbances were the greatest in those districts where the distress was felt the least. He was enabled, upon the best authority, to state, that the persons most forward at the late public meetings were by no means among the distressed part of the people; that on the contrary, indeed, they were persons in the receipt of full wages, and in the enjoyment of adequate comforts. Hence he controverted the noble earl's position, that distress was the sole cause of the disaffection. Then as to the other position of the noble earl, that the present distress was the consequence of the policy of the king's ministers. What was his proof for this assertion? That a war had been engaged in, and prosecuted with little intermission for more than twenty-four years. Now, assuming that as a fact, he conceived it was also necessary to prove, that that war could have been avoided by his majesty's ministers; that it was a matter of choice, and not of necessity, on their part. But what was the fact with respect to that war? There might be, he admitted, doubts as to the policy or propriety of commencing the war; but as to its continuance—as to the impracticability of concluding it with safety or honour, he never heard a doubt expressed in that House for ten years previous to its termination in 1814. For the last ten years there was no person who had conceived that the war was not necessary. Not a word concerning peace was heard from any body during that time. He remembered that in the year 1806, when some noble lords opposite guided the councils of his majesty, a mission was sent to France to negotiate a peace; and the noble earl himself was employed in that mission, and conducted it with that ability, for which all who knew him must give him credit. What was the result of that mission? Was it peace concluded? No such thing. The noble earl found peace untenable; he returned with that conviction on his mind; and however desirable a termination of hostilities might have been at the time, all hope of effecting it was then given up. He recollected also, that in the year 1810, a motion was made by a noble earl, whom he did not then see in his place, and the cause of whose absence he regretted as much as any man. In that motion, which was for an address to the throne, peace was alluded to as a most desirable remedy for the public pressure; but the noble earl confessed, that he did not see how it was to be prosecuted. In justice and fairness then he would say, that if the war was the cause of the distress which the people now laboured under, it was not fair to ascribe that war to any party in this country. He knew that there were periods of the war when the policy of its continuance might admit of doubt; but during the greatest period, and during that period more particularly when the greatest exertions were made, there was no difference of opinion as to the propriety of its continuance. But the noble earl had objected to the scale of expenditure on which the war was conducted during the last years of the war. If any man was responsible for this, it was certainly himself. But would the country have ever brought that war to a conclusion, had that expenditure not been made? Their lordships remembered the great and extraordinary efforts which were made by this country towards the end of the war—efforts which proved decisive, and which while they terminated the war with the most splendid success, reflected a glory and renown upon this country which could never be effaced. When the war was brought to a successful conclusion, was there any individual in that House, or the other House, or throughout the country, who thought the peace had been too dearly bought, or who regretted that the exertions had been made which led to it? If the distress was to be ascribed to war, for God's sake let them lay aside party—let them not bandy from one side of the House to the other charges of impolicy and injury in the conduct of the war—let them consider the war as the decree of Providence; let them consider it as the necessary result of the unreasonable and ambitious spirit of the enemy. Let them at the same time consider the glory which this country had derived from it. They had effectually protected themselves from insult, if not from destruction, by an insolent enemy; they had saved Europe from slavery and lasting oppression. The poorest man in this nation had his share in the glory of our triumphs, and in the advantages of our success. The long continuance of the war and its disastrous effects in this country, but more particularly in other countries certainly made the transition from war to peace the cause of great distress. But not only was this distress more felt in other countries than in this; but the distress in this country was principally occasioned by the distress of other countries. At this moment the distress complained of did not prevail in the agricultural districts; it did not prevail in all the manufacturing districts. It prevailed in those districts which were necessarily affected by the foreign demand, and principally in the districts whose manufactures and commerce depended upon the demand from the United States of America. In the United States of America great distress was felt arising, not from the war, but from the presence of other, and he hoped temporary difficulties. Very often it was extremely difficult to trace distress to its cause. But if ever there was a case of distress which could be traced to its cause, it was the present distress in this country, when they saw all those places which depended upon the internal resources of the country flourishing, and when the places that suffered were necessarily affected by the distresses in foreign countries. He repelled as utterly unauthorized and unwarranted the imputations of the noble earl, that the noble lords on his side of the House were callous and unfeeling towards the distressed. He felt as much compassion as the noble earl could feel for the suffering poor and distressed manufacturer. With respect to the observations of the noble earl upon principles of political economy, it might be very proper for the noble earl and for him to investigate those principles in their closets. Such an investigation might interest and amuse them; it might qualify them, too, to edify others. But this was a practical question, and only a practical question. It was the opinion of the greatest statesmen that ever lived in this country, that in applying a practical remedy, or in attempting to apply a practical remedy, to such an evil, there was the utmost danger of increasing it. In 1793, when great commercial distress was occasioned by the first breaking out of the war, a practical relief was administered by issuing exchequer bills. Two years ago, in 1817, a similar relief to pressing distress was had recourse to. Great objections had then been urged against the measure, and particularly by a noble marquis, and he felt the force of those objections. The noble marquis had argued that that temporary relief added to the cause of the distress. If the distress arose from overtrading, it unquestionably would have that effect, as it did not allow the natural cure to operate. He undoubtedly had favoured that measure, however, when there were reasonable hopes that the distress was only temporary, and that the relief might be attended with the advantage to the distressed parties of enabling them to get over their present difficulties, and thus diminishing their distress at the moment. But he never had considered it possible for any minister who resorted to that plan to say he would give away the public money without any security. It would be absurd and ruinous, if it were practicable, to establish a public poor-box or poor-purse, and to deal out money right and left, without security, without a fixed principle, without a limited and qualified object. It was obviously necessary to appoint commissioners for the issuing of it, and to frame rules by which its proper application and ultimate re-payment should be effected; otherwise, it would do more harm than good. Perhaps the noble earl had principally referred to Scotland, a country where distress to a great extent certainly existed; and which was in a situation in some respects different from this. With respect to England, he asked, if it appeared that the great and the rich regarded with indifference the distresses of the poor, when so much of the revenue was appropriated to them? This revenue was applied in the best and most beneficial mode. If there was any thing that could ruin this country, it was that government should take upon itself the support of the poor. Did not every person who had ever looked into the principles of political economy, say that a more ruinous doctrine could not be established than that which would make government support the poor of the country—that the poor-rates would be the greatest of evils, were they not under the superintendence of local interests, by which their injurious tendency was at least diminished? The whole system was now local in its character, and the supplies were consequently collected with greater security and lenity, and applied with greater discrimination and effect, than it would be possible to do, if government managed the whole arrangement. If, by an ill-judged attempt at amelioration, they were to impoverish men of property to support the poor, the consequence would be, that the means of employing labourers would be cut off, and thus the evil would be greatly increased. The only difference which this short-sighted policy would make, would be to injure the laborious poor, in order to benefit the lazy and the dissipated. He knew, however, that in this respect Scotland was in a different situation from England. When the noble marquis on a former night had alluded to the exchequer bills issued in 1817, he had told the noble marquis that of the million and a half at that period assigned by parliament for the relief of the unemployed, 500,000*l.* were still unappropriated, and that the commissioners were ready to distribute it upon proper security. Applications had been made to him from Scotland for the appropriation of a part of this money to the relief of the distresses in that part of the kingdom; and he had replied, that every possible aid would be afforded, if securities were given for repayment. Although no poor-rates existed in that country, yet the baritors possessed a power of assessing for the support of the poor. In many places however there was no assessment. Would it be proposed, would it be borne, that England should advance money to places in Scotland where no assessment had been made? What would this be but giving the money of England to the support of the poor of Scotland; the gentlemen of Scotland not being willing to assess themselves for their own poor. He had accordingly told those who had applied for the application of public money in that country, that if they assessed for the security of its repayment, they would obtain it. If extraordinary distress required extraordinary relief, let that extraordinary relief be given; but let it be given with the securities which would render it safe and effectual, and without which the mass of distress would be infinitely increased, and the prospect of real relief wholly destroyed. In England or in Scotland the means of relief would be afforded. But it could not be denied that such means could never be properly afforded without the security which would render them consistent with the safety of the country. A noble lord had recommended emigration. He was ready to admit, that it was not only the dictate of political economy, but the dictate of natural law, that whenever the wages of the labourer became insufficient for his support, whenever there existed a disproportion in any country between the people and the demand for labour, one way of reducing this disproportion was to remove a part of the excess to other countries, where the same state of things did not exist. From the origin of mankind up to the present time, when the individuals of any one country were too numerous, part of them had always removed elsewhere. But emigration could only come into operation gradually—if it was attempted on too large or extensive a scale, it would only tend to the ruin of the individuals emigrating. Government would afford every proper facility to emigration. But if encouragement were given to emigration beyond the means of fairly supporting those who left their native land, it would multiply greatly the evils attempted to be avoided, and occasion injury instead of benefit. He should now make a few observations upon the measure under their lordships consideration. He considered it the most important measure that their lordships had to consider; more important, indeed, than any of the other measures which had been brought before them. The noble earl had objected, that it would not put down treasons, conspiracies, and plots. He knew this; he knew that there were treasons, conspiracies, and plots even now existing in the country; but this bill was not intended to put these down; its object was to prevent large and tumultuous meetings, which threatened the public security, and injured the peaceable and well disposed. He had been prepared to support this measure as a permanent measure. He did not, however, lament or complain that its duration was limited to 5 years, because he thought it might be proper and convenient that the bill should again come under their consideration, after it should have been in operation throughout the country for some years. But he should not be for this measure at all, either permanently or for a limited period, if it affected the constitutional right of meeting, discussing, and petitioning. But this measure not only did not materially affect these constitutional rights, but it did not affect them at all. The great use and the decisive effect of petitioning had been mentioned. It had been said that the public opinion always ultimately prevailed, and several instances were cited when the expression of public opinion had effected a change in the opinion of parliament. But, he would ask, had this been accomplished by meetings held in the open air by persons who marched in martial array, with colours flying and inflammatory devices exhibited? Yet those meetings, which were characterised by such mischievous inventions, were the exclusive objects of this bill. When his noble friend brought in a bill which was supposed to be an infringement on the principles of the toleration act (though in his opinion the apprehension was unreasonable), petitions poured in from the dissenters throughout the country. There was not a parish, and scarcely a village, from which petitions had not been presented against the bill; yet not one of those petitions had come from a meeting in the open air. The dissenters, though they were as jealous of their liberties as any class of subjects, were not anxious for meetings in the open air. The abolition of the slave trade was in like manner effected by general and continued petitioning from all parts of the kingdom; yet not one petition had come from a meeting in the open air. The meetings, then, to be put down by this measure, were meetings which would only serve to counteract their own purpose. The effect of the bill therefore, would be, not to prevent, but to promote deliberation: not to prevent, but to promote petitioning. The effect would be to put down and to prevent those meetings only which were too large and too loose for any good purpose, and which were calculated only to create alarm, and to menace parliament with the show of physical force. In 1779 and 1780, many public meetings were held in this country; but not one of them was held in the open air. The meeting in Yorkshire in 1780, which agreed to a petition, to which 80,000 names were afterwards signed, had been a meeting of five or six hundred persons in a room. In fact, there was nothing prohibited by the provisions of this bill which the common law at present did not prohibit. A noble earl was mistaken when he supposed that at these county meetings magistrates had the power of seizing individuals or dispersing the meeting. This was only the case with respect to meetings called by notice. He certainly doubted whether, at any meeting even under the existing law, it would not be the duty of a magistrate who heard treasonable sentiments uttered to arrest the individual holding such language, and if obstructed, whether he had not the right to disperse the meeting by common law. This bill might be considered as a sort of memorial to magistrates for their instruction and guidance in the various circumstances in which they might be called on to watch or to prevent meetings. Under this measure, the poor of all descriptions were allowed to meet, but they were not allowed to meet in the open air; and they were secured from the intrusion of strangers. Therefore there was nothing in this bill which threw shackles upon the right of public deliberation, or upon the right of petitioning. They owed a duty to those who wished to petition, but they also owed a duty to the peaceable and industrious, who would be affected by the improper use of the right of petitioning. Let them look at what had taken place in London, in Manchester, in Glasgow; and let them say, whether public meetings, such as were to be prevented by the bill, were not great and dangerous evils. Was it no evil to Manchester to be kept in a state of alarm for weeks before such a meeting was to be held, and to require a constant military force for protection? He was therefore fully entitled to say not only that this measure did not shackle the right of deliberating and petitioning in the only way in which that right ought to be exercised; but that it gave additional value to the right, by securing it against gross and dangerous abuse.

The Marquis of Lansdowne allowed that the bill certainly came recommended by alterations in its character, which made it very different from its original form, and from the intentions of its authors. It came before them much less objectionable than it had come to the other House. In the opening speeches in that House, and in the other House, and in the original state of the bill, no limit to its duration was even once alluded to, and none of the exceptions which were now contained in the bill were admitted to be possible. Those alterations had removed many of his strongest objections, although he still felt great objections to the machinery which this bill would employ. He could not help expressing at the same time his satisfaction, and offering his congratulation, that important changes had also been made elsewhere in almost all the bills which had been under the consideration of their lordships—changes which had not been contemplated by their framers, and which were not admitted in that House to be compatible with their object. He cared not from what causes those changes had proceeded, but while the bills were in that House, why should their lordships have maintained that such changes were inconsistent with the grounds on which all the measures were brought forward? Their lordships had agreed, that unless a punishment due only to felons were assigned to persons a second time convicted of libel, seditious and blasphemous libels could not be put down, and all the enactments against them would be useless. Yet only a few days had passed, and they now found that punishment changed. The bill, with this odious and unjust punishment in its bosom, had made its way to the other House, and there it had received some sound and salutary changes. It would soon return to their lordships, when a noble duke upon the cross bench, who had expressed his conviction of the necessity of all the terms and clauses of all the bills brought in by his majesty's ministers, would be required to change his views and his praises of those measures, and to follow the meandering course which the bills were destined to run. This necessary accommodation would also, there was no doubt, be recommended to the noble duke by his majesty's ministers. He would not enter into the question of the nature and extent of the distress which existed in the country. His noble friend and the noble earl opposite had agreed on the point, that distress did prevail, and that the machinations of the evil designing had been successful principally by means of that distress. Those machinations, in truth, would have done nothing without the aid of the general distress. Distress was the lever which moved all the schemes and agitations so much feared. The noble earl had dwelt with great complacency, and seeming triumph, upon the admitted necessity of continuing the war at this and that particular period. But was that any defence of the commencement of the war? If a war wantonly begun, and unfortunately conducted for some time, should afterwards become necessary, in order to find the means of returning to a secure peace, were those who admitted the necessity of the continuance of the war to be precluded from censuring its unnecessary origin? He did not mean to give any opinion upon the necessity of the war, to which the noble earl had alluded; but he apprehended there were other causes than those resulting from a long and expensive war, connected with the policy of the present government, and sanctioned by that House, to which the distresses which prevailed were to be traced. Would not the noble lord admit the effect of the paper currency? If it were true that the effect of a paper currency was to give a different direction to the capital of the country, and that different direction had a more systematic effect in forcing the capital into new channels, thereby exciting an additional demand for labour, that demand creating in its turn an increased population, which were afterwards to be turned adrift, it was evident that the abandonment of that paper currency must, as a matter of course, become an additional cause of distress. He did not wish to go further into this subject. The noble earl had stated that he should feel a difficulty in granting any very large sum towards the relief of the manufacturing part of the country. He should not deal fairly with the House if he were not distinctly to say that the adoption of any such plan without due inquiry, would be impolitic. The House ought to have instituted an inquiry into the state of the country, and from that they could have been able to form a judgment whether, in point of fact, such a grant would be productive of any beneficial result. He was of opinion that if they should once commence a system of relief, and could not afterwards continue it permanently, they would leave the country in a more distressed situation than it was before. But when the noble earl referred to abstract principles of political economy, he only stated an additional ground for the appointment of a committee, for the purpose of seeing how far those principles were applicable to our situation, and whether any real relief could be extended to the people from their application. The question of distress, however, still remained undecided. The noble earl was of opinion, that it was through the existence of distress in a great measure that sedition and disaffection had been promoted; but he would ask whether the bill then before the House was in any respect calculated to diminish that distress? All it professed to do was, to close one vent through which discontent appeared; but whether it might not appear at another was left as a matter of speculation. On the subject of public meetings to the great and alarming extent to which they had lately been carried, he felt the same difficulties as many other noble lords who had given information on the subject to the House; and he was of opinion, as far as he could judge, from all he had heard and seen, that if it were not necessary to enact new laws, it was at least necessary to give a more distinct and efficacious character to the old laws on this subject. No less than six acts had been passed at different periods, and some so far back as Henry 4th, and Henry 8th, for regulating the duties of magistrates on the subject; but still there was a want of that perspicuity necessary to guide them in the correct exercise of their duties. That which he should propose, therefore, was, that those acts should be consolidated into one plain, distinct, and intelligible law, designating what was a legal and what was an illegal meeting, and pointing out to the magistrates the precise course which they were to pursue. Although he was ready to admit the right of every Englishman to meet for the purpose of petitioning, yet when those meetings assumed a character which threatened the peace of the neighbourhood he thought they ought to cease. The objection which he had to the present act was, that it imposed a duty upon magistrates not alone of the greatest difficulty; but a duty which was calculated to produce odium towards themselves and heart-burnings in the country. When their lordships observed the difficulty which juries laboured under, to decide what was sedition or not, they must easily perceive the still greater difficulty under which a magistrate would be placed by his being called on to decide at once in the midst of a numerous assembly what was seditious in any of the speeches which might be delivered. Rather than accede to such an invidious power, he would prefer that meetings were prohibited altogether. He must also say, that there was a most extraordinary provision in this bill, including Ireland in the sphere of its operation. This had been introduced into the bill in a way which he thought peculiarly whimsical. When the bill was first mentioned it was spoken of as a permanent measure for the improvement of the constitution of the country. Ireland was not then included [lord Liverpool here said, across the table, "always"]; but when a change took place, and its permanent operation was altered into a temporary existence of five years, then, for the first time, Ireland was spoken of; so that it would seem that Ireland was to be excluded from a participation in a permanent benefit to our constitution, while, when that benefit was to be only temporary, she was to be included. The noble earl, too, had given a singular reason for including Ireland. He said that it would be extraordinary indeed that Ireland should be omitted, when so many counties in England which were not disturbed came under the provisions of the bill. So that, because it was thought necessary to place restraints on the people of England, it followed as a matter of course, that the people of Ireland should, although perfectly peaceable, be subject to a similar measure. The obvious rule of legislature, which had subsisted since the union of Ireland, he understood to be, that St. George's channel created a distinct division in their internal management; and that where a law became necessary by circumstances for the preservation of the one, it did not follow that the same law should extend to the other. It might as well be said, if it were necessary to place

Ireland under restraints because the county of Down, which was perfectly peaceable, was included in these restraints, that England must be so likewise. He could not consent to Ireland being exposed to the operations of this bill, unless the same necessity was proved as in this country. It was admitted that Ireland was peaceable, but he supposed his majesty's ministers formed their judgment on the words of Dryden;

"Your tranquil looks deceive me not, good man ;

"I know you mean the murderous works you can."

Although Ireland held no meetings, and her aspect was perfectly serene, she must, because England was holding meetings in all directions, be subject to the same restrictions! The grounds shown even by the noble lords opposite, proved that no such radical meetings had been held in Ireland, and he should therefore hope some noble peer of that country would move in the committee, that Ireland should be omitted. In conclusion he observed, that he objected to the bill, because it did not profess to cure the distress, which, after all, was the cause of its necessity. It was not the miserable leader of the radicals, who was as desperate a character as he was contemptible in means, nor was it his wretched and misguided followers that they had occasion to fear; the real enemy and the real difficulty was the amount of the debt—and the fact, that while taxation was increasing, the revenue was diminishing, and the capital daily going out of the country. These were the grand levers of discontent and distress; and unless they were removed, discontent and distress must still exist. He would give his vote for the House going into a committee, from a hope that the machinery of the bill might there be improved; but he again must implore their lordships to recollect, that unless relief was afforded, discontent would prevail, notwithstanding all which might be expected from legislative measures. Succeed, perhaps, they might in suppressing disaffection in one place, but it would only be to witness its bursting out with increased violence in another.

The Earl of Blesington fully concurred in the observation of the noble marquis on the injustice of extending this bill to Ireland, and he should move in the committee that Ireland be left out. There was not the slightest ground whatever stated to the House for accusing Ireland of seditious and tumultuous practices, and for subjecting her to the infliction of the measure. He objected, however, generally to the principle of the bill, and should vote in favour of its being limited to the shortest time of duration.

Lord Holland said, he felt so much repugnance to the present bill, that he could not leave the House, notwithstanding "the overwhelming majority" with which it would, no doubt, be carried, without delivering his sentiments in a few words. He did not intend to divide the House, and should reserve the more detailed expression of his sentiments to a future occasion. He considered this bill as an unconstitutional, foolish, and mischievous measure; unconstitutional, because it went to fritter away the inherent right of Englishmen to meet and express their opinion, and to make the exercise of that right a crime punishable in the most ignominious manner; foolish, because it did not go to prevent tumultuous meetings, unless they met for discussion, as he would show when he came to consider the question more minutely, and therefore it did not prevent the evils it professed to destroy; and mischievous, because for the reasons stated by his noble friend it would convert open tumult into secret conspiracy, and would substitute for clamour and nonsense the dagger of the assassin.

Their lordships, without a division, resolved to go into a committee on the bill on Monday next. The earl of Carnarvon then moved, that the committee be instructed to limit the duration of the bill to the 1st day of July, 1822. The House divided: Contents, 20, Proxies, 18—38; Not Contents, 57, Proxies, 78—125: Majority against the motion, 97.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, December 17.

PENRYN BRIBERY BILL.] Sir Charles Burrell moved the order of the day, for receiving the report on the Penryn Bribery bill, with the view of postponing it to the 21st February next. This he did at the suggestion of several members, who wished him to wait till the Grampound bill came under the consideration of the House. He was not prepared to say that he had renounced his original intention with respect to Penryn; for in his opinion this case differed materially from that of Grampound. The district to which franchise was extended in the Penryn bill, contained a population of 20,000 souls. At the same time, however, he felt it his duty to comply with the request. He concluded with moving, that the report be received on Monday the 21st of February next.

Mr. Wynn agreed that an advantage would be derived from delaying the consideration of this case till after the discussion on the Grampound bill. The present bill was free from one material objection to the Grampound bill; namely, the proposition for giving to the unconvicted voters of Grampound votes for the county. If there was one part of our representation which ought to be more sacred than another, it was that of the representation of counties. The principle of the Grampound bill went to put another class of voters on an equality with freeholders. There were now three bills in the House relating to boroughs in the same county. In Wales, four or five boroughs all contributed (not by delegation, as in Scotland) to return one member. It might be possible, in like manner, to class together the unconvicted voters of the different boroughs of which the district would not be greater than one of those in Wales.

Sir C. Monck was happy, that in the projected alteration of the Penryn bill, the right to elect would be given to a district including such populous places as Falmouth and Penzance. There was no necessity for adhering rigorously to the same precedent, when the adherence would not be productive of the same benefit. He thought nothing could be more advisable than to deal with Penryn as boroughs under the same circumstances had been dealt with before. The imperfection in the manner in which they had hitherto proceeded with boroughs such as Penryn was, that in the hundred to which the franchise was extended, there were sometimes other boroughs, which by this means obtained a share in returning a number of members. Thus, for instance, Wooton Bassett, in the county of Wilts, was in the hundred to which the franchise of Cricklade was extended. A person inhabiting a freehold house in Wooton Bassett, had a vote for the two members of that borough, the two members for Cricklade, and the two members for the county, in all six members.

Mr. D. Gilbert observed, that in many of the boroughs the right of returning the members was vested in the corporation, which could take no part in returning members for the hundred.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow observed, that the circumstance of a person possessing a freehold in a town having a right to vote for both the town and county was by no means uncommon. If they acted, therefore, on the principle of excluding persons from a county vote, because he had already a vote in the hundred, the next step would be, to deprive those who had a vote in a town of their vote for the county. He protested against depriving any man of his franchise on speculative grounds. He was friendly to the principle adopted in the case of Shoreham.

The report was ordered to be received on Monday, the 21st February next, till which time the writ for the borough was suspended.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS BILL.] Lord Althorp brought in the Insolvent Debtors bill, and moved its first reading.

Mr. Calcraft wished to call the attention of the noble lord to a part of his speech on a former day, which, contrary to his intentions he was sure, had wounded the feelings of a most respectable individual, whom he had known for a number of years. He alluded to the late chief clerk of the Insolvent Debtors court.

Lord Althorp said, he was sorry that anything he had said should have wounded the feelings of the individual in question. He certainly did not intend to do so. In the course of the investigation before the committee nothing came out which would warrant any imputation against him. He had stated that he was glad that his majesty's ministers had removed every officer of the court, because from the manner in which the court had been conducted, it had lost the confidence of the public, and could not go on. In stating this, however, he did not intend to throw out any imputation against the individual in question.

The bill was then read a first time, and the second reading was fixed for the 16th of February.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order for the farther consideration of the report of the Newspaper Stamp Duties bill, for the purpose of re-committing it.

Mr. J. Smyth said, he had that day seen a great many persons connected with the book trade, who were of opinion that their interests would be much affected by this bill. He hoped the noble lord would therefore allow full time for the consideration of so important a measure. The booksellers, notwithstanding the alterations which had been made, were still in the greatest alarm. He was willing to believe that it was not the intention of the noble lord to affix a stamp duty to certain publications respecting which their apprehensions were excited, but the bill as now worded would have the effect of doing so. It would require a day or two at least to examine the bill to see in what way it would operate. He wished to know from the noble lord whether time would be granted for the proper examination of this bill?

Lord Castlereagh said, he would consent to have the bill re-committed on Monday next. He did not think it would be advisable to fix a later day, as it was desirable that a measure of the kind should be discussed with the fullest attendance. In the interval between this and Monday, the bill might undergo the examination which gentlemen wished.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, it appeared to him that this was by far the most important of all the measures proposed to parliament, principally when considered as the foundation of future legislation. He put it, therefore, to the noble lord, whether there was any necessity for pressing it forward at present. It seemed to him to require the most mature consideration.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the principle of the bill seemed to his majesty's ministers to be of great importance. So far he agreed with the hon. and learned gentleman; but he candidly confessed, that if some measures were not taken to deliver the country from the abuses of the press, he thought the consequences would be pregnant with danger and calamity. All the changes introduced consisted in mitigating and narrowing the operation of the measure. If gentlemen opposite objected to the details, they might be discussed on Monday, but he had hoped that the principle would be debated this night.

Mr. Brougham said, that the principle of the bill was so involved and mixed up with the details, that it was impossible to discuss the principle till the details of the arrangement were known.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that after the arrangements were agreed to in the committee on Monday, the discussion on the principle might take place.

Mr. Brougham hoped that between this and Monday such alterations might be devised as would secure the interests of this trade, not merely for the sake of the trade itself, but for the sake of the community. His objection was chiefly directed to the principle of resorting to stamp duties, not as a means of revenue, but of prohibition of publication.

The bill was ordered to be recommitted on Monday.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] The House having resolved itself into a committee of supply, to which the Army Estimates were referred,

Lord Palmerston said, that the House had seen the abstracts of the estimates on the table. It had not yet been in his power to make out the usual detailed estimates for the year. At present his object was merely to move a vote of certain sums on account. After the recess the detailed estimates should be laid before the House in the usual form. The sum now required was nearly one million and a half, which included the expenses incurred by the call of out-pensioners, and the forming of them into royal veteran battalions, up to Christmas. The noble lord then moved—"That it is the opinion of this committee that a sum not exceeding 900,000*l.* be granted to his majesty, towards defraying the charge of his majesty's land forces, for service at home and abroad, excepting the regiments employed in Ireland and the territorial possessions of the East India company, for the year 1820."

Mr. Calcraft said, he should not press the discussion of the subject against the wish of the House, but it did appear strange, that when 10 or 12,000 men were added to a standing army in time of peace, and that standing army too the largest that ever was known in the country at any similar time, the noble lord should pass it over as an ordinary matter of business which called for no explanation. Though he was not prepared, under all the circumstances of the country to say that he should peremptorily oppose the calling out of the pensioners, yet he thought it the duty of members, to awaken the jealousy of the country to such proceedings. He hardly knew, however, how to begin a discussion on which he should be ready to enter, as the noble lord had given no reasons for the vote. He saw too, among the votes, a sum for the military college. He, for one, should object to that vote at that moment, as the utility of that application of money was very questionable. He had rather that the noble lord should take a sum on account generally, without specifying particular heads, as parliament would then be pledged to no principle, except, perhaps, that of the increase of the army, by calling out the pensioners.

Lord Palmerston said, the House had at the beginning of the session been made acquainted with the increase of the army. He had proposed a vote generally for the service of one quarter; and he should have no objection to propose a vote for the whole on account, without specifying particular services, with the exception of that for the military college and asylum, which did not pass through the hands of the paymaster-general, and which it was from that reason necessary to have under a separate head. But if any gentleman wished to put an end to the military college, it would not certainly be proposed to abolish it before the 24th of March, and it was only till that time that the sum to be voted would supply the establishment. The expense of the college was less than it had been last year, as reductions were in progress. It would be desirable, too, that the measure of calling out the pensioners should be recognized by a vote.

Mr. Calcraft intimated that he should leave the subject for discussion at a future period.

Colonel Davies said, he had the strongest objections to the military college. He wished to know what the increase of 100,000*l.* on the charge for volunteer corps arose from? It was to be observed, that though not more than half the items of the estimates were brought forward, there was an increase on them of half a million beyond the last year.

Lord Palmerston said, the number of volunteer and yeomanry corps had been increased. The exact number he could not state, as the services of those corps were accepted, not by the War office, but by the home department. The increase on the estimates was merely on the volunteer service, and from the charges of calling out the pensioners.

Colonel Davies said, that after all the professions and pledges of economy and retrenchment which the House had heard last session from his majesty's ministers, he had hoped they would have made some sincere and effectual effort to redeem their promises. It now appeared that he had been deceived in such an expectation. He therefore embraced that occasion of giving notice, that he should on some night immediately after the recess, move for a committee to inquire into the whole of the army expenditure. In the state in which the country was placed, it was their duty to look to every possible means of lessening the public expenses.

The vote was then agreed to.

MISDEMEANORS BILL.] The report of this bill was brought up.

Lord Ebrington said, that as he had opposed all the other new measures which had been proposed to the House, he was glad to state that the clause in this bill which limited the time for prosecuting ex-officio informations, met with his warm approbation.

Mr. Denman said, he considered the bill as an improvement in the law of England. Though he was not desirous of clogging its progress by the addition of clauses, he should mention, that as the law now stood, every prosecutor on a misdemeanor had the power, without cause assigned, of removing the cause by certiorari to the King's-bench, by which process it often happened, that if the defendant was found guilty, he had to pay much more for expenses than any fine imposed on him by the court. Now, as the defendant was to be prohibited from removing the case, without showing cause, the prosecutor should in like manner be restrained. Unless some gentlemen of greater weight took the matter up, he should bring it before the House. He suggested too, that it would be an improvement on the bill if the certiorari was not to issue without a notice to the opposite party.

Mr. Bernal suggested that the officers of the Crown should, in the case of ex-officio information, be allowed to enter a nolle prosequi, without putting the defendant to the trouble of an application to the court.

Mr. G. Lamb said, that having originally put the question respecting the limiting of ex-officio informations, which had been so satisfactorily answered by the clause of the bill before them, he felt it his duty to state his approbation of the alteration which had been made. He trusted, too, that this would be sent out to the country as the only permanent measure, and that the other bills would be considered as medicines beneficial only for the moment.

The Attorney General inserted as an amendment after the words directing an application to the court, the words "free of all expense to the party applying." Mr. Denman said it had been doubted (though he believed it applied to Wales) whether it applied to that country. The Attorney General said it certainly did. The report was agreed to.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

SEDITIONOUS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] The House resolved itself into a committee on this bill. On the clause respecting the persons allowed to attend meetings, the earl of Lauderdale objected to the phrase, "usually residing," and moved to leave out the word "usually."

The Lord Chancellor observed, that the word was necessary, as by law a person might be an inhabitant of a place in certain cases without residence.

Lord Holland remarked upon the mischievous absurdity of the clause thus worded, which would exclude from attending the meeting, in many instances, persons possessed of property or interest in the parish in which the meeting was called, or subject them, for attending, to severe punishment.

Earl Grosvenor observed, that if this clause passed, it would be necessary to obtain an inspector of faces in every district, in order to ascertain those who had a right to attend meetings.

The Lord Chancellor expressed his surprise that the noble earl, who had such an aversion to sinecures, should desire the creation of a new sinecure.

Lord Erskine observed, that though this clause allowed freeholders, copyholders, and inhabitants, to attend these meetings, yet there were other persons who were not permitted—himself, for instance, who had a lease for 1,000 years, of about 1,000 acres, in one parish, where, nevertheless, he was not an inhabitant. He could not, under this bill attend any meeting in that parish, however much his interests might be connected with the object of it, because he did not come under any description of persons within the parish authorized to attend meetings. He objected, however, to the whole of the clause, conceiving that it only tended to irritate the public mind, whilst, in point of fact, it was unnecessary to the object which the framers of the bill had in view. There were provisions to prevent persons coming armed—to prevent military array—to prevent banners, &c.; and surely these provisions would be sufficient without enacting vexatious and irritating regulations as to the classes of persons who were to be authorized to attend public meetings.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the question for the House to consider was, whether they were seriously disposed to get rid of tumultuous and violent meetings. If so, they must adopt enactments similar to those proposed. Every man in the country had sufficient means of knowing the penalties that attached to a breach of the law, and therefore could not plead ignorance. It had been objected, that the clause as it now stood was made to apply to meetings respecting trade; but the reason of that was, that meetings in rooms, were allowed to take place free of the operation of the bill. Before this exception was admitted, it was thought right to make the restriction applicable only to meetings relative to church or state. With regard to meetings in the open air, there were only two ways of regulating them—either by limiting them as to numbers, or as to locality. The limitation of numbers was best; but that was found impracticable, and therefore the limitation of locality was adopted. County meetings called by the sheriffs or others having authority under the bill, were left untouched, though originally county meetings consisted only of freeholders. The meeting formed the county court. He knew that a different practice had grown up, and nothing in the bill was inimical to the continuance of that practice. With respect to parish meetings, the object of the bill was, to exclude all persons not inhabiting the parish, with the exception of freeholders and copyholders having property to a certain amount in the parish. He had no objection to state the ground on which this qualification had been introduced. There had been recent instances of persons having got colourable freeholds for the purpose of voting at elections. It was, therefore, thought right, in the concoction of this measure, to adopt some means of preventing that fraud by which persons who had nothing to do with a parish might be enabled to attend meetings. The property was therefore fixed at as low an amount as possible, with the view of the possession of it in the parish being readily known. He had no doubt that, when the bill came into operation, no difficulty in holding meetings would arise from this part of the clause.

The Marquis of Lansdowne wished to know why the privilege of attendance was given to freeholders of 50*l.* a year, and denied to persons of less property. This was making an unjust distinction, and was contrary to analogy with respect to the right of voting, as every freeholder having 40*s.* a year in property had that right. Every institution was liable to abuse; but if colourable freeholds were not a reason for interfering with the important right of 40*s.* freeholders voting for members of parliament, how could it be thought a sufficient ground for preventing their attendance at parish meetings? A principle sanctioned by the practice of ages was thus far done away by this bill. He should therefore move, that the words "fifty pounds" be omitted, in order to substitute "forty shillings."

The Earl of Liverpool, in reference to what the noble marquis had said on the subject of freeholders, observed, that if his object was to ascertain whether he did not think the practice of 40*s.* freeholders voting at elections an evil which might be corrected, he would answer in the affirmative. He certainly was not prepared to offer any proposition to parliament on the practice of voting for colourable freeholds, which had grown up contrary to the original intention of the law; but if any proposition on the subject came before parliament, it would receive his consideration. The case was, however, very different, when it was proposed, in legislating for a new object, to prevent assuming a right from colourable freeholds. That surely was a question fit for their lordships to entertain. The clause made no distinctions for persons resident in the parish, as they were all allowed to attend.

Earl Grosvenor allowed that the rich and poor, who were resident, were put on an equal footing; but a great distinction was made between the rich and the poor who were not resident. Their lordships should recollect that this bill was not giving a right, but taking it away. When all distinction was abandoned with respect to inhabitants, why should it exist for non-residents?

The Earl of Harrowby observed, that as the clause now stood, it would have the effect of preventing itinerant orators, and other persons who had no property in a parish, obtaining a colourable right to attend meetings.

Lord Holland could not agree with what the noble earl at the head of the treasury had said respecting county meetings. He believed that if the ancient history of such meetings were examined, it would be found that every man, whether freeholder, copyholder, or no holder at all, might attend them. It was true that if a meeting of freeholders only were called, others were excluded by the terms of the summons; but what he contended for was, that every man had a right to meet with those of his own class in county meetings, or some way or other, to consider of grievances and to petition. The noble earl had contended, that this bill did not take away the right, but only regulated it. It, however, did take away the right of meeting in parishes from all non-resident freeholders who had not property to the amount of 50*l.* a year. It was very much the custom with the supporters of measures like the present to attribute every evil to the French revolution; and yet what they pretended to correct were evils which never existed in the French revolution; and the remedy was one to which he believed the horrors of the French revolution were chiefly owing. There had been no great public meetings in France, but innumerable parish or small meetings. When their lordships came to another stage of the bill, he would show what mischief might be expected to arise from the division established between the poor and the rich, which must be the consequence of these parish meetings. He had no doubt that the effect of this invasion of the constitution would be to rob the people of England of the right of meeting. It had been said, that two objects had been entertained,—namely, to limit meetings as to number; and as to locality. The first object had been found impracticable, and he should be glad if the other also proved impracticable; for of this he was certain—that it could not be accomplished without trampling on the constitution.

The Earl of Harrowby contended, that not one individual in the whole country would be excluded from meeting by the bill. Could the noble baron show him a case in which such an exclusion would take place? It was true, that a small freeholder or copyholder could not meet in a parish of which he was not an inhabitant, but such a person must be an inhabitant of some parish or other, and he could meet with the people of that parish.

Lord Erskine would put a case, to show the hardship of the operation of the bill. Suppose that he was no freeholder, but lessee of a thousand acres of land for a thousand years, he could not meet in the parish where his property was chiefly situated, if not an inhabitant, though the meeting might be on a subject most important to his interests.

The Lord Chancellor said, that in that case his noble and learned friend might get some person to attend in his room.

Lord Erskine observed, the effect would be, that he could not attend a county meeting, because he was no freeholder; nor the parish meeting in which his property lay, because he was not an inhabitant. A noble countryman of his had been displeased with the manner in which his noble friend noticed what fell from him respecting the overwhelming majorities of that House; but the effect of those overwhelming majorities had been almost to overwhelm the vessel of the state. When a measure went out of that House with so powerful a gale, it appeared that it soon got aground, and, after undergoing repairs, came back to be examined in the dock again.

The question was put on the omission of the word "usual," and negatived. The marquis of Lansdowne then pressed his motion for omitting the words "fifty pounds," which was also negatived. On the clause relating to the punishment of persons assembled contrary to the act, and not dispersing after being required so to do by proclamation,

Lord Erskine objected to the severity of placing on the same footing with felons, persons who might not be aware of the act, and who might be innocent of any intention against the laws. He contended, that the effect of milder laws should be tried, before one so severe, and possibly so unjust, was resorted to. As for the argument, which denied the sufficiency of the present laws, there was no force in it. The only evidence which the House had to form their opinion on, was that contained in the papers on the table, and in those papers he could find no proof to countenance the belief that other laws were necessary than those at present in existence. From the wording of the clause as it stood, the penalty was not confined to itinerant agitators, but embraced the class of persons he had already described, and therefore he should move that the word "felony" be omitted.

The Earl of Liverpool referred to what had been done by the Whigs themselves in other cases of danger, and particularly to the Riot act passed in the reign of George the 1st. By that act the magistrate was empowered to read the proclamation in riotous meetings, or meetings disposed to riot, and all persons who remained after the expiration of an hour were subject to the penalty of death. The noble and learned lord must know that the greater part of the persons assembled on such occasions were attracted by idle curiosity, yet no exception was made, or could be made, in their favour. Such was the state of the law under the Riot act. But by the present act, if any person knowingly and wilfully attended such a meeting, and refused to depart on notification being made, he was only liable to transportation; and after all, the question must be tried before a jury, who would consider the case with all its circumstances, and determine accordingly upon his guilt or innocence.

Lord Ellenborough could not admit that the severity of one act was any justification for the severity of another.—A second objection which he had to the present measure was, that except the case was extremely strong they would find a great difficulty in getting a verdict, and it was of importance that they should avoid as much as possible the evil of driving juries to the alternative to which he alluded. Even if they should succeed in obtaining a verdict, it was a question whether any person could be found in the country, out of the immediate influence of the Secretary of state's office, who would agree to the justice of inflicting the penalty.

The Lord Chancellor maintained, that if the bill was not passed with the clause as it stood at present it would not be sufficient to the protection of his majesty's subjects. He might say, without being accused of a paradox, that the weakness of the law, with respect to the suppression of illegal assemblies, was found in the strength of the law; for if they looked to the ancient and statute law, they would find that the subsequent enactments were a mitigation of the existing law, which was found too strong for legislation. By the Riot act the meeting of only three persons might be considered a riotous assembly, and dealt with according to its provisions, and they would find in statutes of great antiquity that the magistrates had not only a power of putting down such meetings, but were liable to prosecution if they did not. The magistrates had a power to arrest all persons attending such meetings long before the reign of George the 1st; and in the posse comitatus, on which they had a right to call, he could prove, though it was generally represented otherwise, there was no distinction taken between peace officers and military assistants. If the persons assembled did not yield peaceably to arrest, bloodshed must ensue, for, which one party must be answerable and the other not. Under the Riot act it was a capital felony not to disperse, but there was a more summary way of proceeding. Such of their lordships as were prepared to maintain that the persons who knowingly attended such meetings ought not to be punished might vote with the noble lord; but he would ask what sort of an act would that be which declared that the refusal to depart after the proclamation should not be more severely punished than the mere circumstance of being present without a right? Upon this ground he should certainly object to the amendment.

Lord Holland assented to the observation of the noble and learned lord, that the strength of the law constituted, in many instances, its weakness, but he would have him to apply the argument to the present clause, in mitigation of its severity. To make the mere loitering of a person after the proclamation was made a felony liable to transportation, was a severity which must defeat itself. The noble earl had alluded to what the Whigs had done in former times; he professed himself to be as good a Whig as the noble earl, but he thought it was doing as much as could be required of him to defend the conduct of the Whigs with whom he had acted, without justifying the conduct of former Whigs, whose errors the noble earl never quoted except when he proposed to imitate them. But though the noble lord had alluded to the act of George the 1st, he confessed it after all to be a mitigation. For his own part, though he should never have selected it as a subject of praise, he could not but look to it with some favour as compared with the bill before the House. It referred to riotous assemblies, to assemblies that proceeded to a breach of the peace; but the present act empowered the magistrate to read the proclamation in assemblies where there was no tumult. The noble lords had spoken of attending knowingly and wilfully, but there were no such words in the bill applicable to the clause under consideration. It was to be wished that when the noble and learned lord looked back to see how laws became inefficacious by their severity, he had taken a lesson from the fact. The consequence of neglecting it was this, that when disturbances arose new laws were resorted to. The people were thus taught to look not to the laws, but to parliament, and finally to regard parliament not as their protectors but their taskmasters. The introduction of the word "felony" in the clause exposed the person transported, he believed, to greater severity than the mere sentence of transportation, it was therefore an aggravation of the punishment, and consequently required to be expunged.

Lord Erskine said, that on turning to the acts of past times, at the suggestion of the noble and learned lord, he could not help comparing the state of things at present with that which existed in the reign of George the 1st, when the Riot act was passed. That act was the offspring of disturbed times, and the object of it was not to prevent the abuse of a right, but to put down tumultuous meetings. His lordship then quoted the authority of lord chief justice Eyre, who had stated, that all men might and must reason on the constitution, particularly of their own government; from whence it seemed to follow, that human laws ought not to interfere with a view to prevent the declarations of such opinions in assemblies of men. The object of parliament ought to be to protect the people, and to conciliate those who were misled; and he agreed with a noble lord in thinking, that it would be difficult to find a jury who would bring in a verdict under the act as it stood at present.

The amendment was then negatived without a division, and the clause agreed to in its original shape. To the next clause, which declared the punishment of persons obstructing justice,

Lord Ellenborough wished the word "obstruct" to be more particularly defined; he should think that it would have been better to have specified a certain time, such as ten minutes during which the obstruction should continue, and the number of persons so obstructing should be declared to be three or four, either more or less. At present it was entirely left to the magistrate to put what construction he pleased upon it. He considered it also a very great hardship, that by the misbehaviour of a few, the subject should be deprived of that right of petitioning which he would otherwise have enjoyed. With the view of correcting this omission he should move the introduction of a clause to the effect of making it lawful for those justices of the peace who dispersed the meeting to authorize the re-assembling of that meeting within the space of forty-eight hours.

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the clause which the noble lord had objected to was the same verbatim as that which was introduced into the bill of 1796. He believed there was scarcely a word in the clause which was not already the common law of the land. As the law now stood, a magistrate had the power of taking into custody any person uttering words tending to degrade the government, and to disperse the meeting.

Lord Erskine denied that a magistrate, by the common law, was enabled to disperse the meeting, by the act of one man, who might be a spy employed for the occasion.

The clause was then agreed to, and lord Ellenborough proposed his new clause, authorizing magistrates to give their consent, in writing, for the re-assembling of the meeting so dispersed within the space of 48 hours. At the recommendation of lord Liverpool the amendment was postponed until the third reading of the bill, when it might be introduced, if approved of, by way of rider. To the next clause indemnifying justices in cases of killing and maiming, lord Holland contented himself with merely entering his protest against it. In the following clause, declaring that it should not be lawful for persons to attend meetings with arms, he moved that the word "bludgeon" should be omitted. The amendment was negatived. He then objected to the whole of the clause which deemed places for debates and lectures unlawful, unless previously licensed. There was nothing, he said, in the preamble of the bill, which authorized the introduction of this clause; but he supposed the admiration in which the noble earl held the act of 1796, induced him to bring it forward on the present occasion. The clause was ultimately agreed to.

The Marquis of Lansdowne in that clause of the bill excepting lectures delivered at the universities, &c., from the operation of the bill, wished to introduce an amendment. There were four principal institutions in the metropolis at which lectures were delivered occasionally—the London, the Royal, the Surrey, and the Russel institutions: the two former of these establishments were excepted; and he should propose to include the two latter in the exception.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that the objection he had to the proposition was single, but as he conceived decisive. The saving clause extended only to chartered institutions: and if the line were once broken through, there would be much difficulty in knowing where to stop. He reminded the noble marquis, that the institutions not excepted were only required to obtain a licence, which might be done at the small expense of one shilling.

Lord Holland denied that the payment of the shilling was the only inconvenience attendant upon the exclusion. The debates and lectures thus licensed would be constantly subject to the visits of the magistrates, who might make what remarks they pleased, however unpleasant; and who, without notice, might withdraw the licence at pleasure.

The amendment was negatived, and the clause agreed to. On the clause for the recovery of penalties,

The Earl of Blessington said, he should divide the House on the question of the measures being extended to Ireland. No information was laid before the Committee as to the state of that country, and the very terms of the preamble of the bill (stating that it was intended to prevent seditious meetings), evidently showed that it was not originally intended to have embraced Ireland within its operation. There was a peculiar division of counties in Ireland, not noticed in the bill, namely, baronies; and if Ireland was to be visited with the severities of such a measure, some attention should have been bestowed on its adaptation to that country. A degree of party spirit existed in Ireland, which could not be very easily put down, do what they would; but still the military power was very seldom called in to quell any partial disturbances it might occasion, while the present bill held out every encouragement for the military being more frequently employed. That of itself would make the bill objectionable to him; but it was rendered much more so, when he considered that the very objects against which it was directed, did not at all exist in that part of the empire. Many as were the grievances of the people, severe as were the hardships they endured, they had no tumultuous meetings, and they bore their privations without numerous assemblies to petition for their redress. It was urged that the bill did not mainly affect the Irish people, for they could meet in private rooms. But what private room could hold an aggregate meeting of the Roman Catholics? There was no ground before the committee to inflict such a measure upon Ireland.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the noble earl was mistaken if he thought Ireland was not originally intended to have been included in the bill. Although it originated in the other House he could state that fact upon his own knowledge. He understood it would not very materially affect that country; it would not go to alter any of the people's habits or feelings as to public meetings; for they were not in the practice of so holding them as the people of England had long been. The measure would go to the prevention of evil, and applied as forcibly to Ireland as to any of those counties in England which were not infected by the present contagion. The nature of the evils proposed to be remedied was, that they were very likely to spread, and if the bill were only to apply to particular districts, nothing was more certain than that those persons who made a trade of diffusing their prejudicial opinions would proceed to all places not included in the present measure. He conceived the bill as a favour to Ireland; inasmuch as it would prevent her from being visited by itinerant orators. There were old evils existing in Ireland which should not be increased by the danger of new evils, and it should not be forgotten that the leaders of the radicals in this country were in communication with the leaders of Ireland. He saw no inconvenience whatever in extending the bill to Ireland, but, on the contrary, as a measure of prevention, it was better to comprise Ireland within its operation now, than to wait perhaps until it became absolutely necessary, and then legislate in haste upon the subject.

The Earl of Darnley said, the communications alluded to by the noble earl, had been wholly unattended to in Ireland. The condition of that country was now extremely peaceable; and he thought she was entitled to an exemption from the operations of this bill, as an act of grace for her loyalty and tranquillity. The effect of such an exemption would be sensibly appreciated by that generous people.

The Earl of Blessington said, that the emissaries from Hunt and others sent to Ireland had totally failed in the object of their mission. When he considered how long Ireland had been neglected, misgoverned and ill-treated in almost every respect, he thought it too much to have her now told, because she was peaceable, because she was steady in her loyalty, that her only repayment would be a bill of pains and penalties.

The Earl of Donoughmore said, it would have been somewhat satisfactory to the committee if the noble earl opposite, in stating the communications made by the leaders here to the leaders in Ireland, had also added what he must have known to be the fact, that they proved totally abortive, and were received with contempt, nay, even with abhorrence. Was not that a strong argument why Ireland should be exempted from the operation of the bill? or did their lordships mean to give the people of that country the most gratuitous offence? Bills of the greatest severity had been hurried through both Houses in one night, and when they were directed exclusively against his unhappy country; but did the noble earl then say, that the contagion which they were to remedy, should also be guarded against in England, and that she should share in their inflictions? No; he did not then say, how easily the evils that existed in Ireland might travel to this country. Ireland then was to meet her own punishment for her own sins; but now that she sinned not, now even that her patience and her loyalty were so highly and so deservedly panegyrised, she was to be told, "you must share in the punishment of crimes of which it is admitted you had not been guilty." There were, no doubt, meetings in this country which every man could not approve; but in Ireland there were no meetings of a seditious, much less of a treasonable character. There were agitators in this country who made foolish speeches, to meetings more or less of a tumultuary character; but he believed their tendency to have been very much exaggerated. As far as dangers really existed, he had no objection to the enactment of sufficient measures to meet and to repress them, but he would proceed no farther; and if the committee stopped there, all would be right.

The Earl of Blesington said, he was about to ask a question which might appear of little consequence; but as the people of Ireland generally went to all public places, with a shillelah in their hands, he begged to ask the learned lord opposite if a shillelah was to be considered as a weapon.

The Lord Chancellor could not answer the question of the noble earl, but should rather apply to him for information on that subject.

The division was not pressed, and the clause was then agreed to. The Earl of Lauderdale objected to the wording of the clause as to the limitation of the period of the bill,—and moved, that it continue until the 1st of March, 1825, which was negatived without a division. The report of the committee was brought up, and agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PETITION OF THE BOOKSELLERS AGAINST THE NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] Mr. J. Smith presented a petition from a great number of the booksellers and publishers of London, on the subject of the new duties proposed to be raised on works of a particular size and description, to which he begged to call the particular attention of the House.—The petitioners stated, that they were in the constant habit of reprinting and publishing certain standard works in numbers, some of them only containing a sheet and a half, and having a most extensive circulation throughout the country, which, they feared, would from their size come under the operation of the bill before the House, if it was carried in its present form. He apprehended it was not the intention of ministers to pass any measure which would injure this trade; for he maintained that there was no trade in the country which contributed more to the improvement of the religious and moral habits and character of the people than this. They published works upon agriculture, commerce, history, divinity, astronomy, &c. in a cheaper manner, by which means these works came into the hands of those who would not be able to procure them, if printed together in large volumes; for it was a common practice for three or four in a family to join in subscribing for them in those small and cheap numbers. This was in itself a most important and valuable circumstance for the great body of the people, whose means did not allow them to buy such works altogether. But there was another circumstance to which he wished to call the attention of gentlemen opposite as he was sure it would be gratifying to them. It was this—that they published no work which had not a moral or religious tendency. No plan, he conceived, could be devised, better calculated to instil moral and industrious principles into the minds of the middle and lower classes, than this, of giving them the opportunity of purchasing such works on their own terms. They published no works of political matters, nor on the passing occurrences of the day; and they required from those who circulated their works that they should not sell political tracts or pamphlets, which bond they most rigidly enforced. The petitioners further stated, and he could prove it at the bar if necessary, that there was not less than 1,000,000*l.* of capital employed in this manner, which would in a great degree be rendered useless if the present bill passed. He contended, that if the House consented to let the bill pass in its present form, it would destroy the little reading in the country, inasmuch as it would cut off so fertile a source of the means of carrying it on;

and he was sure that if it passed, it would be found necessary to repeal part of it in the next session.

The petition was then brought up and read, setting forth,

"That the petitioners have observed with great alarm the provisions of a bill now under the consideration of the House, intitled, "A bill to make certain publications subject to the duties of stamps upon newspapers, and to restrain the abuses arising from the publication of blasphemous and seditious libels;" and that the petitioners do now, and for many years past have respectively carried on the trade of booksellers and publishers in the city of London and the vicinity thereof, and they have respectively very large capitals embarked in their respective trades, and a very considerable stock on hand of the value of very many thousand pounds each, and they apprehend and believe that such capital, and the value of such stock, if not totally destroyed, will be materially diminished by the provisions of the said bill, if the same should be passed into a law; and that the works published by the petitioners consist of standard works re-printed, and many of them stereotyped, at an enormous expense, and of new works upon history, divinity, the arts, sciences, and general literature, with a very large number of expensive copper-plate engravings belonging thereto; and that the same are divided into small parts or numbers, which are published separately, and not at stated periods, but at uncertain intervals, within the month, and four or five of such parts or numbers are usually published within that time; and that the works so published by the petitioners would not, by reason of their price, find purchasers if the same were published entire, or in any form or manner less adapted for general circulation than that used by the petitioners; and that none of such works, nor any works which now are or ever have been published by the petitioners are upon any subject of temporary politics, but all such works are of permanent interest, and are likely to be re-printed, and to continue on sale many years; and that each of such numbers contains generally one sheet and a half of paper (but in some cases, when accompanied with illustrative engravings, less than that quantity), and is stitched, and has a cover, either blank or printed, and in most cases an engraving or other plate in one of every two, three, or four numbers, and each number is sold at a price not less than six-pence; and that such works are divided and made up into numbers as they sell, or at the time of the demand for them, and not at any certain time, and in some cases years elapse before the entire impression is made up or sold; and that it would be impossible to print separate covers with the dates of publication without great additional expense, which would occasion an immense loss to the petitioners, and would materially injure, and probably altogether destroy their trade; and that it would also be impossible to print the price at which such numbers are to be sold, inasmuch as the same are circulated not only in Great Britain, but in Ireland and America, and the price thereof necessarily differs as well in amount as in the denomination of money, according to the place of sale; and that no work so published by the petitioners is contained in less than twelve such numbers, and several of them extend to two hundred numbers and upwards; and that the whole of each work (except cyclopædias and books of reference) is upon one subject, and not upon many different subjects; and that the allowance in price made by the petitioners to the distributors or retailers of such works does always exceed twenty per cent, and the same varies according as the mode of selling or retailing the same is more or less expensive, and from other considerations; and that the respective establishments of the petitioners give employment to many thousand persons as workmen and as circulators who have no other means of employ, and that the capital and trade of the petitioners would not only be destroyed by the said bill, if passed into a law, but the persons aforesaid would be thrown wholly out of employ, and would be reduced to utter distress and ruin; and that neither the petitioners, nor any of their workmen or distributors, nor any person by any means connected with their respective establishments, are, or ever have been engaged in the publication of any cheap or other works upon temporary politics or recent events; but in most instances the petitioners have required security by bond from the respective persons engaged by them not to circulate or sell any such political works, and every person detected or known to be engaged in the circulation or sale thereof has been invariably and immediately dismissed from the employment of the petitioners; and that most of the works published by the petitioners are of a directly religious and moral nature, and every one of them is of a moral tendency; and the petitioners respectfully state, that no plan is better calculated, or has been more effectual in the encouragement of regular habits, and in the discouragement of disaffection and irreligion among the poorer classes, than the system adopted by the petitioners, of supplying them upon their own demand, and at intervals suited to their own convenience, with religious and moral instruction; and that the petitioners have no doubt that capital to the amount of 1,000,000*l.* at least would be destroyed by the said bill, if passed into a law; they therefore humbly pray, That the said bill may not pass into a law, or that provision may be thereby made for the protection of the petitioners' trade and interest, and that they may be heard, by their counsel, agents, and witnesses, in relation to the matters aforesaid."

Petitions against the bill were also presented from the booksellers and publishers of Liverpool, Birmingham and Bristol.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a committee on this bill. On the question being put, that the Speaker do now leave the chair, Mr. Macdonald was about to address the House, when

Lord Castlereagh rose, and said, he had understood from what had been said on a former occasion by an hon. and learned gentleman, that no discussion was to take place on the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair, but that the principle of the bill was to be debated in the subsequent stage.

Mr. Brougham said he had been misunderstood. His meaning was, that they should debate the principle of the bill on the motion for the Speaker's leaving the chair, and afterwards go into its details in the committee; for it was clear that he never meant that both its principle and its details should be discussed in the committee.

Mr. Macdonald concurred with his hon. and learned friend in thinking this the proper stage for discussing the principle of the measure before the House; although the noble lord, after having taken credit to himself for granting a delay of three days, now wished them to go into the committee without saying one word on the principle of the measure. A more important measure, in his opinion, had been seldom submitted to the consideration of parliament. Its importance, indeed, was evident, from the nature of the petitions which had been presented to the House upon the subject, as well as from the character of the petitioners. Ample time ought indeed to be allowed for examining and deciding upon such a question as involved the liberty of the press—a privilege of such importance to the freedom of our constitution, as to deserve to be guarded with no less jealousy than the sacred right of meeting for the purpose of petitioning. This measure, however, with the other restrictive bills, was, it was said, brought forward in consequence of the supposed exigency of the case, and the alleged inefficiency of the law to meet that exigency. But in reply to this statement, he would ask where was the demonstration of any adequate attempt to try the efficacy of the laws to meet or repel the exigency said to exist, and such a demonstration or proof should be adduced, before the ministers of the Crown were warranted in calling for new restrictive laws? To the principle of both the bills before the House upon the subject of the Press, he entertained the strongest objection, as well to that which stood for a future day, as to that which was immediately under consideration. There were some parts of these bills which appeared to him totally unintelligible; but every part that was intelligible was objectionable. The principle of those bills went indeed far beyond any thing that had ever been attempted in the legislature of this country against the freedom of the subject, and the stability of the constitution. Nothing like it had ever been proposed, even during the existence of rebellion, or the prevalence of revolutionary doctrines. The measures, indeed, of the 38th of the king, involved a suspension of constitutional privileges; but then that suspension, which was deemed very strong at the time, fell very far short of the bills upon which he was animadverting. Yet the measures of the 38th of the king, which were only of temporary enactment, were found sufficient to carry the country through all the dangers belonging to commotion in our own dominions, and to the apprehensions created by that great modern convulsion, the revolution in France. With such evidence, then, of the efficacy of comparatively moderate measures, at a period of great and unexampled peril, upon what ground could ministers justify the introduction of such very strong measures as the present, under existing circumstances, when the whole world was in the enjoyment of profound peace, and when this country was, according to the language of ministers themselves, comparatively prosperous and happy? Yet, in such circumstances, ministers pressed the enactment of new laws to suppress irreligion and sedition, without showing that the present laws were inadequate. So that, after twenty-five years of war, during which the people had evinced the most exemplary patience and perseverance—during which they had contributed, by their industry, their wealth and their valour, to prevent defeat and disaster, and to enable the duke of Wellington, by his unprecedented victories, to bring the contest to a triumphant conclusion, they were to be told that the result of all the national glories must be to lead to an abridgment of their liberties! The people were told, forsooth, that within the last twenty years, during which they had been struggling to endure the calamities and to overcome the dangers of war, such an intensity of light (he believed it was so called), or so much knowledge, had been diffused among them, that it was necessary to deprive them of those constitutional rights, for the maintenance of which they had been induced so long to contend. By the advocates, however, for this deprivation, it was said that the object was only to take from the people a portion of their rights, in order to secure the remainder. But he would ask those advocates, when the bills before the House should be passed into law, what was the liberty that remained to Englishmen? Let these bills pass—let such measures be allowed to follow the war—and he had no hesitation in saying, that the people would look with loathing at the victories which had led to such results. Nay, the defeat of the very extraordinary individual, against whom this country had been contending for twenty years, after the policy of our government had created his power, could not be expected to afford much triumph to the people, if that defeat were to be followed by the abrogation of their liberties. For himself, indeed, he had no hesitation in saying, that which he firmly believed to be the sentiment of the great body of the people, that twenty such victories as that of Waterloo, glorious as that victory most assuredly was, could not compensate for the loss of one atom of our constitutional liberty [Hear, hear, hear!]. Victory was, indeed, only valuable as it served to consolidate our freedom. But the victories which signalized the war were only to be attained through the spirit which the love of freedom inspired. And what mainly promoted that noble feeling? The public press. What excited and enabled the country so much to go through the war, as the influence of those publications which the press sent forth, often perhaps exaggerated, with regard to the ambitious views and arbitrary proceedings of the ruler of France? What inspirited the people so much for active exertion, or filled them so much with heroic enthusiasm, as the contrast which the public press was almost daily making between the military despotism and warlike disposition of France, and the constitutional freedom and commercial habits of England? The services, indeed, rendered by the public press to the cause of the country throughout the late war, were scarcely calculable; and yet upon this press it was now proposed to impose a most galling chain. The nature of this imposition might easily be understood, upon a review of the two bills to which he referred. The first bill proposed a new Stamp duty, which, although so objectionable as to be deprecated by many respectable individuals connected with printing and book-selling, as appeared from the petitions on the table, was still less important than the propositions in the second bill. But with regard to the duty proposed in the first bill, this was, he apprehended, the first instance in the history of the country, that a tax was to be imposed for any other purpose than that of revenue. Here, however, the object was, to levy a tax upon any publication within the limit, as he understood, of three feet by two. But the proposition in the second bill, which was not then immediately under consideration, but to which he felt relevant on this occasion to refer, that recognizances should be entered into by certain publishers, was, in his opinion, peculiarly objectionable. For in this case men were to be called upon to enter into sureties to keep the peace, without having committed or manifested a disposition to commit any crime; and this was a principle quite new to the constitution and laws of England. The demand, indeed, to enter into sureties was itself a penalty, and a penalty never required by the practice of our law, unless a man were convicted of having actually violated the law, or were charged upon evidence with a disposition to commit such violation. That an Englishman should not be bound to enter into recognizances without having transgressed the law, or shown any intention to commit such transgression, was a primary elementary principle of the British constitution, which so long as any regard for that constitution remained, must be held sacred. He held it to be a primary principle of the English constitution, that an Englishman might publish whatever he pleased on his own responsibility; but now, for the first time, it was required of him to find others to share in this responsibility. While one spark of the spirit of liberty remained in the country, such a measure could not be tolerated. But unfortunately for the cause of liberty, an ultra Tory doctrine had of late obtained, of rather looking for principles of government to Rome, and that too during the sway of its emperors, than to the constitution of England. The lovers of this new doctrine must be prepared to make many more sacrifices of liberty, if they determined to take their rule of civil government from Rome and the Justinian code, rather than from the history of their own country. But to return to the question of sureties—it was peculiarly hard to call upon writers or publishers to enter into sureties not to write or publish any seditious libel, considering how vague and indefinite a thing was a libel. How could any man ask his friends to become bail for him upon such an occasion? Would not every gentleman who heard him, feel very reluctant to enter into security for any friend in such a case? And that reluctance which these gentlemen would feel themselves, they must think likely to be felt by others, especially as the character of a seditious libel always depended so much upon the times in which, or the tribunal before which it might happen to be tried. That publication, indeed, which at one time would be deemed laudable, might at another be denounced, and punished as a seditious libel, and with such uncertainty and fluctuation as to the nature of this offence, would it not be a great grievance to require from any writer or publisher the previous security alluded to? Great as might be the inconvenience and evil of this provision to printers and publishers, the greatest hardship would fall on authors; and among those who would be affected by it, he would take leave to say, were some of the most eminent writers of the age—men who, by their labours, had rendered important services to the constitution and the country. But independently of the hardship to individuals, the measure would be attended with important consequences to the community; for it was not to be supposed that any man would, after this, record the transactions of the day, unless he could afford to lock up 1,200*l.* By the proposition to which he objected, even a diurnal writer, before he could commence the printing of his work, must have sureties forthcoming to the amount of no less than 1,200*l.*; namely, 300*l.* for himself, with sureties from friends to the same amount, and also 300*l.* for his printer, with sureties of friends for him also to the extent of 300*l.* This arrangement involved so gross an invasion of the freedom of the press, that whatever might be the disposition of the noble lord, who had been so industrious in framing restrictions for popular freedom, both at home and abroad, he could not believe that a measure calculated to check the labours of literary men, would have the sanction of the right hon. gentleman who sat beside the noble lord, of whose literary talents there could be no doubt, whatever might be said of his politics, until he heard that right hon. gentleman actually declare in its favour. But these bills were altogether of such an odious character, he did not think it possible that the people would ever be reconciled to their existence, if their representatives in that House should be so indifferent to their interests and feeling, as to accede to their enactment. The House had heard that a censorship was once in contemplation. How far the question had been entertained, and why that measure had been rejected, he could not say; but this he would say, that these bills comprehended little less than an absolute censorship, and the worst and most contemptible species of censorship—that of money; which did not measure a man's intellect or his intentions, but his purse. According to them, it mattered nothing what were the principles, views, or talents of a writer. If he could not procure sureties to the amount of 1,200*l.*, this censorship would say "go about thy business, thou friendless pauper, thou art not qualified to become an instructor of the public," while to the rich author, however unprincipled in views or stupid in talent, this species of censorship would give every facility he desired for the publication of his crudities or the propagation of his errors, and would say to him "you are qualified to instruct the public, go you to the press." Thus the rich writer might mislead or impose upon the public judgment, while the poor would be precluded from contributing to its instruction or edification. The noble lord might hear from his right hon. friend beside him that there was such a thing as "the Republic of Letters," and his right hon. friend might also explain to him that this republic implied an arena in which all men were at liberty to display their talents upon a footing of perfect equality, at a tribunal of public taste and judgment, before which the qualities of the human mind were impartially tried and duly distinguished; and before which the meanest being on earth, if he was gifted with genius, might dissipate the halo of obscurity that enveloped his birth. But this republic, this impartial tribunal, for ascertaining and advancing merit, the noble lord by his measures proposed to overturn. Those measures would indeed serve in a great degree to establish an imprimatur on the press. What would Locke and Bacon, and other ornaments of English literature have said of this species of money censorship, which would preclude the poor from displaying their talents? Since the abolition of an actual censor upon the press in this country, the boast was that any man was at liberty to publish what he pleased, subject to subsequent responsibility; but in consequence of the provisions of this measure, the poor writer was excluded at once from publishing, by his inability to procure sureties. So that with regard to such a writer, this bill was to all intents and purposes worse than an imprimatur. Nothing then could be more baneful to the independence of literature and to the claims of genius than this obnoxious measure. But the proposition of such a measure was peculiarly objectionable at this period, when it was so much and so laudably the general object of the country to promote the education of the poor: for how absurd was it to take away from the poor the fair opportunity of displaying their talents or contributing to the information of their country, after they had been enabled and encouraged to exercise their minds? Such a proceeding was indeed like furnishing men with the material and forbidding them to use it. But he would ask, what was likely to have become of Dr. Johnson and many other essayists, who might be named, if a measure of this nature had been the law of the land in their day? For how many of these useful writers were notoriously without money or friends; and, to use a vulgar expression, merely lived from hand to mouth. But in our own days, how numerous as well as how useful were the tracts which would have been lost to the world if these bills had formed a part of the law of the land. He alluded especially to those tracts which had so materially contributed to promote the abolition of the slave trade. But we had also had various publications of great utility with respect to the poor laws, and to several interesting points of political economy, particularly upon the subject of the orders in council, some time ago, the appearance of which measures of this nature would have been calculated to prevent. There were also several publications upon the catholic question, which he knew had served very much to enlighten men's minds, that a law of this character would have operated to suppress. He might extend this remark to the question of the corn laws, and every other topic that came under discussion in that house; and he might ask the hon. members who heard him, if they had not had very valuable pamphlets on all these subjects put into their hands? It now only remained for him to make a few observations on that branch of the libel bill which inflicted a new and peculiar punishment for a second offence. To show what use might be made of this provision, it was only necessary to refer to the prosecution of Hone; but for a different purpose from that which induced other gentlemen to quote that case. He referred to the case of Mr. Hone, in order to illustrate the injustice of the proposed punishment; for as that gentleman had three indictments preferred against him at the same time, would it not have been cruel had he been subjected to the aggravated punishment upon a second conviction, merely because it pleased the Crown prosecutor to split the charges against him into different indictments? He also objected to the punishment, because it was novel in the history of this country. There was, he was aware, a law adopted in this country about 20 years ago, for subjecting a seditious libeller to transportation upon a second conviction; but then it was to be recollected, that that law, which was only of short duration, was never acted upon in any one instance. But he objected particularly to the penalty of banishment, because it was a punishment so very unequal in its nature. To those who had connexions, which rendered native home dear to man, it might prove a punishment almost as bad, if not worse than death; while to others differently circumstanced it might operate as no punishment whatever. Another country might indeed serve rather as an asylum to some persons. But, on the other hand, it should be remembered, that to banish a man for a political offence, while a certain understanding was known to exist among foreign nations, might tend to expose him to the cruel persecution of being hunted through the several countries of Europe. On these grounds, then, he strongly objected to the penalty of banishment. But why should it be supposed that it was necessary to impose any more severe punishment upon libellers than the law already authorized? For it was competent to the judges to inflict fine and indefinite imprisonment; and two years imprisonment was generally deemed a punishment severe enough for any offence of this nature. But he had no objection to distinguish between the punishment of a blasphemous and a seditious libel, and for this obvious reason, that the former was definite, that indeed it defined itself, while the latter was quite vague, being only defined as an offence "tending to," not intending "a breach of the peace." That was deemed sedition, too, which tended to bring either House of Parliament into contempt. But on this point he would ask whether it would be fair to punish that man for sedition who should repeat what had been uttered in that House itself a few nights ago upon the discussion of a partial plan of reform, and yet what was said on that occasion by his two noble friends as to the corrupt practices in returning members, certainly tended to bring the House into contempt. No one could, however, in fact, reason in support of that reform which was now generally desired by the country without some statement tending to bring that House into contempt. Would the House then consent to visit such reasoners with the proposed punishment? As to blasphemous libellers, he would again say, that their case was very different. But this was a crime so odious to the country, that no additional punishment was necessary for its suppression. Two or three examples, indeed, of such punishment as the law authorized, had, upon the appearance of blasphemous libelling, been always found sufficient to put it down. If the Crown lawyers, then, would do their duty, no apprehensions could be entertained that blasphemy would ever be able to raise its head in this country. But with respect to sedition, as that was indefinite, it never could be supposed that if a very aggravated punishment, hitherto unknown to our laws, were to follow conviction for such an offence, juries would be found very ready to convict. In such a case, indeed, unless the publication were obviously malignant and rancorous, he rather thought that such persons as generally composed English juries, would be very slow to concur with the views of Crown prosecutors, or even with those of the parliament or the government, where the object was, to subject the accused to a punishment of severity unprecedented in the history of the country, and inconsistent with the general principles of popular liberty. He would not deny that the low and grovelling part of the press had lately disgraced itself; but till the natural remedy had been put to the test of experiment, and had been proved ineffectual to check the evil, such laws as the present should not be proposed. He appealed with confidence to the feelings and judgment of the House, with regard to the services and value of the liberty of the press; he exhorted it to consider what good that great privilege of freemen had done, and what it was capable of doing, and not to allow its opinion to be influenced by the degrading conduct of the base part of the press; but to cling to that which was truly respectable, and cherish it with a scrupulous and religious care.

Mr. W. Dickinson denied that the law of libel was of that vague nature asserted by the hon. gentleman. If gentlemen considered the nature of a seditious libel, they would find that it had its origin in inveterate malice; and therefore, in such times as the present, it was necessary to apply an effectual check to the mischief. He thought that ministers would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, if they had not brought forward such measures as those which had formed the subject of the hon. gentleman's animadversion; for the publications which had of late deluged the country called loudly for correction and punishment. If, indeed, such publications were tolerated, there could be no security for the establishments of the country, either in church or state. But as to the punishment which the last speaker had so particularly deprecated, such punishment was not, he contended, inconsonant to the principles of the constitution, or unknown in the history of the country; and in support of that proposition he referred to the cases of bishop Atterbury and lord Clarendon. The punishment itself, however, it was to be recollected, it was discretionary in the judge to inflict, while it was competent to the clemency of the Crown to remit or mitigate that punishment in particular cases, or to the authority of parliament to interpose and solicit such remission or mitigation. He quoted the authority of lord Coke to show what had been the practice at common law with respect to the power of magistrates to search for libels, and to support the position, that the clause in one of the bills alluded to by the hon. gentleman, respecting the power of magistrates on this subject, was not unknown in the history of our constitution. He was aware that some of the precedents to which reference might be had on this topic, took place during the existence of the Star Chamber. But then, after the abolition of that court, some precedents had occurred of a similar nature. He had the authority of that great lawyer, statesman, and philosopher, chief justice Hales, that it was the spirit of the British constitution to accommodate itself to times and circumstances—it resembled, as it were, the skin of the human body, possessing a flexibility applicable to any state, whether of sound health or of alarming disease. The present measures he supported, because he considered them not as an infringement of the just rights and liberties of the subject, but as calculated to stem the current of anarchy and rebellion which had set with such great violence against the institutions of the country, and he trusted that that House would furnish an example of firmness by giving the peaceable and well-disposed that protection which they had a right to require.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow said, he was happy the hon. member who had just sat down had risen before him, and he begged leave to say that he entirely agreed in every word he had uttered. With respect to his hon. friend who had spoken previously with so much eloquence and ability, he thought he had taken a most erroneous view, not only of the principle, but of the enactments of this bill. His hon. friend had commented with great spirit upon the situation in which authors would be placed by this measure. For his own part he had not imagined that authors would be in the slightest degree affected by its enactments; but he would not trust to his memory, and had referred to the bill itself; and he could now say, that there was not one word which could bring an author under its operation. Was the author a printer or a publisher? Certainly not; and it was to printers and publishers alone that the act applied; and he desired to state, too, that those to whom the bill was principally applicable were obscure publishers, and not respectable booksellers. It was to men who, being urged on by the desire of gain, had no fear of imprisonment, and would publish any libel, however infamous. In another point to which his hon. friend had alluded, he was also incorrect; it was that in which he referred to the clause for imposing an additional punishment for the second offence. His hon. friend had adverted to the case of Mr. Hone, and had drawn an illustration from that trial to prove the hardship of the increased penalty on a second conviction. With respect to that trial, he never would, after the decision of a British jury, make any invidious comment, but he must be allowed to say, that the difficulties which had been thrown by it in the way of obtaining a verdict of guilty against blasphemous libels were much increased. His hon. friend had however argued as if this increased severity were to be applied in the event of two convictions immediately succeeding each other. That was not the case. The construction which he put on this part of the bill was, that it applied not to trials on separate indictments, progressively going on, but only to cases where a second conviction followed the punishment of an antecedent offence. If that were not the case, he would willingly subscribe to the observations of his hon. friend; but he believed, on looking to the clause, he would be found to be right. The punishment of banishment had also formed a conspicuous feature in his hon. friend's speech. It was for the purpose of suppressing the libellous publications of those who, in defiance of the law, were inve-

terately determined on the continuance of the offence, that the penalty of banishment was introduced. The principle of such a punishment was not new as had been argued; it was to be found in the ancient practice of the abjuration of the realm. But even if it were new, he should be disposed to prefer it far beyond transportation, because the latter punishment had hitherto been only applied to felonies; and he should have great difficulty in sending to the other side of the world, if not to slavery, to a certain degree of compulsory labour, an individual guilty of a comparatively venial offence. There were many offences to which transportation was now affixed, and to which banishment as a milder punishment would, in his judgment be beneficially applied. Banishment inflicted no stain on the connexions—it did not send a man to the other extremity of the globe to pass his life, not indeed as a slave, but deprived certainly of all free agency. In all legislative deliberations, the question turned upon the toleration of the greater or the lesser evil; and it was better that some individuals should be prevented from the prosecution of an employment, than that the country should continue longer exposed to the deliberate attempts made during the last 26 or 27 years to poison, by the most flagitious libels, the majority of the people, and thereby to occasion the most incalculable mischiefs. He was as warm a friend to the liberty of the press as any person, but he confessed he did not think these bills went in the slightest degree to infringe those liberties. These bills had been compared to a censorship; but he thought there was a wide difference between them and the measures described by Locke, and by Algernon Sydney. There was a wide difference between an imprimatur which went to prevent publication, and a decent check upon those works which might be published. He firmly believed that the great majority of the people were still sound; but at the same time, if effectual means were not taken to check the continuation of the existing abuses, it was impossible to anticipate the ill consequences which might result from them.

Mr. Macdonald explained. He had not made the assumption ascribed to him by the hon. and learned sergeant as to the authors; he had merely put a case in illustration of his argument.

Mr. J. R. S. Graham said, that at a season like the present, every thing should be done which was calculated to increase the public confidence in the House; but so far from this having been the case, in his humble opinion, they had either altogether lost that confidence or it was greatly on the decline. It was not for him to say that the present measures were inapplicable to the state of things which existed; it was enough that he should remind the House of the irritation which prevailed, and ask them whether there ever was a period in which they were called upon to exercise a more calm, deliberate, and sober judgment. What else could make the measures which were proposed effectual; or what else could justify the House in making a permanent alteration in the law of England, affecting one of the noblest institutions and best safeguards of the constitution? No man could detest more heartily than he did the blasphemous and seditious libels which of late had issued from the press; they were loathsome and nauseous, and he regretted the fatal effects which they were calculated to have upon the public mind. He detested them first for the wickedness of the purpose, and he detested them the more, because he well knew that a flagrant abuse of a right on the part of the people, was too frequently the first cause of tyranny in rulers, and the best pretext for the introduction of coercive measures. Those friends were the worst friends of the people, who for the sake of base lucre would rob them of the consolations of religion, who would subvert all order and wade through bloodshed to the enjoyment of precarious power; and who at the same time furnished the enemies of a free constitution with an excuse for its violation. But on the other hand it was the paramount duty of that House, as the constituted guardians of the public weal, not to permit itself to be hurried away by the influence of alarm or temporary irritation, to the adoption of permanent measures of coercion, hostile to the spirit and practice of the constitution which it professed to uphold. He confessed he could not help revolting at the practice which he had so repeatedly observed on the part of the Crown, to exaggerate alarm and to enhance the character of difficulties, merely for the purpose of creating a pretext for pulling down those institutions which our ancestors had raised, and for abridging those liberties which were due to the labours of the people in early times.

He was not disposed to attribute bad motives to the ministers of the Crown, but he could not help observing, what the circumstances fully justified, that it looked as if it were the object of those ministers to produce, by its impunity towards flagitious libellers, an ill feeling towards the freedom of the press, in order to secure its permanent abridgment—permanent he would say, for privileges taken from the people were neither easily nor peaceably recovered. He had ever been taught to consider, in times of domestic irritation, that moderation in the deliberations of the legislature was its true duty, and safest course. He had the sanction of Mr. Hume for that opinion, when he stated, that nothing but its own zeal could overturn established authority, as its over-acted zeal was certain to produce a similar feeling on its opponent. Though he deeply deplored the recent violence of the people in different parts of England; yet, on the other hand, he was not exclusively jealous of the danger proceeding from that source. He viewed with equal suspicion the conduct of government and the steps which they were taking, by the adoption of coercive measures, to suppress those liberties to the enjoyment of which the people were justly entitled. Upon these general grounds he was led to express his alarm at the system which was pursuing, and to state how unwilling he was to consent to any alteration in the law of the land which tended to abridge the liberty of the subject. He would now explain the particular reasons which induced him to be hostile to the bills immediately before the House. He thought it unnecessary to make any observations as to the known advantages of the liberty of the press, or as to its being the palladium of freedom, and a tower of strength to resist military force or despotic ambition. The force of these truths time had, it might be supposed, already impressed conviction on the mind of every man. But it was not when the enemy was before the gate, and ready to possess himself of the strong hold, that such a general declamation ought to be applied. He most solemnly believed, that the present measures went directly to violate that hitherto sacred privilege, the freedom of the press. By that privilege every man possessed the right to publish what he pleased, without any restraint previous to publication. After publication, he possessed the right, if charged with a libel, of having that question, both as to the law and the fact, ascertained by a jury. These might be considered the abstract rights of a publisher; and, in the best times of our history a disposition prevailed to interpose strong preventatives against the abuse, without an infringement of the principle of the privilege. At various times, no small degree of ingenuity had been exercised for the purpose of making that abuse the ground of depriving the people of the right altogether. The law of England was on this head sufficiently severe; for it not only imposed, in cases of conviction, fine and imprisonment without limitation, but it also left in the discretion of the judges the power of calling for recognizances, even, as had been seen in a recent case, during the life of the offender. A criminal prosecution was not held as a justification, nor admitted as evidence in extenuation; and until of late the attorney-general had the power of holding a prosecution over the head of a publisher, in terrorem, for an indefinite period. These powers he really thought quite adequate to the suppression of every offence which might be committed. Various new powers had, however, been required. The first of these was an increase of punishment after the second conviction; the second, that after convictions, a power should exist for searching for libels; then there was a stamp-duty upon all small publications; and above all it was required, prior to publication that persons intending to publish should enter into personal recognizances, and find sureties for the payment of any fine which might be imposed upon them. With regard to the first point, he should only repeat the observation, that the law as it existed was sufficiently severe in itself, without any addition whatever. In fact, it never had been exercised to the extent of which it was capable. It appeared to him that the additional punishment for the second offence would only tend to create a difficulty in obtaining a verdict for the first; and though banishment might have been very good in the time of the Star-chamber and the Stuarts, he did not think it applicable to the present times, and he trusted they would never live to see its re-establishment. It was a punishment which in Scotland had been called into action; and during an unhappy period, it had also been known in Ireland; but, since the Revolution, it had been unknown to the law of England. The hon. and learned gentleman had spoken of banishment as being more mild than transportation. To rich offenders it might be so, but to a poor man, he thought it would be the reverse; because, if transported, his expenses would be paid to the place of his destination by government, and when he arrived there he would be sustained by the same means; whereas, if he were banished to a foreign shore, he must either continue to libel his country to obtain bread, or die a disgrace to his country for the want of bread. The experiment of enacting transportation for three years for such offences, he believed, had been tried; but not a single individual had been condemned to that penalty. With regard to the right of searching for libels, he thought this involved a power pregnant with the greatest hardship. The search was not to be confined to the libeller alone, but by an order of the court, it might be extended to any other person, whose drawers and papers might be ransacked in search of a squib, or a newspaper, or a pamphlet, which might have been pronounced a libel: that was to say, every printer and publisher in England was liable to an arbitrary order of a court of justice, and to an inquisitorial power to search his premises and papers upon the most trifling grounds. It was impossible to view this clause without feelings of the strongest disgust. Upon the subject of the third point, he saw nothing against the principle of imposing a stamp-duty upon the sort of publications which had been described; but he did think such a measure would be found to have a disadvantageous effect; for while, as he admitted, it would lessen the circulation of pernicious works, it would also suppress many publications of the most beneficial character. The most obnoxious of all these powers, however, and that to which he had the strongest objection, was that which called upon the publisher to enter into recognizances, and to find sureties for his ability to pay any fine to which he might become liable. He did conceive that this power was subversive of every principle of the constitution, because it amounted to nothing less than a restriction before the printing took place. It was, in fact, a species of censorship, which, if adopted, must tend to destroy that liberty of the press, the preservation of which had hitherto been considered the great bulwark of our liberties. It was a dangerous precedent, against which it was impossible too forc-

bly to contend. The principal defence which had been set up in favour of these measures was their necessity. Necessity, he thought, was a very doubtful plea, which ought not to be allowed, at least without the most serious deliberation. Why, he would ask, had not the existing laws been acted upon? Why were not the powers which those laws gave applied to the evils which had been stated to prevail to an alarming extent? Before any new powers were granted, he thought it was the duty of the House to see that the old ones were insufficient for the purposes of public justice. In 1818 not a single prosecution had been instituted by his majesty's attorney-general; and in 1819 only one person had been brought to trial, and that individual who had been so brought to trial had been severely punished. During the whole of this period, blasphemous libels upon blasphemous libels, seditious libels upon seditious libels, had been published in rapid succession, and yet no step had been taken to suppress them. To what was this apparent want of energy to be ascribed? It was not difficult to trace it to its true source. It was thought convenient to bring the liberty of the press into disrepute, in order that by its frequent abuse it might be put down altogether. He had heard also of improper prejudices being excited against these measures. He denied that any such improper prejudice had influenced his mind; he was decidedly against any permanent alteration in the law of England in the most trivial particular, and above all against an alteration in one of the most essential parts of our constitution. For these reasons, so imperfectly stated, he should feel it his duty to vote against the further progress of these bills.

Mr. Marryat observed, that the arguments urged in favour of the bill sent down from the House of Lords (which was so connected with their own bill that it was difficult to keep them separate in the present discussion), were of a very curious and extraordinary nature. The hon. member for Somersetshire supported it, because it did not affect the trial by jury; and by a parody of reasoning, if a bill was brought in affecting the trial by jury, he might support that, because it did not touch the liberty of the press. He considered the trial by jury, and the liberty of the press, as the great bulwarks of British liberty, and therefore would maintain both. An hon. and learned gentleman below him, had commended the bill, because it imposed what he called "decent shackles" on the liberty of the press. Those who imposed shackles might perhaps consider them decent; but what do those think who are to wear them? The question was answered by the numerous petitions against the bill which lay on the table of the House. The learned sergeant further approved of the bill, because it did not touch the author of a libel. Now, this was, in his opinion, the strongest objection to it, because it thus inflicted pains and penalties on the wrong party; it subjected the printer and publisher to the vengeance of the law, while it permitted the author, who sat down wilfully and deliberately to the composition of the libel, to escape with impunity. It punished the uncouscious and innocent instrument, while the guilty principal was unnoticed. Such a law appeared to him not only repugnant to reason and justice, but contrary to the established usage and custom of the House. No longer ago than last week, complaint being made of a libel as a breach of privilege, the printer was summoned to the bar, and on giving up the name of the author, was immediately suffered to go free, and the author incarcerated under the Speaker's warrant, issued in conformity to the order of the House. The clauses in the same bill which subject printers and publishers of libels to transportation for a second offence, and if they return before the time is expired, to death itself, make no distinction between an unintentional error and a wilful crime; and were framed in so revolting a spirit of severity and injustice, that he could not give them his support. He was far from saying that this bill contained no provisions of which he approved. The clauses which authorize the seizure of libels after the conviction of the publisher, appeared to him extremely proper, and might, with great propriety, be introduced into the bill for restraining the abuses arising from the publication of blasphemous and seditious libels, which originated in their own House, and which, to use the words of the learned sergeant, to whom he had before alluded, imposed much more "decent shackles" upon the liberty of the press. In his view of the subject, the House ought to adopt this mode of proceeding, and show their reprehension of the outrageous clauses contained in the bill on which he was animadverting, by throwing it out on the second reading.

Mr. Denman said, he could not suffer this bill, which formed a branch of that system of coercion which had been adopted by his majesty's ministers, to pass, without calling upon those who had already done much towards the promotion of the system to which he alluded, not now to do that which would have a tendency to change the whole system of the law of the press of England. If any thing could increase his repugnance to the proposed bills, and to the pretexts under which they had been introduced by their authors, it was to find them defended by such men as the hon. member for Somersetshire, and his hon. and learned friend, gentlemen who were considered under the denomination of impartial, and as holding the balance between the two great parties who divided that House. If that was the course such men intended to pursue, and on such grounds as they professed, it were better that the popular branch of the government should abdicate its functions, and leave the interests of the constituency at once to the mercy of the ministers of the Crown. In all the former measures that were discussed, it was both degrading and mortifying, when so much stress was laid upon shadows, and such a disregard of principle, to see that body, which was called the House of Commons, holding no one principle in common with the great mass of the people of this country. It appeared to him that the two bills before the House, although different in their object, were yet the same in spirit. He should, however, consider them separately; and at present should confine himself as much as possible to that before the House. The present subject for their consideration was the Stamp Duty bill. The principle of this bill, he contended, was altogether new, and had the direct tendency of an imprimatur. He entreated gentlemen not to allow themselves to be persuaded that this enactment would do but little. He saw throughout the whole course of the measure, while it would be ineffectual in its operation, it would be mischievous and oppressive to individuals. He alluded particularly to those shackles which it would impose upon respectable booksellers (shackles which could never have entered their contemplation when they engaged in that profession) by calling upon them to enter into recognizances of 300*l.* in London, and 200*l.* in the country, before they could commence business. This principle, if once recognized by parliament, would only be the prelude to harsher and more severe measures—extended from time to time, until the right became altogether extinguished. The more respectable and wealthy part of the booksellers might not feel them; but they were decidedly injurious to the industrious and less wealthy. Another clause to which he thought there was also infinite objection, and from which there was every reason to apprehend danger from its abuse, was that which gave to a single justice of the peace the power of determining what were the offences proscribed by the act; as well as the violent, arbitrary, and unprecedented power of levying a fine at his discretion, and searching the House for copies of libellous publications. Why, the magistracy of the country were already encumbered with the duties imposed upon them by specific provisions in this new series of legislation. If, in addition to these they were called upon to search for arms by night, upon informations which might be laid before them, to attend public meetings with an armed levy by day, and not alone to impose fines which might be incurred under the Stamp act, but also to search for and secure copies of those works which might be characterised as libels, he would only ask, whether for the performance of these multifarious duties they would not require a salary? What would then become of the panegyrics upon the unpaid magistracy of England? Was there any man or order of men who would gratuitously give up their time, and submit to the shackles which these duties would impose? It was true that they might receive additional power; but would this compensate for the odium which they would incur in carrying these acts into effect? But if it were alone because these bills extended the power of magistrates, he thought they ought not to pass. Let the House, and particularly those gentlemen, who from a strong feeling of the extent of the public irritation, had supported ministers in passing these alarming restrictions on the liberties of the people, consider whether they had not already approached the limits of confidence—let them reflect on what they had already surrendered to the Crown. They had already given up the right of search into houses in words so large, vague, and indefinite, that any man could construe them as he wished. This alarming infringement was to be acted upon in seventeen counties on the oath of a single informer. They had abridged the right of petition, so as to leave but the shadow of that right. They were now, in terms at least, as vague as those in which the former measures were couched, increasing the penalties of the law in cases of libel, though the existing law, when acted upon by the law officers of the Crown, was found fully adequate to its objects. In 1819, Mr. Carlile, after the continued publication of blasphemous libels, was at length brought to trial, and the verdict of his jury vindicated the efficiency of the law. How, then, could it be said, that after the acquittal of Mr. Hone no jury could be found to execute it? But upon what grounds was the assertion made? What man of common sense who did not see the distinction between the two cases? What man of common feeling would argue that, taking the nature of the offences imputed to each because Mr. Hone was acquitted Mr. Carlile would not be convicted? If, however, there existed heretofore any doubt, they had now the authority of juries that the publication of blasphemy was against the law, and would, when prosecuted, be put down by their verdicts. The court of King's-bench had conducted itself as was befitting the first court of jurisdiction in the country.—If, indeed, in these times the sinking liberties of the country had any stay, it was in the dignified sense of duty which characterised its superior courts of law. He regretted he could not speak thus of the magistrates. If ever there was one time in which the judges of the land deserved its highest approbation, it was from their conduct within the last two months: while within the interval of the last three months the magistrates did every thing but their duty. He had no doubt that they lent themselves to the views of the government, and acted upon its orders. Was not this violation of duty to be seen in the first step of their inverted career, when they dispersed a peaceable meeting by military execution? Was it not to be traced in the thanks, on the part of ministers, which followed the violation of duty on that painful day? It was a mockery to desire the aggrieved to apply to grand juries or to legal process, when the constitution had to be vindicated. If the magistrates of Manchester acted, as he thought was undeniable, under the orders of the ministers, they ought to be removed, and the head of the home department ought to be impeached, setting aside altogether the legality or illegality of the conduct of the meeting at Manchester. But, adverting to the present bill, would any man say that there ever was an instance in the legal History of England where previous security was demanded in a case of that description? An hon. member had referred to cases of excise, where security had been given for the payment of duties and fines that might be incurred. Could such examples bear the remotest analogy to the exercise of the right of free discussion? The hon. member had referred also to the period of the Star Chamber, and the reign of Charles 2nd. It was right in those who supported such measures to look to such precedents, for they were measures that led directly to the return of such times. But it should be recollected that the Licensing act expired in the 5th William 3rd, and except a short revival shortly after, had never been renewed until the present day. The shape it now assumed was an anomaly in our law; it could not be called imprimatur; but as directed against the person, and not the work, it was an imprimat. If it was not enough to excite the jealousy of the House of Commons, to say the principle was entirely new in our law, he was ready to admit he had no other topic on which to address them—he had no precedents to which he could apply. He should not enter into the other act of parliament for the present, except to negative the assertion in the preamble. In the preamble it was stated, that the laws were insufficient to suppress blasphemous and seditious libels. This he totally denied, for he believed the law was perfectly sufficient. The case of Carlile was demonstrative of this assertion. Had those laws been put in force, he had no doubt all necessity for applying to parliament on this subject would have been obviated; but in 1818 not a single information was filed; while, in 1819, when a great variety of charges were exhibited against Carlile, he was convicted, and was now imprisoned in Dorchester-gaol, where, at least during the term of his imprisonment, he would have no opportunity of repeating his offence. The whole of the new class of measures proceeded on the erroneous principle of meeting the public mischief. That was the great mistake. They were of sovereign efficacy in alienating the minds of the sound and the enlightened, but with respect to the suppression of the abuse, more inefficient means could not be devised by the most absurd dabbler in legislation. Again he conjured the House, and particularly those who gave confidence to the ministers, under the influence of the public alarm, to pause, and to reflect on what they had already gained at the expense of the constitution. They might, it was true, bring to the decision the same overwhelming majorities; but let them recollect, that their numbers did not change the character of events—they might push that confidence to the extremity of alienating from the government the respectable, the neutral, and even the timid, who, awakened from their alarm, could not approve of this great permanent change of the law. But severe as it was, it would not have the effect of effecting that which its proposers contemplated, unless they put a dagger to the throat and wrested the pen from the hand of those who could write. Did the infliction of the punishment of banishment in France, from whence the principle had been taken, stop the publication of the pamphlets against which the punishment was devised? They were smuggled into France in defiance of the law, and contributed more than any other publications to the successful progress of the revolution. Did those who supported the present bill imagine that these libels would not be published at some neighbouring part of the continent, from whence, at a less expense of printing and paper, they would be introduced into this country with all the additional merit of the martyrdom incurred, and with all that demand from curiosity, which was certain to procure it a market? He again conjured those hon. members who had hitherto voted for the measures which had been introduced, to consider whether they had not done enough, and whether every step they were taking, they were not plunging deeper into difficulties, and separating the great mass of the people from that community of interest which ought at all times to subsist between them and their representatives.

Mr. Dickinson, in explanation, denied having made any allusion to the proceedings of the Star Chamber in the observations which he had felt it his duty to submit to the House.

Mr. Bankes was most anxious to express his opinion upon the subject under consideration. An hon. and learned gentleman had called upon those who were not particularly or more immediately attached to administration and their measures, to say whether that House had not done enough? He would, for one, answer him: he would say, that the measures which they had already passed were such as were calculated to secure the tranquillity and peace of the country. But he thought also, that their work would be incomplete and insufficient, if they stopped here. In his opinion, much remained to be done. The measures which had been already passed were indeed, in his opinion, essential to the maintenance of our liberties, and to the salvation of the state. But he declared, that the mischiefs against which they had been before guarding, appeared to him comparatively unimportant; and that they were now dealing with that which was the main-spring of all the evil; which, if they neglected to regulate, they left a mine which was working gradually and surely, and which would in time blow up both the government and the constitution of the country. They could not stop where they were. It appeared to him that the abuses of the press had grown up so as to create a monstrous degree of mischief, and such a state of danger and alarm, as to call for the instant interference of the House. Those who spoke of the freedom of the press, as now conducted, as being so necessary to the conservation of the public spirit, the happiness, and prosperity of this country, seemed to him to take an erroneous view of the subject. They argued from the effects of the press at former periods; but the press of former times was not like the press of the present day. Those hon. gentlemen who talked of a free constitution, and referred to those elementary writers upon the constitution, who had been quoted as affirming the necessity of upholding it in the same form as it had existed before them, forgot that there was no sort of parallel between the times when those elementary and accredited writers had delivered their opinions, and the present. Mr. Justice Blackstone, among other authors, had spoken of a free press with a warmth and energy which became a constitutional lawyer; but he would venture to state that Mr. Justice Blackstone never could have contemplated the increase of the tracts and publications of that nature which they were now called upon principally to consider. Those who had lived previous to the French revolution, must recollect how very limited were the number of newspapers compared with the present day. At no very distant period there was only one daily paper, and as to tracts of that mischievous tendency with which the country had been deluged, nothing of the kind was known. The facility with which newspapers were circulated through the medium of the post, was also of modern introduction. When all these things were considered, the House would perceive that the state of the press as regarded the increase and spread of every kind of tracts could never have been imagined 50 or 60 years ago—the time at which such opinions upon the constitution as the hon. and learned gentleman had alluded to had been promulgated. Among the other excellencies of that constitution, it had ever been considered one of the foremost, that as political offences or evils arose, it provided a remedy for each of them, without investing the executive with new powers, but by the adoption of a prescribed and regular course. But had this not been the case, and had the present evil required some new method of legislation, he really thought the danger so extreme at the present moment, that he would have voted for it. He would proceed to show by historical references, that the press had at former periods, for a considerable series of years, been under far more arbitrary restrictions than those suggested by the present measure. He totally denied the doctrine that the press of this country had ever been wholly free and unquestioned. It first issued, as he might say, under the authority of the Crown; it existed as from the Crown; it was the creature and engine of the Crown. Till the time of Charles 1st the press was regulated by the Star Chamber. The odious judicature of the Star Chamber was abolished, together with the other public grievances, previous to the Commonwealth; but a very slight alleviation of the rigours which it exercised was allowed the subject, and that was done afterwards which is usually done by usurping governments—the republicans re-established the regulations with regard to the press, and in 1637, placed it on exactly the same footing on which it had stood four years before, and according to the Star Chamber decree. On the Restoration, it was found necessary to adopt some measures to prevent the dissemination of seditious and irreligious works, to the production of which such excitement had been given by the recent violent changes in church and state; and not long after the return of Charles 2nd a statute was passed, founded on the parliamentary ordinances, and ultimately the decree of the Star Chamber before referred to. It was revived once more, and all this which was supposed to be so fundamental an article in our rights, without which our liberties could not exist, and which was said to be the most precious part of our freedom, was placed under the ancient restraints. The 1st of James 2nd, established very much the same as the former ordinances of parliament, which, as he had already said, were founded upon the regulations of the Star Chamber. Now, how stood the matter in the bill of rights? One would naturally have expected, that if the unrestrained freedom of the press formed so essential a part of those liberties which were confirmed by the bill of rights, we should find the freedom of the press recognized in the very front of them. But there was not one word to be found about it in that bill. In the thirteen articles of which it consisted, every grievance, as it was well known, was mentioned in an open and explicit manner, in order to its redress; but the freedom of the press was not noticed as being aggrieved by the existing law. He should take the liberty of telling the hon. and learned gentleman how the matter stood. Four or five years before the end of the reign of Charles 2nd it did so happen that the act for the regulation of the press expired, and was not re-enacted.—James 2nd found it very necessary for the support of the power he aimed at establishing, and accordingly it was revived for a term of seven years; consequently the Revolution, when it took place, found this act in existence, and in a very flourishing state.—He prayed the indulgence of the House—he was endeavouring to point out that at the time of the Revolution a censorship over the press was a grievance in existence, and that of the strictest kind, so that he believed a stricter never was established even under the inquisition, and it was left in existence. But it might be said, that as it was to expire in a few years, the repeal of it then was a matter of no great concern. However, how stood the fact? When the period fixed for its continuance elapsed, the statesmen of that day did not think it quite safe to suffer it to expire, and accordingly renewed it in the 3rd and 4th William 3rd and Mary, and in its full integrity, for one full year, and from thence to the end of the next session of parliament. It finally expired in the year 1694, and from that time till now the press of England had continued unrestricted. But if the hon. and learned gentleman would look, he would find that the Crown made three or four attempts to re-enact it in the same reign. He would see that in 1698 a bill for the purpose was actually brought down to this House from the House of Lords, where it had passed; that it was read a first time, but on the motion for a second reading, negatived without a division. He wished to show that, at the era of the Revolution, an event which had been so greatly and justly admired, as improving and perfecting our constitution, and which had been productive of the greatest possible benefits to posterity, the House of Commons had not been so much alive to the necessity or prudence of establishing the liberty of this instrument of literature and science—and that the government did not willingly suffer it to expire at the time it had. And who were the persons composing that administration? those who, he supposed, were the natural admiration of the Whigs of the present day. He presumed, that if he were to ask those hon. gentlemen who most strenuously opposed the present measure, they could not give a better definition of a genuine Whig than by referring to those Whigs who brought about the glorious revolution as the examples. It might well be asked, then, what were the restrictions tolerated by the Whigs of that day? The first of their bills prohibited the printing or publication of any thing whatever which might tend to bring into scandal the government of the church or state, or any other individual or corporation whatever. Now, the House would see how much farther these expressions would tend to carry the offence than any thing which the present measure went to do; because, by the word government, clearly those might be intended to be meant who in any way were a part of it. [The hon. gentleman then recapitulated a variety of clauses, the principal of which enacted, that every print, engraving, and ballad, should have the printer's and engraver's name affixed, on pain of every such print, engraving, ballad, &c. so engraved and printed, being seized, and the presses, &c. broken up and destroyed; that there should none enter into the trade of a printer, until the number of master printers then in business should have become limited to twenty, and that of letter-founders to four; that the trade should be supported by all future nominations or permissions to enter it being in the name either of the archbishop of Canterbury or the bishop of London; and that the number of apprentices which a master printer might be permitted to engage should be three, and those that a master founder might employ two, and no more.] So much for the freedom of the press in king William's days. The House had heard much about a search for arms by day and night as being not only an odious, but a new and unheard of proposition. Shortly, however, after the bill which he had just described, another was introduced by which power was granted to search for books, printed secretly at any time, by warrant under the sign manual, or signed by the secretaries of state, or by the wardens of the Stationers' Company. There was an exemption, that the houses of Peers of the realm should not be searched except by special warrant under the sign manual, or by two secretaries of state; and as the bill referred to all books printed after 1662, the subjects of the realm were to be subject to that law for the space of four years. As to the rigour of punishment, for the first offence the defendant was sentenced to a suspension from exercising his trade for three years; for the second, he was not sentenced to banishment; no, but he was for ever disabled from pursuing his trade, subject to fine, imprisonment, and other corporeal punishment at the discretion of the court. He had referred to these historical facts with the view of showing what were the principles by which our ancestors had been governed. Yet gentlemen talked of there being no precedent for a measure like the proposed one. He was convinced that the root of the evil would not be arrived at by fining the author or printer with the penalties, so well as if the penalties were attached to the publisher, because the mischief was done by the publications being permitted. The mischief was done, inasmuch as it was not possible, after the publication, to put the country in the situation in which it was before. He would appeal to those around him, whether they thought society could be benefitted by the cheap tracts, which spread among the lower classes, especially those employed in manufactures and agriculture, discontent and sedition. He saw gentlemen who were agriculturists; would they consider it desirable that their labourers should be assembled together in the field to hear Paine's Age of Reason read to them, or other publications, which he had seen with much disgust, such as The Black Dwarf, and tracts of a similar nature and tendency? Would gentlemen engaged in manufactures, wish to see their workmen, after the labour of the day, convened for such purposes? Surely not. If, then, it was admitted that such practices were pernicious in individual cases, it could not be contended, that they would be beneficial for the community at large; and was it not desirable to repress the circulation of those doctrines which threatened to destroy the public morals, and to endanger the public security? He begged to remind the House that it behoved them to watch narrowly the progress of an evil which threatened the destruction of property, the demoralization of every class of men, and consequences altogether dreadful; he conceived it their duty, as had been said, not to pause inactively, but to provide against that which, if not checked in time, would, ere long, overwhelm them all. Could that be good which tended to destroy the present comforts of all, and which led to consequences the most deeply to be lamented of any that could befall the human race? It was the duty of parliament—a pressing and imperative duty—to lay the axe to the root of the evil; to suppress the press—he meant the abuse of the press—an abuse which if not suppressed, would, ere long overturn every establishment in the country. No institution, however wise or valuable; no constitution, however venerable or sacred, could bear to be constantly brought into contempt, and loaded with slander by every base and desperate scribbler, who, without compunction, scattered abroad his virulent and destructive poison. One great source of the evil—and in saying so, he was aware that he differed from many persons for whose opinion he entertained the highest respect, and above all, from an hon. and dear friend near him—but to him it appeared that one great source of the evil was the extent to which the general education of the lower classes had been carried, and which certainly tended to the establishment of a state of society not contemplated in former times. To enlarge the understanding of the people—to give them capacities for the reception of knowledge, was worse than useless, unless especial care was taken what kind of knowledge was communicated to them. Those who had a capacity for good, had also a capacity for evil. The mischief of erroneous knowledge was, that it set those men by whom it was obtained above control; and that it made them conceive themselves wiser than those around them, either because they knew more, or believed less. This was the mischief; and it behoved the legislature to take great care what issued from the press at a period when the people at large were so capable of comprehending the information—salutary or pernicious—that was imparted to them. The existing situation of things, had never before been known in any age or country. To a new case, new remedies must be applied. Parliament were adopting the best measures that were suggested to their minds. If he had any doubt on the subject, it was whether those measures would be effectual—whether they went far enough. He confessed that he was inclined to go much farther; for he always considered that it was much better to endeavour to prevent crime than to punish it when committed.

Mr. Abercromby observed, that the early part of the speech of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, was not at all applicable to the question. It might have, with propriety, been urged to a radical meeting, but not to that House, that the present age had rights and advantages which were not enjoyed by our ancestors. He was quite willing to allow that no argument in favour of the liberty of the press was to be deduced from a reference to the ancient periods to which the hon. gentleman had adverted. He had listened to the hon. gentleman with great attention; but really he had been at a loss to discover what were the hon. gentleman's intentions, till the last part of his speech, when some new lights broke in upon him, and did seem to discover something like them. After observing upon the extensive influence of the press, the hon. gentleman had proceeded to regret what the country had, with so much honour and credit to itself, done for education. But whatever were the hon. gentleman's regrets upon that head, he could assure him, and the friends of the cause might rest satisfied, that the system of general education had made far too great a progress to be ever affected by any thing the hon. gentleman could say. And as to what had been the case in former times upon which the hon. gentleman had dwelt so much in his speech, as regarded the freedom and the penalties of the press, if it proved any thing, it proved a great deal too much for the hon. gentleman's argument. If he were asked with reference to the dearest and most precious right of the people of England, he would not be so rash as to say, that he could not find out instances in our history in which it might have been violated; but neither could he help remarking, with respect to the precedents cited by the hon. gentleman that the Habeas Corpus act was not then in existence. If the practice of former years were to justify violations of liberty; if the hon. gentleman's notion of the British constitution was accurate, then all that he (Mr. Abercromby) had been taught on the subject was erroneous. He had always been taught that it was the peculiar virtue and excellence of the British constitution, that it was—not the fabric of a moment, but the result of the aggregate experience of ages. And what kind of argument was that, which, after the people had freely enjoyed a right for 100 years, turned suddenly round upon them with a reference to a period of their history when that right was subject to more restraint than at present? The hon. gentleman had for a moment talked of suppressing the press; and although he immediately corrected that phrase as an unintentional error; yet, remembering as he did, that when the noble lord opposite introduced the succession of measures which had been submitted to the consideration of parliament, he said that he was not going to deprive the country of the benefit of trial by jury, he could not help paying some attention to such successive lapses of expression, and especially as shortly after the hon. gentleman expressed his regret that ministers had not gone far enough. This, indeed, he himself had heard with regret, especially when he looked to the state of the press at this moment. He must, indeed, admit the very alarming extent and increase of publications intended to disseminate abuse of religion, and to instil principles of sedition and rebellion, and doctrines which could only end in confusion and destruction. But while he admitted this, was he bound to come to the noble lord, and the hon. gentleman's conclusion? Was it necessary to amend the laws? Before he could allow this last position, he must ask those who maintained it to prove to him that the old laws were inefficient. He wished to know what could be alleged in excuse for the supineness of the law officers of the Crown, in not trying the old laws before they called for new enactments? Would they excuse themselves on the plea that juries, who had taken a solemn oath to administer justice, would so forget their oath and their duty as to refuse to convict, although convinced of the transgression of the law? This had not been stated, and he could not admit for a moment such a calumny on the character of juries. Would it then be maintained, that juries were so far imbued with the principles and opinions of those who libelled the government and the religion of the country, that they could not perceive or acknowledge the wicked tendency of the libels on which they were called to decide, and were disposed to take part with the libellers rather than to give verdicts against them? This likewise he entirely disbelieved. Such charges must receive some countenance from experience, before he could admit them as an excuse for legislative interference. Before he could agree to any abridgment of the freedom of discussion through the press, he would require evidence to show that juries allowed persons to escape with impunity, in refusing to convict on substantiated charges of blaspheming religion, and of libelling the king, the government, and the legislature of the country. Till he saw this done, he would not agree to take a step in framing new enactments, and would complain of the present measures of ministers as an attempt not to supply defects in the law, but in the administration of the law. Without having the most clear and satisfactory evidence that the existing laws were insufficient, he would not consent to exercise further the power of legislation. Such was the ground which he occupied in his opposition to the present bill; and to the argument which he had now used, no answer had been made on a former occasion by his hon. and learned friend

the solicitor general. He would conjure the House, therefore, to pause before they gave their sanction to an arbitrary and severe enactment, supported by no necessity, and justified by no plea of sound policy. Let them consider that the law, if not strong enough before, had received additional force by bills now in progress through the House. He alluded to the Traverso-bill, by which the administration of justice, in cases of misdemeanour, would be expedited, and new terror struck into offenders by seeing punishment follow more quickly on the heels of transgression. As a part, likewise, of the same system, he might allude to the libel bill, which would be discussed to-morrow, by which a heavier penalty was to follow a second conviction for libel. If the reasons on which the ministers rested the justification of a claim for new powers had any foundation, namely, that juries would not convict, of what use was it to enact a punishment of greater severity? If ministers could not obtain a first conviction under the law as it stood, how were they to obtain a second for the application of their new penalties? He admitted that the evil complained of existed to a certain extent, but the cause of it was, as he had before stated, a want of a due enforcement of the law. It was curious to observe how publications of an objectionable nature had increased lately. If he were asked the cause of this, he should at once answer—impunity. No attempt had been made to punish the authors of these publications, and they naturally increased. There were always to be found men who were ready to put forth such publications, as well as persons who were equally ready to purchase them. But if the law had been properly enforced, the evil would at once have been put an end to. Under these considerations he felt it his duty to oppose the bill altogether.

Mr. Bennet said, he could not refrain from offering a few observations on the measure now before the House, and the extraordinary manner in which it had been supported. The bill itself though objectionable in every point of view, did not appear to him nearly so alarming as the speech of the hon. member for Corfe-castle. There never, he believed, had been a speech delivered within the walls of parliament of so unconstitutional a nature since the enactment of the arbitrary statutes which it described. The hon. member had collected the severe and tyrannical acts of former times, as a justification for similar measures now; but his inference, if good for any thing, would go too far. There never, he believed, had been wanting precedents for tyranny, and if precedent was to be all-sufficient, without reference to its quality, why did not the hon. member instead of merely going back to the reign of Charles the first go a little farther back, and quote the statute of Henry 8th, which arrogated to one branch of the legislature the powers of the whole, and made the king's proclamation equivalent to an act of parliament? If the hon. member wished to establish a principle of despotism at present, that period would serve him as a precedent. He confessed that he thought he saw this principle lurking behind the hon. member's speech. But the approbation of tyrannical enactments was not the only thing that surprised him, in the speech of the hon. member for Corfe-castle. The hon. gentleman by his language seemed to regret the progress of education among the poor, and to consider them deteriorated as subjects, the more they were improved as men. In regretting the progress of education the hon. gentleman must likewise regret the progress of religion and morals, for without education the blessings of religion could not be understood or appreciated, and the duties of morality could not be taught or practised. The hon. gentleman himself, if he ever took a view of the state and character of the poor in his own vicinity, must have observed that the amelioration of their hearts and conduct kept pace with the improvement of their minds; and he would appeal to those gentlemen who were connected with the manufacturing districts, whether that part of the population that was best educated was not likewise the most moral and religious, and whether there had not been an evident improvement in their character since they had more generally obtained the means of instruction? It seemed to be one of the ordinations of Providence, that knowledge and moral improvement should go hand in hand; that men by becoming more extensively acquainted with their duties to God and man should be inspired with a stronger desire to perform them; that a capacity for seeing the obligations of virtue and religion should lead to their practice; and that the power of reading and understanding the scriptures should lead to greater regularity and purity of life. It had sometimes been made a matter of dispute out of doors, whether education should be given generally to the poor; and some by insidiously opposing the best schemes for propagating it, had practically decided the question in the negative; but this was the first time that he ever heard it insinuated in the House, that the education of the people was an evil, and that ignorance was the remedy to be applied. He could not hear such extraordinary and dangerous doctrines advanced in parliament without entering his protest against them. He could not believe that a qualification which rendered the poor capable of understanding their duties, and of partaking of the blessings which the Gospel offered, was a thing to be deprecated; and he little expected that a member of parliament would in his place have stated an opinion so opposite to that of our excellent and afflicted monarch, who said, "he hoped to see the day when every child in his dominions would be able to read his Bible." It would appear that the hon. member did not participate in this wish; that he was against the education of the poorer classes of society; and therefore, that he would shut them from those inlets to knowledge and to happiness which that holy book afforded. With respect to the bill the before the House, he would never agree in its policy or necessity till the existing laws had been tried. He allowed that there were both in the metropolis and in several towns in the country shops for the sale of libellous works but he contended, that the evil to be apprehended from them had been greatly exaggerated. Such offensive publications had not so extensive a sale as had been stated. It had been mentioned, that the blasphemous works published by Carlile had been extensively circulated in two of the northern counties (Lancashire and Yorkshire) where the doctrines of radical reform were prevalent, but he had heard from the very best authority that a few hundreds only had been sold in these quarters before the prosecution, and that about 1,500 copies which were purchased after the prosecution had commenced had been purchased more from curiosity than any leaning to the infidel tenets that they promulgated. He had it likewise from the best authority, that as soon as the blasphemous nature of these works was known; it inspired such disgust as to stop the sale long before the law interfered. An hon. and learned gentleman opposite had on a former night maintained that the present change in the law was necessary, as the old law could not check the evil. But had the law been attempted to be executed? Where was the evidence of it? In 1818, there had not been one ex officio information. Blasphemous and seditious libels, so far from having increased after Mr. Hone's prosecution had actually diminished. They were fewer in 1818 than in the preceding year, and only increased in 1819 by the impunity allowed them. Where then was the evidence for the assertion, that the acquittal of Mr. Hone had extended the mischief, and proved that no conviction could be obtained from a jury against blasphemous libels? The acquittal of Mr. Hone proved nothing against the success of a prosecution for blasphemy, sincerely undertaken and wisely pursued. It only proved, that in that case a charge of blasphemy was brought against one who had no intention to blaspheme; that his object was merely political, and not religious; and the jury did not see why he should be adjudged guilty of a crime which nothing proved he had committed, while statesmen and divines had used the same weapons before him, without ever exposing themselves to the same accusation. In his defence it had been proved, that men of the most religious character, during the period of the reformation and of the civil war, when religion was almost a mania, had written parodies on scripture without incurring the charge of blasphemy. After animadverting on the conduct of the jury, the hon. and learned gentleman allowed himself to throw out insinuations against those who extended their protection to Mr. Hone after his acquittal. In answer to such insinuation, he would say, that there never was a fouler slander uttered against men than this—that those individuals, who aided Mr. Hone's subscription, had any intention of injuring religion by extending their protection Mr. Hone. They entered into a subscription for that individual, not because they conceived him guilty of blasphemy, but because, believing him innocent of that charge, they detested the base and hypocritical attempt to punish political hostility under the pretext of an offence against religion, and because they conceived him to be a persecuted man, who did not merit the treatment he received. Let not, therefore, insinuations of this sort be thrown out against men who were distinguished both for the purity and integrity of their private life, and the consistency of their political character. The hon. and learned gentleman should consider well before he cast such a slur on the conduct of honourable persons whose characters he could not hear slandered without endeavouring to repel the charge. With respect to the present bill, he felt himself constrained to oppose it. He opposed the stamp duty on the publications that would be affected by it, as it would raise the price of knowledge to the poor, and those whose improvement was derived from the readings of small tracts. The great mass of the people, thanks to the system of extravagance that had been followed by their rulers, could not purchase the useful writings that now circulated among them, if subject to the duty. If the bill passed, it would be saying to the poorer classes of the community, "you ought not to possess the means of moral and religious instruction." While the stamp would thus press heavy on the poorer portion of society who read cheap religious and moral tracts, it would be insufficient to stop publications against which it was directed. Cobbett's Register had formerly been stamped, and he believed sold triple the number with a stamp when sold for a shilling than now without one when sold for two pence. The two-penny publications besides did not circulate so quickly without a stamp as with one, when they could be transmitted through the post office. How absurd was it to stop the circulation of good tracts, merely that bad ones might not circulate along with them. It appeared to him to be as preposterous to interrupt the sale of all small publications that the sale of bad small publications might be checked, as it would be for a person to pull out his eyes, because while they admitted images of beauty and sights of pleasure, they were likewise the inlets to appearances of deformity and sights of vice. The proposed stamp-duties would equally stop the circulation of good small tracts as bad. With regard to the clause inflicting penalties before publication it was a perfect novelty in legislation. A man was called upon to enter into securities before he was even accused of any crime. A security of no less than 600*l.* must be entered into before a man could send his opinions to the public. He said 600*l.* because though government required only 300*l.* yet the party giving collateral security must be also secured against the risk he underwent. It would ruin entirely that useful body of men who supplied cheap publications to the poor. It would throw the whole trade into the hands of the rich, and affect a privilege higher than that of trade—the privilege of every Englishman to publish what he pleased, subject only to a punishment for the abuse of the privilege to the injury of others. All the members on the other side of the House who supported this and the other restrictive measures, professed to do so from a desire to preserve the constitution. But what was the constitution? It was not the forms of the constitution that composed the constitution, but the blessings which those forms protected; in the same manner as the forms of law were not the law, or the forms of a court of justice were not the administration of justice. The constitution was only the body of rights and privileges which we enjoyed under our political establishments, and among these was pre-eminent the freedom of speech and writing. Gentlemen who professed to support the constitution, while they allowed the destruction of its most essential advantages, might live to repent the day when they drew such a distinction, and forgetting the substance adhered only to the form. This bill was the greatest invasion of the constitution, as it made it to depend upon a man's fortune whether or not he should have the right of publishing his thoughts to his countrymen.

Mr. Wilmot contended, that it was unfair to regard one measure separately, for they ought to be considered collectively as measures which were made necessary by the peculiar situation of the country.—He agreed with the hon. member who had spoken last, upon the subject of education in answer to observations upon that point which had been made by the hon. member for Corfe Castle.—He never could bring himself to believe that the lower classes could receive too much education,—or that any bounds could be justifiably prescribed to the extension of knowledge and the improvement of the human understanding; he thought that they might be too little educated, and that the present period was one in which advantage had been taken of their limited means of information; he thought that as in twilight objects were sometimes seen in distorted proportions, which upon the introduction of more light, assumed their true appearance, so in what he might call “the disastrous twilight” of education, false impressions might be received, which would fade away before the light of universal education.—It was to no purpose that the hon. member cited precedents of tyrannical usurpation; he challenged him to refer to the history of his country and to point out a period when equal necessity existed for these enactments. The tone and temper of the times in favour of the freedom of the press had become much more decided. It was only in the year 1795 that a printer had been brought and placed on his knees at the bar of the House for having infringed on its liberties by publishing the debates.—He thought that the analogy and spirit of those arguments which were employed half a century ago in recommending an excise on spirituous liquors, were peculiarly applicable to the present measure.—It was then said, “We will not so far infringe upon the personal freedom of the poor as to forbid their drinking spirituous liquors, but we will so far increase their price as to make it more difficult for the poor to injure themselves by so pernicious a practice.”—Such was the object of those who voted for a stamp-duty upon those infamous publications of the cheap press, which tended to disorganize the very frame of society, and to make the poor doubly miserable by raising their expectations with no chance of sustaining them. The cheap press taught the poor to feel jealous of the authority of the House of Commons, to forsake and distrust their natural protectors, and to rebel against the dispensations of Providence. The agitators of the present day, if they do not actually bribe the populous with gold (which is not so certain), they at least cajole them with promises of a golden age consequent upon measures of Radical Reform, they inflame their passions and awaken their selfishness, contrasting their present with what they contend is to be their future condition,—a condition incompatible with human nature, and with those immutable laws which Providence has established for the regulation of civil society.—The friends of the people in 1794 or 5 laid it down as a principle, that those who had no property should not have the privilege of the elective franchise, because they would evidently have no common interest in the preservation of property, why not then extend the spirit of this principle to the present question? Why should a seditious pauper be allowed to circulate, at the cheapest rate, his suggestions for a change and division of property? Let his qualification be the additional price which the reader is to pay for his treasonable absurdities. With respect to the clause of banishment, it would never take place except in very flagitious cases, and what better punishment could be substituted than to expatriate the individual who was waging eternal war against the institutions of his own country. An hon. and learned gentleman had intimated a suspicion that the magistrates would no longer be disposed to give their gratuitous assistance under the complex operation of this series of measures. He begged leave totally to dissent from him. Could he suppose that the magistrates of England would require the stimulus of a fee to prompt them to their arduous and honourable duties, If such had been their temper of mind, they would have shrunk long since from their exercise, but he felt no doubt but that their temperate firmness and unyielding exertions, their devotedness to the due execution of the laws, accompanied as it was frequently not only with the abandonment of private recreations but of private duties, would characterize their future conduct as they had ennobled their past conduct. The honourable gentleman, after other observations, concluded by saying, that it was the duty of the House to interfere, to protect the poor from delusion and falsehood.—He was a friend to the liberty of the press, and in that character he thought it would be best preserved by passing this bill to stem the torrent of sedition and blasphemy which deluged the country. He remembered some lines of Cowper, which well described the balance advantages and dangers of a free press.—Addressing the press, he says :

“ By thee, Religion, Liberty, and Laws, Exert their influence and advance their cause ;
By thee worse plagues than Pharaoh's land
beset,
Diffus'd make Earth the vestibule of Hell.
'Thou fountain at which drink the good and wise ;
Thou ever bubbling source of endless lies ;
Like Eden's dread probationary tree,
Knowledge of good and evil is from thee.”

It was to give full force to the cause of religion, liberty and law,—it was to prevent this once happy and virtuous country from fulfilling the denunciation of the poet,—it was to check that source of sedition and blasphemy whose contaminating waters were spreading around their pollution, that he gave his vote in support of the measure.

Mr. Alderman Waithman considered the present bills as destructive of the liberty of the press, and consequently dangerous to the other liberties of the country. The hon. member for Corfe-Castle had shown what sort of system this bill formed part of, by going back to tyrannical times for his precedents. An hon. and learned gentleman had accused those who aided the subscription to Mr. Hone as supporters of blasphemy. He was not in the House at the time when this charge was made, otherwise he would have defended himself and his friends against it. Imputations were not only thrown out against Mr. Hone and his friends, but against the jury by whom he was acquitted. Now Mr. Hone was acquitted, not because the jury wished to sanction blasphemy, but because they conceived that the political squib which was charged with blasphemy was not published for the purpose of reviling religion. He (Mr. Waithman) was in court during the trial, and having witnessed the ability, the fortitude, and the eloquence, with which Mr. Hone defended himself, and conceiving him persecuted unjustly, for an offence against religion, while he had only a political object in view, he was among the foremost to promote a subscription for him and his family. The present measures were subversive of the Bill of Rights, and by them the right of petition was also destroyed. The liberty of speech being taken from the subject, the present bill was an attempt to deprive him of the liberty of the press. But he would ask why government had suffered all those obnoxious publications to go on without interruption for so long a time, if it was not to form an excuse for passing these measures? It had been said, he could not tell whether truly, that some of the individuals who issued those publications actually had the sanction of the government in publishing them. He could not say he knew the fact; but some of these publications were of a nature so abominable, that several respectable individuals came to him and expressed their confidence that they must have the sanction of government, or the publishers would never have dared to proceed such lengths; and it had actually occurred that the printers and publishers of them had been suffered to pass with impunity, while the unwary persons who retailed them were severely punished. The exemplary punishment inflicted on Carlile, one of the printers of those daring publications, in consequence of the verdict of a Middlesex jury, was a proof that the law, as it at present stood, was sufficiently powerful for the chastisement of persons convicted of similar crimes, without the necessity of enacting such extraordinary measures, which so far from confining their effects to the guilty, would involve the innocent, the honest and industrious, and prove actually ruinous to the trade of printing and bookselling. He had seen the strong and reasonable statement made in the resolutions of a most respectable community of printers and booksellers, at the head of which was the name of Mr. Butterworth, formerly a member of that House; and from those resolutions it was clearly shown, that if this bill should pass without very considerable modification, that trade must be absolutely ruined. The most innocent member of that community with the purest intentions, and with all the caution he could exert, would be constantly liable to fall under the severities of this bill, and be banished to another country, where he could not exert his professional talents for the maintenance of his family. The House had been told, that even the whigs, who effected the revolution, had sanctioned the adoption of similar measures in that day. But to this he would answer, that however necessary such a measure might have been then, it was by no means so at this time. He would ask, why were laws passing year after year, infringing on the principles of the constitution, but none passed to strengthen it and secure the rights of the people? To talk of the bill of rights was a subject of jocular and clamorous ridicule to the gentlemen on the treasury side of the House. Such a bill as the present was even in direct opposition to the principles laid down by Blackstone himself, who was notoriously a court lawyer, but who declared that no one ought to be called upon to answer for the publication of any work until it had been declared criminal by a jury. Every rational man would be led to conclude, that the more enlightened the country became, the more extensive should be the freedom of discussion on political subjects, and the rights of the people to canvass their grievances; but according to the argument of an honourable gentleman who sat before him, the direct contrary principle ought to obtain. But it was quite too much to say a measure of this kind was called for by any thing in the circumstances of the times. It would operate not only as a restraint on all political discussion, but it would deter men of genius from exerting their talents for the extension of knowledge, for fear of uttering some sentiments or principles which might be construed into sedition, a term which it did not define, and which, like the narrow limits between day and night, could not be accurately designated. A man might be convicted of sedition by one jury, and acquitted by another upon the same publication. Was it to be supposed the people of this once free country could bear such a bill?—or was such a measure the proper return to those who had fought the battles of their country, and effected the security of those who now sought to deprive them of those rights, for the defence and security of which they had so valiantly and successfully contended? Were they to be put down by this system of severities—while, as the noble lord said, it was not in contemplation to propose any measure whatever for their relief? But he was perfectly confident that such acts, calculated to suppress public opinion could not succeed, and he should strenuously oppose this bill in every stage, because he believed the existing laws of the country amply sufficient for every legitimate purpose this bill could be intended to effect.

Dr. Phillimore observed, that the speeches of several hon. friends of his had left little further to be urged in support of the measures before the House. The speech of his right hon. friend, the member for the university of Dublin, especially, had shed such intensity of light upon the subject, that he could not conceive how the wisdom of the measures could be questioned, or how their necessity could be denied. He was anxious, however, to explain his reasons for the votes he gave upon all those measures. He was impelled to speak of them all, because it had been repeatedly stated in the course of the night, that those measures annihilated the liberty of petitioning, and subverted the liberties of the country. But those measures, in his opinion, were so far from annihilating the liberty of petitioning, and subverting the liberties of the country, that they were required and calculated to protect our liberties, and to hand them down unimpaired to posterity. The measures now passing through parliament were of a two-fold nature. One part went to divest the disturbed part of the community of arms. The other part included this measure and the bill which regulated the right of petitioning. The first was founded in necessity, and ought to be limited in duration. But this measure was of a different nature. It grew out of an inveterate evil. He did not undervalue the right of petitioning, and the liberty of the press. He knew the right of the people to petition was one upon which the civil liberties of the country depended. He thought the liberty of the press a privilege still more sacred, and that no free state could exist without it. He admitted also the advantages of educating the lower orders of the people, and that the more the people were educated, the greater would be the benefits derived by the country. But in supporting those rights, gentlemen seemed to have forgotten that there were other principles to be maintained indispensable to the conservation of those rights, and of the peace and security of the country. The exercise of those rights had been used as a means of attack on the constitution itself, calculated to subvert its principles, and excite against it the most destructive warfare. His hon. friend, the member for Shrewsbury, had asserted, that the circulation of blasphemous libels was not extensive, and merely confined to local districts; but he (Dr. P.) would say, that at this very moment the most industrious exertions were on foot to circulate such publications so destructive to the happiness of mankind in this life and hereafter. The fact came home to every man's observation. He did not refer to the documents laid on the table to show the necessity for adopting those measures as his sole authority upon this subject, but he referred to them merely in aid of the notoriety of those evils which existed. He would particularly refer, however, to the last letter which closed the correspondence with his majesty's government upon those subjects, which stated, that fifteen of the most populous towns in a northern district were prepared for a simultaneous rising on a particular day; and that exertions were made to put seditious and blasphemous publications into the hands of servants in large families, in order to seduce them to become accomplices in the guilt of those who used such contrivances; and the House would recollect, that this statement was corroborated by the report of the grand jury for the county of Chester. And when he put the House in mind of the circulation of those mischievous pamphlets, he hoped they would see the indispensable necessity of adopting the present bill. But he did not found his conviction solely upon those papers. He considered them only as auxiliary to the experience and observation of every member of that House. In almost every part of the country attempts were made to sap the principles of religion: to ridicule and revile those sacred principles of faith and morality on which virtue and happiness were founded; to perplex and destroy the sound sentiments and salutary habits of worshipping God and obeying the king. Were they to look upon transactions like those with stoical apathy? They were told that the measures before them were encroachments upon the constitution. He would yield to none in admiration of our constitution, or in zeal for its preservation in purity and vigour. It was a constitution, transmitted to us by our ancestors. It was the result of wisdom and experience; it was adapted to the various circumstances of society, and the various emergencies of time. Whilst it guaranteed our rights, it protected our property and our persons. The constitution of this country was not formed in a day, nor was it the work of any particular period; it was the result of long practical experience: it enabled the parliament to resist any attempts of the people, or any encroachments of the Crown for its destruction: because it contained in itself the remedy for those evils: arising from the changes of manners which in course of time take place in every country. He could by no means agree to the description of it given by his hon. friend the member for Shrewsbury. When gentlemen talked of liberty, they must speak of it under some rational limitations. If men under the pretence of the liberty of the press, published blasphemies, or libelled their neighbours—if under the pretence of discussing grievances, or promoting petitions, they excited seditious tumults, they must be restrained within proper bounds. Civil liberty would cease to exist without such restraints; in civilised life such restraints must be established as times and circumstances required. In fact, restraints were necessary to the protection of liberty in its most desirable state. These measures were not designed to put down the reasonable liberty of the people, but to put down those proceedings which would go to destroy liberty; and in voting for them he felt that he was not injuring, but protecting liberty. He should not detain the House longer on this point, but he could not sit down without adverting to another assertion that had been made by several gentlemen on the subject of banishment in this case, as a novelty unknown to our laws. He would contend that the whole history of our laws abounded with instances of this mode of punishment. He would ask, whether, from our Saxon ancestors down to the present day, there was any punishment more familiar to our history than banishment? The hon. member for Durham might laugh, but he could prove that it was so. Magna Charta contained a clause, that none should be outlawed or banished without the judgment of his peers. Here then, in the great charter of our liberties, was the punishment of banishment recognized. Bracton, than whom there was no higher authority, had a distinct chapter upon the subject of outlawry or banishment. In the 39th of Elizabeth, there was a law passed which enacted, that "such rogues as were dangerous to the inferior people should be banished." Here was the punishment pointed out, and the description of persons to whom it was to be applied. Who were to be banished? Such rogues as were dangerous to the inferior people. What was the punishment for rogues that were dangerous to the inferior people?—Banishment. It was a punishment peculiarly applicable to those persons who blasphemed God and libelled the King.—Would they transport such persons to our colonies, to inoculate them with blasphemy and sedition! These observations he had felt himself called upon to make in order to repel the assertion that there was nothing in our history and nothing in our law to sanction such a punishment. Upon the whole he considered the measures now in progress to be calculated for the security of our most invaluable rights, for the maintenance of those institutions which made us a great and glorious people, and for the preservation of our social state, and all the comforts and happiness we enjoyed.

Mr. J. Wharton said, he wished to put a question to the noble lord. If a book-selling house, consisting of six partners, were to be convicted a second time of publishing a seditious libel, would the whole firm be banished, or would the senior partner be selected, or any other partner?

The House divided on the question, "That the Speaker do now leave the chair:"—Ayes, 222; Noes, 76.

The House then resolved itself into a committee. On the clause requiring sureties from persons printing small political publications,

Mr. Marryat rose to object to the extreme unreasonableness and hardship of obliging every printer of a paper containing less than two sheets, or that should be sold for less than sixpence, not only to enter into a recognizance himself in the sum of three hundred pounds, but also to find two or three sufficient sureties to enter into a recognizance for the like sum, that he should not publish a libel. He had no objection to the clause as far as related to the printer himself, but he must strongly object to his being obliged to find two or three sufficient sureties, because it imposed a condition upon printers with which many of them would be unable to comply, and with which, unless they did comply, their ruin must be the inevitable consequence, because they would be incapacitated to continue that calling by which they maintained themselves and their families. By far the most numerous class of printers commenced business on a very small scale. They were journeymen, whose savings enabled them to purchase a few types, and set up for themselves. They added to those types from time to time out of the profits of their industry, and at length perhaps succeeded in acquiring a competence. All those who were in the earlier stages of this progress, would be incapable of giving the securities required, for this obvious reason; that though a man might be disposed to become security for another, as far as related to his probity and integrity, yet who would take upon himself the responsibility that a printer should never commit an error in judgment, but constantly exercise a sound discretion, on so ticklish a point as what is and what is not libel,—a point upon which gentlemen learned in the law are not always agreed, and on which juries frequently differ,—a London jury having decided a publication to be no libel, and an Exeter jury having afterwards found by their verdict the same publication to be a libel. The effect therefore of this clause would be, to throw all the printing business into the hands of a few opulent men, who were well known to possess the means of paying any fine that might be imposed upon them, and consequently would have no difficulty in finding the sureties required. Thus the bill would operate most unequally and unjustly; for it would be no hardship whatever on the wealthy class of printers, while it would subject their poorer brethren to ruinous disabilities, incapacitate them from continuing their business, and leave them no alternative, after they had exhausted the money arising from the sale of their press and types, but a gaol or the workhouse. This clause is an infringement of the acknowledged right of every subject in a free state, to employ his industry and talents in such manner as he considers most beneficial to his own interests. It is also inconsistent with the great principle of British legislation, that every man is considered innocent, till he has been proved to be guilty; for by this clause a man who has committed no crime, and who probably never would have committed any crime, is subjected to a most severe as well as unmerited punishment, that of being deprived of his means of livelihood, on the presumption that he may by possibility commit some crime hereafter. The consequence of this measure, as affecting the general interests of literature and the arts, are by no means inconsiderable. It is owing to the competition arising from the number of printers, that the price of printing is kept down to as low a rate as can be possibly afforded. Diminish that competition, and the price will soon be raised.—Even now, books are printed in foreign countries, the duty of four guineas per hundred weight paid upon them on importation, and sold here to advantage. Many gentlemen know the great number of the Delphin edition of the classics, printed at Paris in Baskerville's types, that were circulated in this country. An English Common Prayer book was printed by Didot at Paris, for the express purpose of being sold here; and lord Byron's works have lately been printed there, and are sold here, cheaper than they can be purchased at the original publishers. If this clause passes, this evil will be aggravated, and the art of printing be transferred from this country to foreigners. Literature also will be discouraged; for booksellers will no longer venture to give that liberal remuneration to writers of talent for the copy-right of their works which they have hitherto done; and men of genius must look to other countries for that remuneration which they will be unable to find here. Mr. Hume, a writer by no means unfavourable to arbitrary power, commenting upon some despotic proclamations issued, and monopolies granted, in the early part of the reign of queen Elizabeth, observes, that had she continued to pursue the same system, wealth, commerce, and the arts, which have now made this country their favourite abode, would have been as much strangers here, as they are in the dominions of the emperor of Morocco; and if this House legislates in the same spirit of restriction and monopoly, their measures will soon produce the same effects. He concluded by moving as an amendment, that the words "together with two or three sufficient sureties," be left out of the clause.

Mr. Alderman Waithman supported the amendment, and said, that nine out of ten of the printers would not have got into business under such restrictions. How, for instance, could Dr. Franklin have got into business?

Mr. W. Smith said, that under the bill as it stood, all accounts of proceedings affecting the arts and sciences, agriculture, &c. would be prohibited, except under all the burthens and restrictions it imposed.

Mr. R. Wharton said, it had been assumed that the bill was to affect all printers: this was not the fact. That it would affect those who with small means, and no character to lose, and no stake in the common-weal, was true. This he deemed to be a good. All public questions would still be discussed, but in a more temperate and decent manner.

Mr. W. Smith wished to know whether it was really intended to suppress all publications containing accounts of events? For instance, there was a publication on a sheet or half sheet, containing an account of the distress of the Scilly Isles, widely circulated for the purposes of charity.

The Attorney General said, that no publications would be affected that were not exposed for sale; and the words describing papers containing news, intelligence, and occurrences, being borrowed from the newspaper act, all those papers described by the hon. gentleman had in reality been always newspapers. The only additional hardship persons printing such papers were now subjected to was, that they must apply to a printer who had entered into recognizances. It had been said by an hon. member, that it was a new principle of our law to call on persons for securities against crimes with which they had been charged. Now, not only were there in the excise laws many instances similar to the present bill, but persons possessing boats or cutters of a certain description, which were supposed to give facilities for smuggling, were required to find bondsmen that they should not be employed in smuggling transactions. But there was a statute of Edward 6th, which had continued till George 2nd, when it was sanctioned and extended, which required all persons keeping alehouses to give surety for the keeping of order in their houses. The statute of Edward 6th required them to give their recognizances—the statute of Geo. 2nd required them to find two other sureties. He might mention the cases in the revenue laws, but this, which had so long formed a part of our law, was a stronger instance. The amendment would entirely neutralize the clause. It was not too much to say, when so much was trusted to the discretion of a printer, that he should be able to find two or three friends who had some confidence in his prudence.

Mr. J. Smith said, that a very large class of publications, entirely innoxious, would be affected by the law. Play-bills contained occurrences, and fell under the bill. Thousands of works, published at a few pence, would be loaded with this 4d. duty.

Mr. A. Wright was afraid the bill would affect some works published in the nature of Encyclopædias, in which articles on matters of church and state, merely historical, were inserted in some numbers.

Lord Castlereagh asked, whether the apprehension was, that the first or the second part of the bill would apply to these works? If to the second, there could be no difficulty in the printers of such works finding securities as to the penalties applying to them. If the first was supposed to apply, viz. the stamp, the remedy was to bring them out monthly, or in numbers of a price above 6d. When so many modes were open to printers of such works to conform to the law, it was not too much to expect that they should make some effort so to regulate their business, that the law should not be inoperative against that immoral part of the press, against which none had spoken out more plainly than the booksellers themselves. The House was obliged to do something, though perhaps their measure would not be effectual; for instance, a monthly publication might be carried on so blasphemous and treasonable as to be a very serious evil, but yet the government did not wish to cramp the legitimate press too much. As to the notion that in this country of capital, and especially in London, a monopoly could be created by requiring sureties from the printers to the amount of 300*l.*, it was extravagant. It had been shown too, that the enactment was consistent with the very spirit of our laws [a laugh]; he meant in cases where the morals of the country were endangered by any abuses.

Mr. Marryat said, he was in hope, when the attorney-general rose, that he would have satisfied the hon. members for Norwich and Oxford, by stating his intentions to introduce certain exemptions into the bill, which would have removed their objections to it. He was the more confident in this expectation, having received an assurance to that effect from the solicitor-general, to whom he had represented, that the bill, as at present worded, would materially check, if not entirely stop, all the sources of commercial intelligence; for that every price current, every account of the state of the funds, of the course of foreign exchanges, every shipping list, every packet list, in short, every paper not containing two sheets, or printed oftener than once a month, would be subject to a stamp duty of four-pence. The hon. and learned gentleman, the attorney-general, had stated that this bill would tax nothing that was not before taxed; and this assertion made it necessary for him to repeat to the committee, what he had before mentioned to the solicitor-general, that the words of this bill were copied from the act passed three years ago, for regulating the stamp duties in Ireland, and that, under that act, a Mr. Hammer-ton of the Custom-house at Dublin, who had for some years published a list of vessels that arrived at, and sailed from the different ports of Ireland, was called upon to pay the newspaper stamp duty, and in consequence had been obliged to discontinue the publication altogether. He believed this was not the intention of his majesty's ministers; but tax-gatherers and informers would enforce the law according to its strict letter, and therefore the hon. and learned gentleman, the solicitor-general, had promised him to introduce such a clause of exemption as should prevent the law from being wrested to purposes which were not contemplated by his majesty's ministers.—The hon. member then proceeded to state, that the principal object for which he rose was, to recall the attention of the committee to the amendment he had proposed, and which he regretted to find was to be resisted. He believed that those who framed this bill, had their minds so intent upon the great object of repressing seditious and blasphemous libels, that they had not sufficiently adverted to the operation of their own measure in other respects. He was ready to concur in all just and necessary regulations for putting down those publications, although he thought the evil arising from them had been much exaggerated, and that the great mass of our fellow-subjects were firmly attached to the government under which they were born, and the religion in which they were bred; but he could not go the length of punishing the innocent, in order to impose enactments, which, in his opinion, were no additional guards against the machinations of the guilty. He wished to know why the same security which was thought sufficient in the case of all other crimes, those on which the safety of the state, and the peace, property, and lives of individuals depended, the responsibility of the party himself, and his being amenable to the injured laws of his country, was not sufficient in the case of libel? He could not consent to superadd the condition required by the clause now under consideration, with which, in many cases, individuals would find it impossible to comply, and their non-compliance with which would expose them to utter ruin, by incapacitating them from continuing to exercise their calling for the maintenance of themselves and their families. He should therefore persist in taking the sense of the committee on his amendment.

The Solicitor General said, the suggestion of the hon. member respecting the exchange and shipping lists had been attended to, as an amendment was to be introduced to exempt them. The present bill was, however, in that part copied from the newspaper act, and included newspapers of that kind which were not before subject to duty. As to the practice of requiring sureties, it was necessary to inquire what was the old law of the country, which had been eulogized by all constitutional writers, from sir E. Coke to sir W. Blackstone, and which had been recognized in Magna Charta, both as granted by king John, and as confirmed by Henry 3rd. No person was allowed to be in the country out of prison, who could not find a certain number of persons to be responsible for his good behaviour. This was also enacted by a monarch who had never been mentioned but with eulogy—Alfred. This law having been recognized in the charter, and in the confirmation of the charter, had only become obsolete through the change of circumstances in the country. He did not mention it as a law now generally applicable; but he deduced from it this—that when a general law to such an extent had been eulogised by our best constitutional writers—when the principle had been sanctioned in the case of the keepers of ale-houses, though with respect to the people at large the necessity which dictated the general law had ceased—that in a case in which the morals of the country were much more seriously affected than by ale-houses, such an enactment as that now proposed was not hostile to the principles of the constitution. Again, as to smuggling, persons gave securities not because they had been guilty of, but because they had facilities for committing breaches of the law. Could any one doubt that the evil which the House now proposed to check, the growth of blasphemy and sedition, was of infinitely greater importance than disturbances in ale-houses? Or was it too much that printers should be called upon to give a small security when the seditious writers were boasting, that by the press, as at present conducted, they could overthrow the laws, religion, and institutions of the country?

Sir W. De Crespigny said, that if this clause stood, and the noble lord should come to any unfortunate termination of his career, this bill would go to exclude the public from the benefit of his last dying speech and confession.

Mr. T. Wilson said, that he agreed with much of what had fallen from Mr. Marryat, and that in a future stage, he should move an amendment, for the purpose of exempting the class of publications alluded to by that hon. gentleman.

The committee then divided on Mr. Marryat's amendment: Ayes, 82; Noes, 202; Majority, 120. On the motion that the clause itself stand part of the bill,

Mr. Denman said, that the case at Manchester, which had been referred to as sufficient reason for this clause, only proved that the magistrates had endeavoured to establish such a right as was now to be given to them, but had failed. Was the House, then, prepared to alter the law of the land merely to meet the view of those magistrates? The term "good behaviour" was extremely vague and indefinite, and the recognizance to that effect was the more unjust because it was unnecessary, as the persons who would be called to give it had already in the first instance given security of a pecuniary nature sufficient to answer all reasonable purposes.

Lord A. Hamilton remarked, that the clause was the more cruel, as it required the recognizance, not of a person convicted, but of one charged with a libel, though it might turn out that the charge was malicious or groundless.

The committee then divided: Ayes, 129; Noes, 9; Majority, 120. In the clause respecting persons suing, "in the name" of the attorney-general, Mr. Denman, to prevent the abuse of the power thereby given, moved the insertion of the words, "and by the authority." After a short discussion, in which the attorney and solicitor-general, Mr. Primrose, and Mr. V. Blake joined, the amendment was negatived without a division. The bill having been gone through, two new clauses were added on the motion of the attorney-general; the one to enable sureties to withdraw their recognizances on giving 20 days notice to the commissioners; the other to provide that nothing in the act should extend to the publication of the votes of the House, of state papers, of books for education, of invoices, &c. The House then resumed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

SEDITIONS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] The bill was read a third time. On the motion, that it do pass,

Lord Erskine said, that although he had long foreseen that ill-advised and imprudent meetings of persons too numerous to be useful for the objects they had in view, however legal, were likely to give occasion to alarms as they had done formerly, so as to be made the foundation of new laws depriving the whole nation of rights which he hoped would never be surrendered by Englishmen; yet he did not expect that a measure so totally unnecessary and so likely to aggravate all the evils complained of, would have been sent up for approbation from the House of Commons—but being here, and looking back to those sent down to them, he despaired altogether of making an impression by any thing he could say; a feeling which disqualified him from speaking as he ought. I have been accustomed, my lords (said lord E.) during the greatest part of my life, to be animated by the hope and expectation that I might not be speaking in vain; a sensation without which there can be no energy in discourse—I have often heard it said, and I believe it to be true, that even the most eloquent man living (how then must I be disabled), and however deeply impressed with his subject, could scarcely find utterance, if he were to be standing up alone, and speaking only against a wall. He meant no offence to the noble lords opposite by the comparison, nor meant to impute to them insensibility or injustice, but their minds were now so thoroughly settled on the question before them, that there was no thoroughfare through their understandings, however liberal they might be—and he should therefore be very short in the performance of what he felt to be a duty too imperious to be passed by. In looking at the bills before them, it appeared as if there had been no provisions against seditious meetings in the common law or in the ancient statutes of the country, and that they were beginning for the first time to legislate on the subject; and from the amendments they had rejected last night, they appeared to be little acquainted with what they were about. The objects they sought to point out from the statement of his noble friend the secretary of state—were meetings dangerous from their numbers—assembled from considerable distances; attended by itinerant orators, with music and seditious symbols to excite disturbance—marching in regular array. He admitted that none of these things were necessary for the great ends of meetings of the people constitutionally assembled to claim and to represent infringements of their rights. But did not the ancient laws sufficiently provide against such abuses—might not meetings, however, legal their objects degenerate into abuse and be attended with danger, and in all such cases not only by the common law but by the Riot act, might not all such excesses be checked; and when there was no other safe remedy, might not such tumultuous assemblies be peaceably dispersed, and even by force, when necessity justified such unfortunate recourse?—Why then, if the people were well satisfied with these restraints upon the irregularities of freedom, why outrage and insult them by putting the exercise of their immemorial and unquestionable privileges under the absolute control of magistrates, whose existences might be terminated in a moment, by a stroke of the pen, by his noble friend on the woolsack, he being himself a magistrate during the pleasure of the Crown. Not that I anticipate from him (said lord E.), any abuse of his authority; but if instead of being an honest man, as I think him, he were an angel sent down to us, and I could see his wings peeping out from under his gown, I would not trust the liberties of England in his hands,—liberties the gift of God himself to a wise and an undaunted people. Consistently with these liberties, and wisely for their preservation, the Crown had great and salutary powers for the preservation of the peace, and nothing therefore could be so rash as to undervalue those laws which the people had long been familiar to, and to begin to govern them by new ones, which though most offensively restrictive, created no greater security against disorder of any description; but, on the contrary, gave rise to a dangerous spirit of disaffection by the sense that public liberty had been infringed. Against the evils complained how easy was the remedy, by only putting the ancient laws into vigorous execution, quieting at the same time the agitated minds of the multitude, by yielding to his noble friend's advice on the first day of the session, to institute a calm and constitutional inquiry into the abuses and unnecessary violences they complained of. He was glad to see, therefore, even a noble lord who in general acted with ministers proposing some modification of the bill before them, and it gave him pleasure, because he remembered him in his cradle when his father was a companion at the bar. The power given to magistrates was indeed an absolute repeal of all meetings of the people, except when held under a roof, meetings which had been most unqualifiedly admitted by Mr. Pitt in 1795, to be constitutional and legal, so that there was now no right left to hold voluntary assemblies of the people for any object whatsoever, but at the will of the ministers and magistrates of the Crown. This was but a short sighted view of the principles which could alone produce affectionate and lasting submission to authority. From the moment the bill before them was passed into law, it was in the power of any one man who might be sent to utter some seditious expression, or rather some spy resident on the spot for the very purposes, to put an end in a moment to any meeting however legally assembled or peaceably conducted. He wondered at first why the exclusion of non residents was so tenaciously supported by his majesty's ministers, as even their own spies might have been shut out from attending them; but it had appeared by an attentive examination of the papers before them, and by all information, that they had spies resident in every quarter, and actually engaged in their nefarious and pernicious duty. There might be some kind of excuse for these new and harsh alterations, if the people at large

had become generally disaffected or discontented without cause. It was true undoubtedly that an universal distrust in parliament pervaded the country, and of course a desire for its reformation equally universal amongst the lower and middle orders, but was this spirit to be wondered at when the multitude were suffering privations and distresses unexampled, which they believed, and had the authority of the ablest and most public spirited men whom England had ever bred, for believing that all their sufferings had arisen from their irresistible power and influence of the Crown in the House of Commons from a deficient representation. Can I, my lords, for one (said lord E.), consent to consider the people as disaffected to parliament, and unjustly complaining of its neglect of duty to them, when I have myself for thirty years together been a loud and public complainer on the same account. They think that parliament blindly persevered for twenty-four years together in the war against France, after repeated opportunities lost of safe pacification, imposing upon our subjects whom it is now preparing to oppress for complaining of an insufferable and ruinous taxation. It is true that the period came at last when peace was impossible, and when imperious necessity demanded that Buonaparté should at all hazards be resisted, and I myself for that reason gave one vote for continuing our exertions, but which after even their almost miraculous termination, had left us rivals formidable to our prosperity, rivals in nations whom we had supported, and ourselves he hoped not fatally, but for the present miserably exhausted. Now if all these events were chargeable upon parliament in public opinion, was it sedition in the people to call loudly for reformation? Lord E. said, he was ready at all times to raise his voice against the mistaken clamours for annual parliaments or universal suffrage, and even if he thought that they would be an improvement of the constitution, he should equally resist them, from a perfect conviction that they never could be effected but through a sanguinary revolution; but this notion was not entertained by men capable of duly considering such a momentous subject, and was besides attributed to thousands who never had seriously considered or desired it. He had impaired his health and strength in defending the late Mr. Tooke, for being traitorously engaged to effect this object, though his letter to lord Ashburton which he (lord E.), had read upon the trial, was the ablest and most conclusive argument that the wit or wisdom of man could have composed upon the subject. Here he read several very striking passages in this letter, one particularly in which Mr. Tooke exposes, in the happiest manner, the difference between an equal right to a share in the representation, and a right to an equal share. If parliament did its duty, this nonsense of universal suffrage would soon pass away. It ought, therefore, by its conduct to redeem its character with the people, to secure their esteem and cultivate their affections. If this were done the people would feel with contentment and security that there was no other road to reform but by the consent of the legislature, and would duly appreciate whatever alterations its wisdom might enact. It was on that account he so highly approved of the measure which lord John Russell had suggested, because, whilst it established a principle, and pledged the House of Commons by its adoption, yet it imposed no limitation by its success, but left reformation open to all the arguments for its advancement, whilst it exposed the danger and the folly of seeking changes through tumult, which no wise man would consent to, even if peaceably and constitutionally within his reach. With regard to the irregularities against which all these new measures were directed, he thought their objects were grossly misrepresented, and their dangers overstated. He did not mean to enter into any defence of Mr. Hunt, but he saw no evidence whatever of his having any design or imagination to subvert the government, and thought the utmost extent of his offending, if he should be found to have been an offender, would be that he had been present at a meeting originally legal, but from its numbers most imprudent, and which had only become illegal and dangerous, if it were found to be illegal and dangerous, by the violences and the irregularities of others whom he had not at all offended, and to whom neither he nor those assembled with him were offering any resistance.—I conclude (said lord E.), by deeply regretting that public liberty which has been for ages the pride and glory of this country, is destined to undergo the degrading change which this and other measures are in my opinion so likely to produce.

The Earl of Darnley rejoiced that his

noble and learned friend, and his other noble friends, had so strenuously opposed the measures of ministers. Their eloquence had not been entirely thrown away, for some good had been done by the stand which they had made between the government and the people. The bill brought in by the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, owed all its improvements to the suggestions and exertions of his noble friend near him (lord Holland). With regard to the bill for preventing blasphemous libels, the punishment of transportation, which had been so pertinaciously maintained in its passage through that House, was at last given up; and for that concession on the part of ministers the country was indebted to the exertions of his noble friends in this and his hon. friends in the other House of Parliament. Libels had been permitted to go on without any notice being taken of them; but the punishment of transportation, which had been given up, was said to have been introduced in consequence of a particular case. The unfortunate man referred to had, however, been visited with a punishment for his second offence, which, to judge from the principles of human nature, was not likely to encourage the repetition of such conduct. With regard to the object of this bill, ministers had acted as in other cases. They had suffered meetings for the pretended purpose of petitioning to assemble under the control of demagogues, acting on the distress of the country. These assemblages had been allowed to go on without any thing being done to prevent them. In the mean time, the unfortunate transaction at Manchester had taken place, and the manner in which all inquiry had been stifled on that subject had driven the people to despair. The refusal of investigation, after parliament had assembled, must have increased the irritation. But what he chiefly complained of was, that no steps had been taken to put the existing law into execution, and that ministers had not appealed to parliament so soon as they ought to have done, if they really needed new powers. As yet they had not shown that the existing law was insufficient, and therefore had no right to call on parliament to pass such severe measures. He was against universal suffrage, because that was a system which would lead to all the horrors of revolution; but he was by no means the enemy of reform, and approved very much of what had fallen from his noble and learned friend on that subject. He was a reformer, because he was convinced that the constitution contained within itself the principle of reform. The noble and learned lord on the woolsack had shown himself a reformer by his bill for preventing delays in the administration of justice. He must oppose this measure, as no evidence to satisfy his mind had been produced to show that the existing law was insufficient to correct the evils complained of.

Lord Ellenborough, having proposed several amendments on clauses of the bill, wished to state the reasons which induced him to support it. He was the friend of public meetings, for he was of opinion that they were of great advantage in preserving freedom, and that they had been the means of maintaining the fabric of the constitution in energy and vigour. The late war could never have been carried on, had it not been for the spirit with which public meetings animated the country. Though he had objected to some of the clauses of the bill, he voted for it as a whole; because he believed that many of its enactments were calculated to restore to the people what they had lost—the advantage of free discussion; also to give to parliament what it had long lost—the means of ascertaining the opinion of the country, which it was impossible to know without free discussion. Now, to discover the real state of public opinion was impossible, if great bodies of people were allowed to move from one place to another, and to assemble at a particular point, as had been the case at Manchester, and there out-vote the resident inhabitants. Thus a very small minority, acting upon malignant motives, might give the semblance of an overwhelming majority. He voted for this measure because it left untouched all those kinds of public meetings which were known when the Bill of Rights and the Habeas Corpus act passed; because it left untouched all those meetings which had been legally known to the country for the last century and a half, during which this country had been raised to the highest pitch of prosperity. He voted for it too because it prevented such meetings as those of Manchester and Birmingham; because it prevented the harangues of itinerant orators, and the display of physical force. A very material change had within these thirty years taken place, with respect to this and every other government of Europe. The progress of education, and the influence of the press, had brought public opinion more in contact with the government than before. Was it advisable when such a revolution in the state of society had taken place, to add to it the influence of that kind of meetings, which consisted in the display of a great physical force, assumed for the purpose of over-awing the government? It was important neither too greatly to relax, nor to draw too close the connexion between the people and the legislature. If the bonds which unite them were too much relaxed, the people were apt to imagine that their interests were disregarded. If they were drawn too close, an undue impulse must be given to the representative body, which would thereby become liable to the most dangerous versatility. Great wisdom was necessary to preserve the proper balance. If the public meetings of the kind which had taken place were allowed to go on, he doubted not that many of them would still meet and disperse quietly, but then it would be to watch the opportunity to abate that nuisance of government against which they passed resolutions. Under such circumstances the government could not stand six months longer. It was the great advantage of parish meetings, that they admitted of free discussion. The speakers would be known to each other, and the character of each speaker would probably be known to all who attended the meeting. He considered the present bill as a solemn warning to the disaffected, that they would not be suffered to carry their designs into practice; and also a solemn pledge to the well-affected, that parliament was resolved to protect them. He was above all things anxious that the bill should pass, because he wished to legislate while we yet had the opportunity so to do. It would be too late if rebellion was suffered to show its head; for then there could be no question but to put it down. He was, however, most anxious to avoid that painful necessity; for in civil contests, victory and defeat were almost equally to be dreaded. In passing the bill on the table, their lordships would grant nearly all that ministers had demanded of them. But after all should be given that was asked, he must say, that that would not be sufficient unless their lordships resolved to look at the situation of the country, and endeavoured to discover the hidden sources of the danger which threatened it. To show that parliament felt for and with the people, would tend more than any other measure that could be adopted to tranquillize the country. All the acts their lordships might pass, were in themselves mere waste paper, if they had not with them the hearts of the people. Of this he was convinced—that if, on investigation, it was shown to the country, that the public difficulties arose from unavoidable circumstances, and that nothing was neglected on the part of parliament to correct them, there remained in the national character sufficient firmness to bear with any calamity. An inquiry into the cause of the distress which had subsisted for the last five years would be of more importance than any bills that could be passed. Above all, it was necessary to show, that the people were united in support of that constitution, which, to sum up all its advantages in one short sentence, had raised man to a nobler rank in this country, than in any other in the world.

Earl Grosvenor should not have troubled their lordships upon the present occasion, but for a petition which he had been requested to present from the city of Westminster. The petitioners were anxious to state their case to their lordships, and to induce the House to sanction the introduction of a clause, by way of rider, which would have the effect of excepting them from the severer operation of this measure. The petitioners grounded their claim to this privilege, more particularly upon an expression which had fallen from a noble earl, a member of the administration and president of the council. That noble lord, the petitioners stated, had observed, in emphatic terms, upon the tranquil character of the meetings held in the city of Westminster, and had contrasted the meetings held in various parts of the country with those convened in Westminster. Whether the petitioners were or were not mistaken in this point, at least noble lords would allow that a petition from the city of Westminster was one worthy of attention. The petitioners so far flattered themselves, that they thought they were worthy of the character given to them, and were therefore most anxious that the clause which he had already alluded to should be introduced. For the purpose of considering this clause, perhaps it might be advisable to adjourn the debate to some future day.

The Earl of Liverpool said, it was impossible for the noble lord to do what he proposed in this stage of the bill, viz. to introduce a new clause after the bill had been read a third time. It was competent for the noble lord to move the adjournment of the debate, but the opportunity was past for introducing any new clause.

The Lord Chancellor observed, that after the third reading of the bill had been agreed to, the question then arose upon the passing of the bill. Upon this latter question their lordships were now debating; and, according to all the rules of debate which he had ever heard of, no clause could be introduced in this stage of the measure. The noble lord might, indeed, move for the adjournment of the debate, but no reason had yet been assigned for such a motion.

Earl Grosvenor feared that it was now too late to propose the introduction of any clause. It was, however, competent for him to move an amendment to the original motion, for an adjournment, for the purpose of considering the contents of the parchment he held in his hand. The petitioners imagined that the officer to whom the power was given of calling these meetings, however respectable he might be individually, yet might probably be influenced; and instanced the case of the refusal of the high bailiff to call a meeting to consider the proceedings at Manchester on the 16th of August. With respect to the bill itself, he strongly objected to it in principle, inasmuch as it tended to check the disposition in the people to petition for the removal of their grievances; but he really thought some regulations were requisite with respect to the mode of holding the meetings. It had been observed by a noble lord, that the itinerant orators and demagogues were the cause of the discontent throughout the country. In this observation he begged to differ most widely from the noble lord, because he conceived that it was the discontent which gave rise to the demagogues; and if that discontent were increased by the coercive measures of the government, instead of these itinerant orators being confined to one or two local spots, the whole country would be covered with them, and every parish would have its particular demagogues.

The Earl of Harrowby said, that as far as he was enabled to recollect, the only expression which had dropped from him respecting the Westminster meetings were these:—He was observing upon the meetings which had been held in former times, and referred to certain assemblies convened in 1780. In touching upon this subject, he had alluded to a meeting held in Westminster, not consisting of all the populace of the city, but confined to the inhabitant householders only. With this explanation, which he felt it his duty to make, he should content himself, and leave the House to judge as to the propriety of receiving the petition.

The Earl of Blesington rose to repeat the objection he had urged last night to the extension of the bill to Ireland. However unsuccessful he might be in his efforts, he felt fully convinced that this measure was not in the least qualified for Ireland, although it might be calculated to prevent farther disturbances in this country. Under all the grievances under which Ireland had suffered, under all her oppressions and calamities arising from famine and disease, under all the distressing circumstances caused by the act of Union, that country had not complained, but had quietly borne the load of suffering. What then was the return for this praiseworthy conduct? Little relief had been afforded or attention paid; and now, as a farther reward to that unhappy country, the government was about to favour it with this protecting measure. He alluded to the hopes held out to the Protestants on the one hand against emancipation, and on the other to the Catholics in favour of their freedom; and affirmed that Mr. Pitt had resigned his office upon this very question. To neither party had satisfaction been given; for emancipation had neither been granted, nor entirely refused. He concluded with giving notice of his intention, after the recess, to move for a committee to inquire into the state of Ireland.

The Earl of Liverpool felt anxious to impress upon the House this fact—that the bill could not operate as a prejudice to Ireland. With respect to what had fallen from the noble earl as to the act of Union, he thought it was a little too much, after the lapse of many years, that the noble earl should now come forward to make a deliberate attack upon it. With regard to what had been said relative to the question of Catholic emancipation, he should be glad to know whence the noble earl obtained his information. Fortunately there was a most complete record, which perhaps it would not be quite regular for him now to refer to, of the sentiments of the right hon. gentleman referred to contained in his speech delivered in parliament. If the noble earl would look into that record, he would find no such intimation as he had stated. He could not allow it to be said that Ireland had been oppressed, and that this country had done nothing to relieve its distress. He begged the noble earl, before he made such assertion, to inspect the Journals of the House. By these it would be found that this country had relieved Ireland of the whole burden of its debt. This, he would undertake to say, was a most important relief to the people of Ireland, and as great a boon as ever was granted by one country to another. But this was not all; the noble earl seemed entirely to have forgotten, that from the burden of the property-tax Ireland was relieved altogether.

The bill was then passed.

PROTESTS AGAINST THE SEDITIOUS MEETINGS PREVENTION BILL.] The following protest against going into a committee on the bill was entered on the Journals by the earl of Lauderdale:

“Dissentient,

“First, Because this bill, as well as the other measures extending the severity of our penal code, have been avowedly adopted under a belief that there at present exists amongst the manufacturers of this country, a very extended combination engaged in a plot for the destruction of our constitution, and the overthrow of all social order.

“Whilst to me it appears that no evidence of such a plot has been given; that if an inquiry into the state of the country had been instituted, it would have been shown that no such plot existed, and that the alarming symptoms of disaffection to the constituted authorities of the country, which have been locally displayed, arise from the arts and the evil designs of a few operating upon an extra population reduced into a state of misery from want of employment, and consequently of clothing and of food.

“That this is the real state of the evil under which we now labour, cannot be doubted by any man who reflects on the certain consequences of the policy which this country has for years pursued, who possesses a knowledge of the real state of manufacturing labour, or who gives credit to the scanty information which ministers have thought fit to lay before parliament.

“That the revenue and expenditure of all countries must be equivalent, if left to the natural course of things, is a proposition so generally admitted as to require no illustration.

“But in this country it appears that betwixt the end of the year 1794, and the beginning of the year 1819, there was added to our debt the sum of 899,537,141*l.*, which on the supposition that government, borrowing in 3, 4, and 5 per cents., received in cash 75*l.* for each 100*l.* of capital added to the debt, proves that during that space of time 674,652,858*l.* were received out of the capital of the country, and expended by government, making on an average during these 24 years, an expenditure of 28,110,535*l.* per annum.

“This extra expenditure, beyond what the revenue naturally afforded, must therefore have created a formidable increase in the demand for labour; a rise in the value of labour must have ensued; and it is not in the nature of things that this extended demand continuing for 24 years must not have increased the population so as to adjust the supply of labour to the demand for it.

“But this is not all, every nation in Europe has been more or less engaged in similar practices; and in the state of our manufactures it is impossible that an extra expenditure on the part of any European nation must not have created an extra demand for labour in this country.

“In this situation of things, it appears to me obvious, that a general cessation from this practice must, by suddenly diminishing the demand for labour, leave this manufacturing country in a state in which the supply of labour must be lamentably great in proportion to the demand for it, and consequently that a great fall in the wages of labour must naturally ensue.

“Such a fall in the wages of labour cannot, however, take place without greatly adding to the evil. The man, who from his labour can acquire 3*s.* or 4*s.* a day, is, as experience teaches us, generally led from a desire of indulgence to work only four days in a week: whilst the man who, with the utmost exertion of 6 days' labour, can only obtain 7*s.* or 8*s.* a week, is driven, by a desire to secure to himself and his family a scanty subsistence, to renounce all relaxation, and even to add to the hours usually devoted to labour.

"It follows, then, that those who are employed must by their exertions execute a greater quantity of labour, and by that means greatly increase the numbers thrown out of employment.

"That this is no fanciful theory, but, on the contrary, a true detail of the origin and of the nature of the evil under which the manufacturing districts are now suffering, is known to every man who has access to accurate information upon the subject; and it appears to me to be fully confirmed by the scanty information which his majesty's government have laid on the table of this House.

"By the Manchester magistrates we are informed, 'that the secretary of state 'was fully apprised of the deep distresses 'of the manufacturing classes of that extensive population, and that the disaffected and ill-disposed lost no opportunity of instilling the worst principles 'into the unhappy sufferers; attributing 'their calamities, not to any event which 'cannot be controlled, but to the general measures of government and parliament: and they add, that when 'people are oppressed with hunger, they 'do not wonder at their giving ear to 'any doctrines which they are told will 'redress their grievances.'

"In Yorkshire, too, we are informed by the lord-lieutenant of that county, 'that the mayor of Leeds believed that 'the mass of the population within his 'jurisdiction was by no means disaffected, or seditiously disposed; but 'they were suffering most cruel privations through want of employment.' Lord Fitzwilliam also states, as the general opinion of the county of York, 'that the real grievance of the people 'was want of employment.'

"Again, 'the acerbation of temper 'among the weavers (at Westleigh) is 'stated to be produced by severe privations from the lowness of wages; and those who know the real situation of Glasgow and Paisley, can have no hesitation in asserting, that the manufacturers at present exhibit a scene of wretchedness unparalleled in the history of any civilized country.

"Secondly, because, if this is a correct view of the causes of the present discontent and disturbed state of the manufacturing districts; and if it be true, as lord Bacon has long ago wisely observed, 'that so many overthrown 'estates, so many votes for troubles;'

'that poverty is the matter of sedition; and 'that the first remedy or prevention 'is to remove by all means possible 'the material cause of sedition, which 'is want and poverty;' it appears to me that this bill, and the other measures which have been adopted, can of themselves effect no good, unaccompanied by measures for the relief of those whom our policy has reduced to a state of want.

"I have no hesitation in admitting, that neither the political institutions of this or of any other country were ever framed to govern a people so nearly deprived of food; and that in this unparalleled state of distress, local and temporary alterations of our laws may be necessary, not only to suppress the evil effects which may arise from the sufferings of the people, but to curb the mischievous intentions of those, who from views of interest or ambition, may attempt to mislead them.

"There are, therefore, no local or temporary regulations calculated to give vigour to the exertions of our military force, in repressing the mischiefs which we have but too good reason to expect, to which, if coupled with wise attempts to remove the present cause of discontent, I would not feel it my duty to give my support.

"But I must regard measures of severity, unaccompanied with any effort for removing the causes of the evil, or even with any expression of sympathy for the sufferings of those whom we have reduced to penury, as likely to lead to a feeling of despair, which can only add to the dangers so justly to be dreaded.

"For to me it appears, that by prohibiting public meetings, we may generate secret and private cabals; that by preventing vague threats, to divide property and to have recourse to force, we may give rise to a scene of pilfering, thieving, and perhaps of private assassination; that by suppressing the open and public expression of all those wild dreams to which distress and despair naturally give rise in the minds of men trained under a free government, we may debase the spirit and corrupt the morals of the people; but that it is by kindness and sympathy with their sufferings, and by administering as far as possible to their relief, to which we can only look, as the means of restoring that love and admiration of our political institutions, and that pride in the frame of our free constitution, which have heretofore formed the envy of foreigners, and the universal and well-founded boast of the people of this country.

“ Thirdly. Because I cannot think it is fitting in the parliament of this country, who have expended millions in protecting foreign emigrants and African negroes, as well as in the relief of the peasantry of the various states of Europe, to abstain from all attempts to relieve the wants of our manufacturers, on the ground stated in these debates—that nothing can be done to mitigate their sufferings, without violating the true principles of political economy.

“ If, indeed, this proposition (which alike impeaches all public institutions for the relief of the wretched) were true, I should feel great doubt whether the government had a right to revert to the strict observance of the principles of political economy, the moment it suited the policy of the day, though the preservation of our manufactures demanded a departure from them; more especially at a time when their sufferings clearly originate from government having violated every sound principle of political economy by a forced expenditure continued for 24 years.

“ To me, however, it appears, that there is nothing inconsistent with the soundest principles of political economy, at a time when the class of manufacturing labours are reduced by the measures pursued for the supposed benefit of the community to a state of want, and when the labourers in agriculture as well as in the formation of articles which administer to the luxurious wants of the opulent, are comparatively well employed, in maintaining that it would be right to impose a tax on funded and landed property for the benefit of our manufactures; as this operation would only abstract a portion of the funds destined to reward the labour of one class of the community now at their ease, for the purpose of giving employment and subsistence to those who have neither.

“ It is true that the produce of such a tax must not be employed in the manufacture of goods, which, by overstocking the market, might tend to deprive others of a demand for their labour.

“ But, if prudently expended by furnishing employment to the destitute, in the improvement of roads, canals, and other works of permanent public utility, or in giving to them the means of emigrating to our colonies, I must be of opinion that, under present circumstances, it is a measure not only consistent with the soundest principles of political economy, but even loudly called for by every feeling of a desire for self-preservation, and by every principle of justice and of humanity.

(Signed) “ LAUDERDALE.”

The following Protest against the third reading of the bill was also entered on the Journals:

“ Dissentient,

1st. “ Because the laws of England, when duly enforced, have always been found sufficient to prevent any confusion arising from popular meetings, or to punish any disturbers of the public peace; and a too ready acquiescence in the suggestions of ministers for imposing new restraints upon the rights and usage of the people (even if the provisions of the bill were in themselves neither harsh nor unreasonable), appears to us more calculated to add weight to calumny, and to exasperate discontent into hostility, than to defeat the designs of turbulent men, or to reclaim the alienated affections of a mistaken multitude.

2ndly. “ Because the powers entrusted by this bill to magistrates are liable to great abuse, and those who disobey them exposed to dreadful and disproportionate punishment. On the surmise that a stranger is present in a crowd, or on the application of a vague definition to the words of a notice, or to the language of an orator, a justice of peace may proclaim a meeting to be unlawful; and an Englishman may become a felon for continuing, even through inadvertence, half an hour on a spot where no breach of the peace has been committed.

3rdly. “ Because the numerous assemblies alleged in the preamble to be the occasion and justification of the bill, have been confined to particular districts, but the restrictions and penalties thereof are generally extended to the whole kingdom, and even to Ireland, where no such practices have ever prevailed.

4thly. “ Because this bill, combined with the restrictions of the press, which have already passed, or have been announced in this House, is obviously intended to fetter all free discussion, and to repress, if not stifle, the expression of public opinion.—Large meetings, in periods of political ferment, furnish the means of ascertaining the designs and measuring the strength of the mal-contents; they tend to disunite and discredit the rash and mischievous agitators of a mistaken multitude, and they not unfrequently serve as a vent, comparatively innoxious, of that ill-humour and discontent, which, if suppressed might seek refuge in secret cabals and conspiracies, dangerous to the safety of individuals in authority, and subversive of the peace and happiness of society. ## HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, December 21.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES AND SAVINGS BANKS.] Mr. B. Wilbraham had to put a question to the chancellor of the exchequer, which, however ridiculous it might seem, was of great importance to the labouring population of Lancashire. It was reported amongst them that the government was about to seize the funds of the Friendly societies and Savings banks, and apply them to the payment of the national debt [a laugh]. This report had been caught up by persons little conversant in political matters, and had actually caused the breaking up of friendly societies, to the great loss of those who had claims on them. He was aware that it was impossible for the government to touch any of these funds, and that the report must have been circulated by designing persons. What, perhaps, enabled them to give currency to the report was, that in the last act for the amendment of the acts relating to Friendly societies, the money of these societies was directed to be lodged in the hands of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. He wished to hear a declaration on the subject from the authority which in that House was alone competent to give it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that even after the experience of the extent to which malignity and absurdity could go in the propagation of reports injurious to the administration, he had not been prepared for such a rumour as that alluded to by the hon. gentleman. It was utterly groundless; there was not the smallest foundation for it, either in fact or possibility. Under the authority of parliament, the money belonging to Friendly societies and Savings banks was kept entirely apart from the public money; and even if the Treasury were base enough, they had not the power to misappropriate those funds.

Mr. Brougham observed, that this was not the only time when such reports had been circulated. When the education committee was sitting, it was asserted that its intention was to seize all charitable funds, and to turn the two universities into charity schools. He was afraid that the declaration of the chancellor of the exchequer would not be effectual, as he had had an example of the inefficacy of facts or reason on such reports, in the case he had alluded to.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer hoped his declaration would be effectual, when it was known that not a single contributor to the Friendly societies or Savings banks had ever been deprived of his money by government.

Mr. Calcraft said, that it might be also said, in the way of consolation, to the people in Lancashire, that they need be under no alarm as to the paying off the national debt with the money of Savings banks, for that no money would be applied to that purpose at all. Till the last year there had been a sinking fund of fifteen millions; now there was only nominally a sinking fund of five millions; and that would probably fall so much short by the deficiency of the revenue, that nothing at all would be applied to that purpose.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he anticipated no probability of any material deviation from the plan laid down by parliament in the last session.

ORANGE LODGES AT LIVERPOOL.] Mr. Canning begged to remind an hon. gentleman opposite of a statement which he had made on a former evening respecting a clergyman who had preached a sermon at an Orange procession, calculated rather to inflame than to allay the passions of his hearers. He was not at that time acquainted with the circumstances which the hon. gentleman stated, nor did he know the name of the clergyman; but he had since received a letter from him, denying many of the circumstances mentioned, and declaring that the sermon which he had been requested to preach on that occasion, and which he had consented to preach as any other clergyman would have done in ordinary civility, was by no means of the tendency which had been represented. He mentioned the text from which he preached, and he (Mr. Canning) thought it a sort of guarantee against doctrines such as had been imputed to him: it was, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." He had made inquiries respecting the reverend gentleman himself, and had found that he was highly respectable in character.

Mr. Bennet expressed himself obliged to the right hon. gentleman for the opportunity afforded him of removing any erroneous impression which he might have been the means of occasioning. In the report which had been given of his speech on the night to which the right hon. gentleman alluded, he had seen many things which he did not state. He had been made to say, that the procession went to church bearing effigies, with the insignia of a pope and a bishop; that on their arrival at the church, they stripped the effigies of their robes, and threw them into the fire; and that then a clergyman preached a sermon which was nothing less than sedition. Now, he stood in the judgment of the House, whether he had said this. As to his having charged the clergyman with preaching sedition, all he had said on that subject was—"I conceive a sermon preached under such circumstances, to be sedition against man, and blasphemy against God." He was quite ready to admit that this clergyman, or any other who acted as he had done, thought he was doing right, but still he must disapprove of his conduct.

STATE OF THE LABOURING POOR OF SCOTLAND.] Lord A. Hamilton said, the House were so often under the painful necessity of hearing of the distresses of the country, that he felt divided between the aversion to occupy their time, and the sense of duty to the county he represented. The petition which he had to present came from the presbytery of Hamilton, and gave the details of the misery and degradation of a large portion of that county. It was from a body of men who seldom approached that House—a presbytery, which consisted, as gentlemen acquainted with Scotland knew, of the clergymen of several parishes (in this case of 14). The petitioners stated, that according to the rules of the church government of Scotland, it was their duty to inquire into the state of their flocks. That they found that the wages of a labouring man were not sufficient to maintain a family—that many labouring men could not attend the churches for want of decent clothes; and that from the pressure of poverty the education of their children was often neglected—that there existed much disaffection, which, though not springing directly from want, was the result of designing men working on poverty. He hoped the House would take into its consideration the distresses of the labouring poor, for it would but have half done its work if it merely suppressed disaffection, which, while want prevailed, would continually recur. Among other means of relieving the distress without applying for public money, it had occurred to him that there was much waste land in that neighbourhood, of which the proprietors would willingly relinquish their rights in behalf of the poor for a term of years, if the government would also relinquish the taxes.

Mr. Kennedy bore testimony to the high respectability of the petitioners, whose statements spoke too strongly for themselves to need the aid of his assertions. When it was considered that an attention to the ordinances of religion, and a care for the education of their children, had been among the marked characteristics of the Scottish population, the distress would be conceived to be severe which had compelled them to neglect these duties. That part of the country from which the petition came was in this respect peculiarly unfortunate, that having been the seat of flourishing manufactures, the persons once engaged in them were now thrown as burthens upon the landholders.

Sir W. De Crespigny hoped that the political economists, who had ridiculed the plan he had proposed for examination (that of Mr. Owen), would think of some practical means of relieving the poor.

Lord Castlereagh said, his majesty's government had not been inattentive to the distresses of Scotland, but they doubted whether they could take measures to relieve it by public money, without injustice to the whole empire. Cases of as severe distress had occurred in other parts, especially in England; and in the answer of the earl of Liverpool to the duke of Hamilton, the noble earl had stated that he saw no principle on which he could apply the resources of the country at large to the relief of that local distress. The proprietors of land in Scotland had the power, though they were not subjected to the obligation, of assessing themselves for the relief of the poor; and though they had gone as far as it was expected they should in the way of voluntary contributions, it was to be recollected that many proprietors in this part of the island had been taxed for the maintenance of the poor to the whole extent of their property, and it was only by that heavy contribution that the cry of the poor was prevented from reaching that House. He allowed there was a peculiar pressure of distress in the district alluded to, arising, among various causes, from that alternation of manufacturing prosperity and stagnation, which was the distinguishing feature of the present day. As to relief from the public, it was known that some time ago a certain sum was placed in the hands of commissioners, to be issued to relieve manufacturing distress, security being given for the re-payment. Half a million of that sum now remained unexpended in the hands of the commissioners, and was strictly applicable to that part of Scotland, and would be advanced if any visible security for re-payment in three, four, or five years, could be assigned. It was also the intention of the chancellor of the exchequer to move a vote under the head of civil contingencies, which would obviate difficulties as to the securities to be assigned. The gentlemen of Scotland, therefore, had the power of assisting themselves. For a long series of years they had been free from the evil of compulsory assessments; he hoped they would now be inclined to avail themselves of the power they possessed, especially as the whole burthen might not fall upon them within a year, but might be extended over a long course of years. In this part of the country there was no relief from the immediate pressure of an assessment which might operate within the year to the extent of the whole of the property assessed. But in Scotland the proprietors had no such burthen upon their rental. Would it then be fair, that the proprietors of England, amidst all the distress which surrounded them, should be called upon, not only to relieve the distress of their own poor, but also to contribute to the relief of the poor of Scotland? It would at least become the proprietors of that part of the kingdom, to show that they had done all that was in their power for the poor of their respective districts, before they made any application of this nature.

Mr. Douglas alleged, that the proprietary of Scotland had left nothing in their power undone, to mitigate the sufferings, and relieve the wants of their distressed countrymen. But what he meant to refer to in the question which he yesterday took occasion to put to the noble lord was, with regard to the commercial relations of the country, and the general state of its manufactures, into which he thought a serious inquiry should be immediately instituted. It was obviously the change which had taken place in the country with respect to commerce and manufactures, that had occasioned the existing distress, and parliament was called upon to consider of some means to remedy the evils resulting from that change.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, the House had now before it a petition in favour of a number of industrious deserving manufacturers, which contained such a detail of calamity as could not be heightened either by the speech of his noble friend or by any colouring that eloquence could confer, and yet the noble lord gravely and coolly said, that neither parliament nor government could do any thing for the relief or mitigation of such calamity, beyond a certain sum that might be lent on security for its repayment. But how did it become the noble lord and his colleagues thus to reply to a petition concerning the distressed manufacturers, considering that the great cause of their misery was to be found in the policy which those ministers had been pursuing for a series of years? The noble lord had observed, that the Scotch proprietors should show an adequate sympathy for their poor countrymen, before they applied to that House for pecuniary relief, especially as those proprietors had a power of levying taxes upon themselves. This sympathy, he would tell the noble lord, had been evinced by the Scotch proprietors, who had levied taxes upon themselves for the relief of their poor; but the fact was, that the property which they possessed was not sufficient to afford the amount of relief required. But, independently of the taxes paid in common by these proprietors, each was found as beneficent as his means qualified him towards his distressed neighbour. It came to his knowledge, that the relation of an hon. friend of his, who was a member of that House, allowed, out of his own private purse, no less than eight pounds a week for the relief of the poor in his immediate vicinity.

—But the noble lord appeared to think that, notwithstanding the experience of this country, Scotland should be visited with the evils of the poor laws. To such a proposition, he hoped that House would never give its assent. But it was vain to think of any palliatives for the distress of the people, or to attempt to evade its consideration. The noble lord and his colleagues might go on in persuading parliament to adopt coercive measures to meet some part of the consequence resulting from the present distress, but those measures must be inefficient while the great cause of the evil was allowed to remain without redress or inquiry.

Lord Castlereagh disclaimed any wish to transfer the poor laws to Scotland; but he would repeat, that while the proprietors of England were incumbered with the poor's rate, in addition to their other burthens, it would be too much to expect that they should also contribute from their funds to the relief of the poor of Scotland, while the proprietors of that country were altogether exempt from the poor laws.

Mr. Ellice animadverted upon the declaration of the noble lord, that government was ready to lend money for the relief of the people, provided security were given for its repayment. But when the noble lord made this proposition, he would ask, whether it was possible that he or any reasoning man thought that the present distress was merely temporary? For his own part, he believed that this distress, so far from being temporary, was increasing every day; and he was persuaded that it must continue to become still worse, unless measures were promptly taken to relieve the trade and finances of the country. He hoped that before the recess the House would have some opportunity of delivering an opinion upon these important topics, and especially upon that of finance. The House might go on in passing coercive measures to meet the effect of the present system, but these were only temporising expedients, and unless the great questions to which he had referred, should be gone into, parliament would have closed its present sittings without having done any good. They might think that they had removed alarm, but let it be recollected that the evil which gave rise to alarm—that the distress and discontents of the people, still remained.

Mr. V. Blake suggested, that to secure the payment of the interest of the proposed loan, a new toll should be imposed on the roads in the district to which that loan was to be granted.

Mr. Wilberforce hoped it was the impression upon every man's mind in this case, that some relief should be afforded to the poor people to whom the petition referred; for in a country where there was so much wealth, it would be quite inhuman to allow persons of this description to suffer absolute want. Were these poor persons among the disaffected, that might be a reason for feeling less sympathy in their favour; but even that would not justify the House in turning a deaf ear to their complaints. Here, however, those, for whom relief was supplicated were as remarkable for the propriety of their demeanour, as for the severity of their sufferings. There was, no doubt, a material difference between the situation of England and Scotland, in consequence of the application of a portion of the poor's rate in this country to the payment of wages: but this application was one of the many evils belonging to the system of the poor's rates, to which system he hoped that House would devote its serious attention; for the evils of this system were of grievous magnitude.

Mr. Calcraft concurred with the noble lord, that as this was a question between England and Scotland, it would be unfair to burthen the proprietors of the former for the relief of the poor of the latter, especially as the proprietors of Scotland were exempt from the poor laws, through the mal-administration of which the people of England suffered so severely. But while he deprecated the mal-administration of this system, he begged to be understood as a decided advocate for the principle of the poor laws. If any proposition should be made for the repeal of those laws he would stand up as its opponent. For he was quite convinced of the equity of the principle of those laws, however he lamented their improper administration, and especially the misappropriation of the funds collected by those laws in the payment of wages.

Sir J. Mackintosh protested against the view which had been taken of this subject on both sides of the House. He protested, in the first place, against the observation of his hon. friend, that this was a question between England and Scot-and; and secondly, against the doctrine of the noble lord, that no relief should be granted to the poor, who were the subject of this petition, unless the proprietary of the district should submit to the poor's rate. To the observation of his hon. friend he would say, that he thought parliament equally bound to attend to the complaints, or to relieve the distress of every part of the inhabitants of Great-Britain, all of whom had contributed to form the fund from which that relief was solicited; and to the position of the noble lord he would observe, that it would not be right to extend the poor laws to Scotland. But while he said this, let it not be understood that he was an enemy to the principle of these laws. That principle was indeed so entwined with the institutions of this country, that any one who should propose the repeal of the laws which rested upon it, must be deemed fitter for another place than for that House. But if these laws were restored to their original use, they would create no dissatisfaction in the country. It was their mal-administration, and especially the misappropriation of the funds in payment of wages, which had occasioned so much discontent. But, to return to the petition, he trusted that its prayer would be duly attended, and that some relief would be granted to such a deserving class of sufferers who, in fact, desired only to be employed and to be rewarded for their industry by the means of common subsistence.

Lord A. Hamilton, on moving that the petition should be printed, stated, that it was a mistake to suppose, that there were no poor's rates in Scotland, those rates being very considerable, although there were no poor laws in that country. But even if the system of poor laws were established in Scotland, were gentlemen aware that there were no less than between 20 and 30,000 persons in Glasgow who were not natives of that country, and how were those persons to be relieved? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had last year obtained from parliament the grant of 100,000*l.* for building churches in Scotland, on the ground that the people were in want of such churches, but there was a paragraph in this petition stating that the people could not go to church from want of clothing. Would it not, then, be but considerate in the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, to consider of the means of supplying the people with that clothing, without which these new churches would be of no utility.

Mr. Maberly argued against the principle upon which it was proposed to accede to the prayer of this petition. The manufacturers and merchants of Scotland had, as well as the same classes in other places, materially profited from that monopoly of trade which Great Britain had enjoyed throughout the war. Those people, through whose labour that profit was obtained, were now distressed in consequence of the cessation of that monopoly; and was it fair, that instead of having their distress relieved by the capitalists whom they had enriched, that relief should be demanded from the public funds? He called upon the House to resist such a demand; any concession to it must serve to establish a most dangerous precedent.

Ordered to be printed.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Lord A. Hamilton rose to move for the re-appointment of the Committee to inquire into the state of the Scotch Burghs. He understood, that no opposition on the part of ministers was intended to the motion. The only alteration he should propose, was, to substitute, in the place of a gentleman who was not likely to attend, another hon. member. The report that was made by the former committee, was before the House, and he could appeal to it, as confirming every observation he had ever uttered on the subject. The abuses proved to exist, were so gross, so perpetual, and he might say, so flagitious, that nothing but an investigation into the causes could provide a remedy. These abuses sprung from the practice of self-election in corporate bodies endowed with the power of perpetuating the abuse. When he had introduced the subject first to the consideration of the House, it was retorted upon him, that whatever he might profess, his object was parliamentary reform. He repeated now what he then stated, that neither himself nor the petitioners from the Royal Burghs sought parliamentary reform directly, although neither he nor they disguised from the House, that any alteration in the burghs must collaterally and in a small degree affect the representation in that House. If parliamentary reform grew out of the change, it would do so collaterally, and not directly. The strength of the existing abuses were fully illustrated in the fact, that three most populous places, Inverness, Aberdeen, and even Edinburgh, were under a sentence of disfranchisement. As to Edinburgh, though he saw in his place the right hon. member (Mr. W. Dundas), yet it was now a question before the Court of Session, whether there had been an election or not? Aberdeen was in a worse state, as it had no vote whatever. Inverness, he believed to be in the same predicament. Under these circumstances, he was warranted in asking the House to pursue the inquiry further. The noble lord concluded with moving, "that the Petitions from the Royal Burghs of Scotland be referred to a Select Committee."

Mr. W. Dundas observed, that the noble lord, in moving for the renewal of the Committee, had said a great deal, of which he (Mr. D.), had never heard before, and which was not in any degree confirmed, even by the luminous report of the last committee. As to the election of Edinburgh, the only question arose from the chance absence of one of the magistrates. The noble lord had stated the Burgh of Aberdeen to be bankrupt; that he denied, and dared him to the proof. The noble lord had that night struggled to show, that parliamentary reform was not his object; he believed the noble lord before to feel that parliament would not suffer those corporate rights, guaranteed by the articles of the Union, to be shaken. All that could be expected was, to replace the boroughs in the state in which they stood previously to that compact, so that no burgess should be made liable to debts, over which he had no control.

Mr. Forbes reminded the House, that during the discussions of last session, he had uniformly maintained, that the burgh of Aberdeen was not bankrupt. He could now prove that facts justified his opinion: Aberdeen was paying an interest of four per cent on all its debts, and in the course of a year five per cent would be paid up on the arrears of the two last years. The town of Aberdeen was considered good security, and most of its creditors would feel greatly disappointed were the debts paid off. He did not rise to oppose the motion, for as far as the labours of the first Committee went, they were as productive of as little evil as of good.

The motion was agreed to, and Committee appointed.

CHELSEA PENSION LIST.] Lord Nugent rose, pursuant to notice, to move, "That there be laid before this House, a return of the number of persons liable to be struck off from the Chelsea Out Pension List, in consequence of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's Proclamation, dated 28th October 1819; distinguishing those who originally enlisted for seven years under the Act 46 Geo. 3rd, whose time of service, according to engagement, has expired, and who are entitled under that act to certain pensions in consideration of wounds." His object in so moving was, to be enabled to move hereafter, for leave to bring in a bill to expunge so much from the act, commonly called the Chelsea Pension Act, as affected a certain number of persons now deprived, unjustly as he conceived, of pensions intended for the reward of their service. He did this with the greater pleasure, not only as he conceived that his motion affected a strong subject of public inquiry, and a subject involving points of no small constitutional importance; but also, because it affected a class of persons, than whose claims, he would venture to say, on the justice, the sympathy, the humanity, and the gratitude of this country, it would be difficult to conceive any of a more sacred or imperious character. These men had come forward at the very time when it was found necessary to recruit the army by a new and invigorating system, in order to enable it to cope against a veteran and successful enemy. They had earned their well-contested glories, and had now retired on small but honourable pensions; which pensions, if the law had any power at all, the law of the land ought to establish as their property. He required parliament to look at their own acts, and to look at, what he thought, the illegal proclamation of October last. That proclamation set forth, that all those persons (excepting certain regiments only from its operation) who should not report themselves for a certain length of service, should be deprived of the pensions which they then enjoyed. Now, there were many hundreds who would be affected by this proclamation; particularly those (whose claims he should support) who were originally destined for seven years service; and who, having received certain wounds, were entitled to certain pensions, settled by the provisions of what was commonly called Mr. Windham's act. Such persons having received their discharges, and being in fact, no longer soldiers, he would ask by what right, by what law, by what power, they could now be deprived of the pensions awarded to them by the act. He confined himself to that description of persons whose term of service had expired, and who received such pensions. An hon. gentleman the other night had required them to admit the right of the Crown to deprive persons of their pensions, even in cases where they had been granted for life: he did not intend to answer his requisition; he would not answer it, because it was not relevant to this subject—but more particularly because, if necessary, he could find cases directly to the point, which would go quite counter to the hon. gentleman's assertion. His own case was that of persons who had served their term of service; and he rested it upon three grounds—upon enactments, upon regulations, and upon authorities: on enactments, because of Mr. Windham's bill; on authorities, because of the opinions expressed in the speeches of all the hon. gentlemen who had spoken upon that bill, at the time of its introduction into that House; and on regulations, because of those which were adopted conformably to it. [The noble lord here read two clauses of the act. 46 Geo. 3rd]. If this bill did not give to the soldier a vested right and property to such pensions as should have been appointed by the rules and regulations in force at the time of the enactment, he should be glad if the hon. gentlemen opposite would tell him what it did do. In fact, he could not in any other way understand what it meant. If it intended otherwise, it was an absurdity, or worse than an absurdity; for it would hold out certain advantages to men enlisting themselves for a certain number of years; whereas, after so enlisting and serving, they would find that they were liable to be called out at any time of life under penalties. These men had retired with honourable scars, and had received pensions to which these honourable scars established their best title; but then came the proclamation of his majesty, dated in last October, and turned the whole of their claim to pension into waste paper. It called them out, perhaps at very great inconvenience to themselves, from their wives, their families, and their homes, and possibly from their trades and occupations, under penalty. He would ask, how were they to punish men such as these for desertion? He should apprehend they could not do so: for being, in fact, no longer soldiers, they could not come under the enactments of the Mutiny bill, which only applied to the precise description of persons mentioned in its preamble: and although these "might not be actually discharged" from further service, yet the case was quite different with this body of men (for whom he addressed them), who might be broken in spirits and enfeebled in body, in consequence of wounds received in their country's service; and could not therefore be contemplated by the provisions of the Mutiny bill. Those individuals, in consequence of those very wounds which obliged them to retire, would be placed under the necessity of obeying any call made on them by government, under the penalty of being deprived of their pensions. If the bill were to have a contrary operation, it would be a measure, not affecting the unwounded soldier, but grievously affecting that class of men, who, having performed great public service, deserved a commensurate public reward.—He next came to the rules and regulations of Chelsea hospital, which applied to their case. If any one of those could be pointed out that tended to nullify Mr. Windham's bill, he then should deny the right of the Crown, by promulging any set of resolutions, to nullify existing laws. There was, however, nothing of the kind in the rules and regulations. There was not amongst them any one provision, which in any degree affected the interest of those persons. If a reference to these rules and regulations did not make his case strong enough, he should further support it by quoting several authorities, the force of which, he believed, would not be disputed by hon. gentlemen opposite [Here the noble lord read an extract from Mr. Windham's speech, in which he insisted upon the necessity of keeping strict faith with those who should enlist under the idea of engaging for limited service; and explained the advantages of his bill.] In addition to this, he possessed also the authority of the noble lord, the secretary for foreign affairs, of the right hon. the president of the board of control, and of the late Mr. Perceval; and he defied the noble lord (Palmerston) to produce any thing of equal authority which could be held to affect the claims of these men. He would venture to say, that no act could be found which might authorize the taking away of similar pensions, except in the cases of persons who had engaged for life, or for a certain number of years, and had not gone through their stipulated service. A departure from a compact like that to which he had directed their attention, would be fatal to the spirit, and almost to the existence of the service. The superannuated soldier had imposed a debt of gratitude upon his country, which could never be repaid but by the most anxious, the most tender, the most vigilant solicitude, to secure for him that reward and that repose which his past services had so eminently merited.

Lord Palmerston objected to the shape in which the noble lord had brought forward his motion. The paper which he had called for was not that which was necessary for his purpose. He was very willing, however, to meet the noble lord upon the principle of this bill. Its intention evidently was, to enlarge the military force of that day, by holding out farther inducements to recruits. The noble lord thought that this bill gave a permanent and indefeasible right to the soldier to enjoy his pension, under whatever circumstances he might have received it. This was not the case, nor had such a regulation ever been contemplated by Mr. Windham: all the law did was, to create a right under certain conditions, which conditions or regulations were reserved for the Crown to make. What were the words of the act? With regard to the 5th section, it did not bear at all upon this question. The only meaning of the 5th section was, that men, who entered the service under certain regulations should not be deprived of the benefit arising from those regulations by the Crown, at any subsequent period. In short, it went to secure to the soldier the benefit of the regulation which existed at the time of his enlistment. But the third section was that on which the question turned. The 3rd section said, "that from and after the passing of the act, &c., any soldier shall be entitled to his discharge by reason of the expiration of the period of service, fixed in the orders and regulations of his majesty's government;" leaving it in the power of the king to fix the period of service: and it further provided "that men so discharged should be entitled to receive such pensions, allowance, or relief, as should be fixed in the orders and regulations in such cases respectively." These words he apprehended, did not give a perpetual right to the enjoyment of a pension; and if they did not, what did they give? In his opinion, these words were introduced to give conditional pensions to those who had not received pensions previous to the passing of the act. The noble lord, he thought, had entirely mistaken the object of this clause. It was well known, that previous to the passing of the act, the pension granted to the soldier was entirely dependent on the bounty of the Crown; and in this state of things, not alone was the man bound to prove a case of service and disability from wounds, but he must also produce the recommendation of his commanding officer. Now, in the opinion of Mr. Windham, it was desirable to do away with this discretion, and to enact, that if a man should present himself, in every other respect with a sufficient claim, his pension should be granted, and he should not be subject to the caprice of his commanding officer, or to the unjust or improper exercise of the authority of the Crown. It only remained then to say, what was the period at the end of which a man should be entitled to a pension, or what degree of disability would justify his claiming. This point was left in the discretion of the Crown, who adopted such regulations as the circumstances of the service seemed to warrant; and to these regulations, whatever they might be, the soldier was bound to submit. This he thought, was the only fair interpretation of this act. But the noble lord said that he had authorities which led to a different interpretation. Now, he was sure he could refer to the authority of Mr. Windham himself, as corroborative of his proposition, that this bill did not give to a man an indefeasible right to his pension. If either Mr. Windham or general Fitzpatrick had entertained such a notion, they would have distinctly stated it on the passing of the bill; but so far from this being the case, the regulations adopted under their auspices, after the passing of the act, clearly proved the converse of such a proposition. In fixing the periods for which the men should enlist, it was seen that for the first seven years no pension was granted; but that if an enlistment took place for fourteen years, and that period was completed, the right to a pension existed; and if the service was extended to 21 years, the right arose to a larger pension; but if a soldier were discharged before the completion of the three full periods of service, namely, 21 years, and should be in the receipt of his pension, it was further provided, that he should forfeit that pension, unless when called upon he agreed to complete the full three periods—that was to say, if a man were discharged at the end of 14 years, and was in the enjoyment of his pension, if occasion existed for his services for the 7 remaining years of the whole period of 21 years, and he should refuse to serve them, he lost his pension altogether. It was impossible to place any other construction upon the words of the act. Unless this were the case, he apprehended the House would think a very bad bargain had been made for the country. The regulation which fixed the rate of pensions given to men disabled from wounds was open to precisely the same construction; and if the man were able, he was equally liable with the man who had received his pension for length of service, to be called upon to serve his full three periods of service. If this were not the law, the country would be placed in a most preposterous condition. The object of Mr. Windham obviously was, to keep a corps de reserve, but this object would have been altogether defeated, if the conclusion came to by the noble lord were correct. And what else would be the result? Why, men who had entered the service at 18 years old, would, at the end of 14 years service, when they had arrived at the extreme old age of 32, be for the rest of their lives entitled to partake of the bounty of the country, without any opportunity existing of calling upon them to make some return for such generosity! This would indeed be a monstrous state of things. Of pensioners there were not less than 75,000 men, none of whom would then contribute to the public service. It was true, that many of these men were unable to serve; but a great number of them were useful and effective troops. He very much regretted the noble lord had chosen this particular period for bringing forward this question. All he could say was, that the act granted pensions under particular regulations, and that those who received pensions must, in order to entitle themselves to their continuance, act in conformity with those regulations.

Lord Althorp perfectly agreed in the construction put upon the first part of this act by the noble secretary at war; namely, that where pensions were granted to soldiers for length of service, the Crown had a right to call for their services until they had completed the full periods which the conditions in the regulations alluded to distinctly stipulated. He did not agree with him, however, in the other branch of his definition; namely, that which referred to pensions received for wounds. In such cases he thought a similar right of calling for the services of the soldier did not exist. At all events, doubts existed on the subject; and he thought those doubts should be construed favourably for the soldier.

Mr. C. Long said, the only question here was, what was the condition upon which the soldier enlisted? The regulations adopted by the officers of the Crown was, that a soldier, in order to entitle himself to the enjoyment of his pension, must render himself liable to be called upon to serve the three full periods of his enlistment, amounting to 21 years. These regulations were suggested by Mr. Windham himself; and if he had meant to come to a different conclusion, he would no doubt, have made his bill clearly intelligible. From the beginning, it was evident that Mr. Windham contemplated the securing of the service of the soldier for 21 years; and very few instances had occurred in which the soldier was disposed to question this proposition: on the contrary they were generally anxious to disguise their wounds, so that they might get into the veteran battalions.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that with regard to the question of pensions for length of service, it clearly appeared that the soldier was subject to the conditions laid down in the regulations adopted by the Crown. The same rule, however, did not apply to that class of persons who received pensions for wounds. In the former case, the words of the regulation were, that they should only receive their pensions on the condition that when called upon they should complete their service for their three full periods; in the latter, however, the words were that they should "complete their service for the period for which they had been engaged." In these regulations, therefore, there was a marked distinction, and he apprehended if a man had only engaged for seven years, and received a pension for a wound obtained during that period, he would, according to the words of the regulation, have, to all intents and purposes, completed the period for which he had been engaged, and could not be compelled to serve longer than seven years.

Mr. Calcraft thought the question in this case was extremely narrow. The only point at issue was, what construction was to be put upon the words "the period of service for which they had been engaged." In his opinion, if a man enlisted for seven years, that was the period of his engagement; and if he became entitled to a pension during that period, the Crown had no right to call for his services any longer.

The question was negatived.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.]
The report of this bill was brought up. On the motion that it be agreed to,

Mr. Primrose rose to oppose the measure. This bill, he said, had now arrived near its last stage, and still the discussion on its principle had not taken place. No gentleman on the other side came forward to defend it against the objections which had been stated to it. At first, when it was proposed to discuss it on the second reading, the noble lord opposite had wished the debate to be postponed to a future stage; that stage was now past, and the discussion of the principle of the bill was deferred till the third reading. He rose to oppose the bill, because, both as taken by itself, and as composing a part of the system of measures which was introduced along with it, it appeared to him as one of the most vital importance, affecting the liberties and constitution of the country—a measure, not calculated to call forth declamations, but to be opposed as effecting a change in the practical privileges and rights of the people. This was not like the Seditious Meetings bill, of a temporary nature, but was intended to be permanent, and could only be defended on one of two grounds—either that the freedom of the press had been at all times an evil that required correction; or that it was a privilege which, though good in itself, we were now unworthy of enjoying. Now, so far was the first of these positions from being true, that it might on the contrary be proved that it was productive of great practical good; that ever since the Revolution, its tendency had been to preserve order and to ensure good government; and that nothing had operated so much to prevent troubles, or even a total dissolution of the government. This might be illustrated by recurring to times anterior to the Revolution, when a free press did not exist, and when, consequently, the people, having no other way of expressing their opinions, had vented them in acts of insurrection and violence. Although the hon. member for Corfe-castle had last night deprecated the existence of the Star Chamber, he had reminded the House, as a kind of advantage, that a free press did not then form a part of our constitution. But what was the consequence? What did history say of those times in which there was no freedom of the press? It described a perpetual contest as existing between the government and the people—the Crown attempting encroachments on the one hand, and the people rising to oppose those encroachments on the other. Having no means of expressing their opinion, or of influencing the government by a declaration of their claims, they were obliged to recur to physical force; and the government was not warned of its danger till its very existence was threatened. He might amply illustrate this by an appeal to the period of the reign of Charles 1st. He might even say, that the revolution which then took place would not have happened, had the king been warned in time of the wishes of his people through the medium of a free press. Nor would the encroachments which followed in the two subsequent reigns of Charles 2nd and James 2nd have occurred, had the dangers of them been pointed out through the same medium. So far was a free press from being dangerous to governments, that it was their best protection, as it prevented, by an amicable understanding between the authorities and the people, those popular commotions which must always happen when grievances, either real or imaginary, produced a separation between them. The hon. member for Corfe-castle seemed to take great credit to himself for showing that the eminent persons who conducted the Revolution had consented to restrictions on the press during the first year of the reign of William 3rd; but he had forgotten to state, when he mentioned that the then ministers had introduced restriction bills, how often they had been rejected by parliament. The severe laws of Charles 2nd, he believed, had never been re-enacted but once in William's reign; and that was in 1692. The re-enactment was recommended by the committee on the expiring laws, and had passed on that recommendation; but in 1694 it was rejected. Attempts were made by the ministers to renew the bill till 1697, but were always defeated, and then finally given up. It was not fair, therefore, in describing the attempts of the government to introduce restrictions, to omit entirely all mention of the example of parliament resisting those attempts. With respect to the Seditious Meeting bill, he opposed it on its first introduction, because it was intended to be perpetual; but agreed to its third reading, because the clause enacting its perpetuity had been withdrawn. He opposed the present bill for the same reason that he at first did that for suppressing public meetings, because it was intended permanently to restrain the expression of public opinion. What was the difference between a free and a despotic government, but that public opinion was expressed, and produced its influence on the former, and not on the latter? A government might be theoretically good, and yet practically unjust and arbitrary, if the influence of public opinion were withdrawn; while, on the other hand, public opinion, acting on a government with great theoretical imperfections, might produce most of the practical benefits of the most perfect system of social subordination. Theoretically speaking, the manner of electing members for the House of Commons promised none of the advantages of a fair representation of the people, and a part of the constitution was thus an absurdity; but the House of Commons thus constituted, as had been said by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) "worked well," adopted wise measures, and enacted wise laws. But why did it "work well?" By the influence of public opinion operating upon it. And how could the public opinion express itself so as to produce these practical benefits? Why, through the medium of public assemblies and a free press. It had been said by hon. members who supported the measures of administration on the present occasion, that great as the privileges of meeting publicly and discussing freely were, they were still liable to abuse, and ought to be restrained. From the class of persons who of late had called and attended the great meetings which the Seditious Meetings bill was intended to put down, he entirely dissented; he was decidedly opposed to universal suffrage and annual parliaments, the doctrines which they supported; but still he thought that public meetings would not produce the advantages of making known to government the wants and wishes of the people, if restrictions were imposed on the expression of opinions, however absurd; and, in the same manner, the press could not produce all the good which it was calculated to produce, if it was not (he would not say licentious, but) bordering on licentiousness. Unless it could speak freely of public men and public measures, unless it could examine into the conduct of all the departments of the government, and denounce abuses wherever detected, unless it could discuss every proceeding of the administration, not excluding even the administration of justice, it could not produce its full effect, nor could our government and institutions remain entire. The administration of justice could not be long expected to continue pure, unless the proceedings of the courts were made known, and the conduct of the judges watched by a very free and vigilant press. The judges could not be questioned as to their conduct, but in parliament, which thus furnished no immediate or practical remedy against their malversation; but the press, which made known their acts, and was ready to censure their conduct, supplied the immediate and certain means of enforcing the performance of their duty, or punishing their departure from it. The Houses of Parliament and the courts of justice could thus be kept within the pale of law and constitutional conduct, only by the exertions of a free, a very free press. The liberty of the press was a part of our constitution. It had been made so in 1694, when the censorship was abolished; and having remained so for 126 years, it did not become gentlemen to go back to the reign of Charles 2nd, or James 2nd, for precedents of restriction; nor to that of Alfred, as the hon. and learned solicitor-general had done, to prove that securities before publication was not an infringement of our rights, because that monarch had tithings securities for each other. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Banks) had stated with an air of discovery, that there was nothing about a free press in the Bill of Rights, and had inferred from the omission that a free press was then regarded as an object of little consequence. He admitted the fact, but denied the inference. The freedom of the press was not secured by the Bill of Rights, merely because the Bill of Rights contained only those rights that were infringed by the Crown without an act of parliament, and the great evil against which it was intended to guard was the dispensing with acts of parliament by the Crown. But the censorship of the press had been exercised by act of parliament, and therefore could not be brought forward as an encroachment of the Crown which it was necessary to provide against by a claim of freedom of discussion from the Crown. It ought to be recollected, that though the liberty of the press was not, for the reason he had stated, secured in the Bill of Rights, it became the law of the land only five years afterwards, the Bill of Rights having passed in 1689, and the censorship having been abolished in 1694. He confessed he was surprised at some of the doctrines which he heard stated in that House, in which it was maintained that the freedom of the press was inconsistent with the security of private property. Whether was private property, he would ask, most secure in free or despotic states? On the answer to this question would depend the answer to the objection against a free press. If the present bill passed, it would as essentially change the constitution as a bill to abolish the House of Commons. If the House took away the channel by which public opinion expressed itself, he considered the first step taken towards revolution. Unless means were allowed to the people of acting upon the government and the legislature, by public opinion, they could only act by physical force; and thus a foundation would be laid for a revolution of the kind which they contemplated, or one which he should more deprecate, ending in the establishment of arbitrary power. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to discuss the clauses of the bill, and contended that they gave a complete power to the Crown to allow the publication of any thing agreeable to the Crown, as no prosecution could be carried on for a transgression of the act without the authority of the attorney-general, who might refuse his consent if he wished to encourage the publication. The bill gave a complete power to the Treasury to limit the class of persons who should print and publish works of a certain sort. The hon. gentleman from the importance of the measure pressed the necessity of delaying the further consideration of it till after the holidays. Many members had already left town, and it did not become ministers to hurry a bill of this kind through the House with a thin attendance. It should be discussed after the adjournment, when gentlemen could come to the discussion with cool and dispassionate minds, prepared to examine the proposed law in all its bearings, to ascertain the effect it would have on public liberty, and its influence on the constitution. [Hear].

Mr. R. Martin expressed a desire to see the bill pass with all due expedition. He held in his hand a letter from Ireland, stating, that several emissaries had appeared in the western counties, organizing the people, whose machinations ought to be checked.

The report was agreed to.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the second reading of the Blasphemous and Seditious Libel bill.

Lord Ebrington felt much diffidence in addressing the House upon this subject. His diffidence was increased by the consciousness, that he could not add any thing to the unanswered and unanswerable arguments already urged from his side of the House against these measures. He trusted, however, that as he did not often claim the indulgence of the House, he should experience it upon the present occasion. He protested against the whole of the system of measures of which this however appeared to him to be the most objectionable. Although he would admit some of those measures to be locally and temporarily necessary, yet he could not help thinking that the whole, brought forward and supported as they were, formed the most alarming attack ever made by parliament upon the liberties and constitution of the country. Here he must say, in reference to what he considered as the source and cause of all the measures brought forward—he meant the proceedings at Manchester—with respect to those proceedings, all he heard in that House only strengthened his previous conviction that inquiry, rigid and impartial inquiry, was loudly called for, and was indispensably necessary for the purposes of justice. The most positive assertions, and the most distinct offers of proof from his side of the House, were answered only by counter-assertions and by ex parte statements contained in the papers on the table. The legality of the meeting was still a matter of question, if it was not positively established. The dispersion of the meeting appeared at the present moment to have been unnecessary, illegal, and cruel. The House of Commons would therefore have only done their duty to the country—his majesty's ministers would have consulted their own interest, if the present measures had been preceded by strict inquiry; and if an attempt had been made to alleviate the distresses of the people, rather than recourse had to severe and coercive proceedings. But all inquiry had been rejected, and parliament had been called on, in a moment of alarm, not unfounded but greatly exaggerated, to legislate, not temporarily, or according to the exigency, but permanently, and in a manner that involved the innocent with the guilty. The right of meeting and petitioning was fettered for five years, and by other measures our liberties were to suffer permanently. But, alarming as the measures themselves were, he thought the manner in which they were received in that House, and the arguments by which they were supported, still more alarming. He had heard with astonishment the greatest blessing and the best security for the tranquillity of the country, represented as an evil, and the cause of disaffection and disloyalty. An hon. member had represented the general diffusion of education among the poor as the cause of those evils which now existed. At such an assertion he could only express his astonishment. Another hon. and learned member had referred to the security required from publicans as similar to the recognizances proposed in the Stamp-duties bill: but this was an argument which did not bear at all upon the subject. The state of morals in this country was not such as to call for such a measure as the present. It was not, he trusted, necessary for him to guard himself from misapprehension by expressing the abhorrence which he felt at the principles of blasphemy which were propagated. He admitted that some miscreants did circulate such principles, but he believed that their number was far less than it was represented by the other side of the House. As proofs that there did not exist in the country that spirit of blasphemy and infidelity from which some hon. gentlemen anticipated so much change, let the House look to the Bible Societies; let them look to the various societies for the propagation of the gospel, societies patronized, not by the rich and the great alone, but by all classes above the very paupers; let them look at the new churches and chapels building in every part of the country—let them look at the immense increase of meeting-houses. Many clergymen in the church were heard to complain that the people did not think the devotion of our own church sufficient for them. He was sincerely attached to the church, and did not wish to encourage methodism; but he could appeal to the increase of methodism as proof that blasphemy was not generally prevalent. But even admitting the evil to exist to a far greater degree than it really did, surely it was incumbent upon those who brought in the present measures, to show that the existing laws were not sufficient to meet that evil, before they called upon the House to pass other laws, by which the dearest privileges of Englishmen were invaded and destroyed. Since 1810, only one individual had been prosecuted for blasphemy, as appeared from the return upon their table; and he had been successfully prosecuted. The conviction and punishment of that individual could not be supposed to encourage blasphemy. The severity of his punishment might be thought sufficient without severer laws. Parliament had already restricted the right of public meeting; they had already repressed, and properly, all unnecessary military trainings; they had already, by too severe a law, authorized magistrates to search for arms. They had just had before them, a law proposing new and unheard of securities against the possible abuse, or rather an imagined abuse, of the intention of writing. Under those circumstances, the House would surely do wise to pause before they proceeded further. In urging delay, hostile though he was to the principle of this bill, and particularly to the punishment of banishment proposed in it, his object only was to gain time for consideration. At present, it was impossible to give it due attention. Those who entertained the greatest alarm upon this subject could not suffer their feelings to run away with them, so far as to apprehend any danger or evil from the delay of this bill till after the recess. He would therefore move as an amendment, that for the word "now" be substituted "the 15th of February."

Colonel Darves could not sufficiently express his surprise at the extraordinary conduct of ministers. He asked whether it was respectful to the House, whether it was respectful to the country, that this subject should be debated night after night on his side of the House, and that not one word should be said by ministers? When the rights and liberties of the country were attacked, were hon. gentlemen on his side of the House to get up one after another, and urge the most forcible arguments against those attacks, and was the House to hear not one word in their defence but such speeches as they had heard last night. In the annals of parliament were not to be found such arguments as had been used last night in defence of these measures. Measures adopted in the time of Charles 1st, measures adopted by the long parliament, measures peculiar to the rash councils of the Stuarts, were the only precedents urged in defence of the present measures. If arguments were to be selected by the friends of the measures against themselves, none more forcible than those could be found. What worse could be said of the measures before them, than that they were paralleled only by abominable measures, passed when there was not a vestige of the liberty of the press—when there was not a trace of civil or religious freedom? Was it, he asked, by measures of this kind that we had attained to all our eminence in freedom, in commerce, in wealth, in general prosperity? Was it by measures like these we had become the admiration and envy of the world? Was it necessary to remind gentlemen, that if measures of this kind had always existed, the public mind had never been awakened, the constitution on which Englishmen so justly prided themselves had never grown up to its acknowledged excellence and strength? By repressing the free circulation and the open avowal of opinion, that warning voice which often apprised of danger and preserved from ruin, would be silenced, but instead would be generated a deep, lasting, and dangerous spirit of indignation and resentment. Men would in secret brood over their sufferings and their wrongs, till a sudden explosion would spread over the land a calamity as complete as it had been unforeseen. But he had not risen to discuss the question; he had risen only to protest against the violation of every principle of decency which appeared in the conduct of ministers. In the history of parliament—gentlemen might laugh, but he would repeat, that in the history of parliament, was nothing to be found so indecent. Objections had been urged against the legality of many parts of the present bill. Why did not learned gentlemen on the other side at least attempt an answer? The necessity of the measure was denied. Why was no proof offered of the existence of any necessity? If ministers could urge one good ground for such a measure, let them receive the gratitude of the country, instead of the abhorrence with which they and their measures were now regarded.

Mr. Money said, he cordially assented to all the measures proposed as calculated for the protection of our religion and our liberties. He trusted that the whole had not yet appeared of the measures prepared for stemming and turning the tide of blasphemy, which was now poured into some of the most populous, and hitherto some of the most religious parts of the country. A right hon. and learned gentleman had stated, in a speech at distinguished for piety as for eloquence, that blasphemers carried their pernicious industry so far as to convey their poison to the minds of youth by means of primers and catechisms. Of this fact, too, there was abundant proof. The magistrates of the county of Chester stated in the papers on the table, that blasphemy and sedition were taught in schools where thousands were educated. The grand jury of the same county declared that the holy scriptures were reviled and laughed at, and audaciously represented to the people as false, by blasphemers, who thus deprive the people of all the moral restraints, and all the hopes and comforts of religion. The earl of Glasgow also stated, that most active endeavours were made to instil the most poisonous principles, and to eradicate every principle of religion from a district once the most religious. A gentleman, much experienced in the knowledge of mankind, and well known to that House, had said, that it was one of the worst symptoms of the age, that sedition was conveyed to the child with his lesson. That an early and effectual antidote to this evil was necessary all must admit. It was the bounden duty of the House to extend a moral and religious education to every part of the country. The tax on cheap publications, as it would diminish the sale of them, would in so far diminish the evil which they were the means of inflicting on the country. But there were other publications, on which some restraint ought to be laid—he meant Sunday newspapers, which were the most fruitful sources of the mischiefs which had sprung out of the abuses of the press. This evil ought to be repressed. They were a modern innovation on the repose of the sabbath: and being published when the lower orders were idle, they were read with avidity. The publishers of these papers selected and arranged all the poison of the week, and brought it out in one copious dose. The reading of these papers occupied the time and attention which ought to be devoted to the sabbath. Hence proceeded much of the increase of infidelity. Surely on one day of seven, a day divinely commanded to be kept holy, the sale of news ought, like all other sales, to be prohibited. He knew of no other shop that was allowed to be open. The shops of booksellers, libraries, and every other shop, were shut. Many of those most interested in the sale of those papers were anxious to have them repressed. He had seen a petition signed by 60 or 70 news-venders, which was intended to be presented to that House. They declared that they were placed in the most inconvenient situation by the increase of Sunday newspapers, for that they were unwilling to live by the breach of the sabbath; and those papers induced persons to frequent public-houses, and circulated principles and doctrines that were disloyal, seditious, and profane. He trusted that the suppression of those papers would be undertaken by his majesty's government as a measure that would tend much to effect the object intended by all the measures now proposed. At this crisis they had the confidence of the great majority of the country, as they had in the counsels which, sanctioned by parliament, had conducted the country triumphantly through the war. The same counsels, he trusted, would, through divine Providence, preserve unimpaired the institutions of our ancestors.

Mr. William Smith could assure the hon. gentleman who had just sat down that he would agree with him if he could prove his case. Those who knew him best, would as little suspect him of blasphemy, sedition, and impiety, as the hon. member. If he saw any reason for believing what the hon. gentleman wished the House to believe, that there were schools in the country, in which sedition and blasphemy were taught, he would be as forward as the hon. gentleman for almost any measures. But the whole evidence was mere assertion of the most vague and uncertain nature. There was nothing like proof. Not one primer or seditious spelling-book was produced which could be produced by scores and thousands, if the assertion were true. A very respectable friend had told him the same story. He had told him that he had come out of the country recently, and that sedition and blasphemy were taught in schools. He asked his friend whether he had seen any books of that kind. His friend acknowledged that he had not, but that he had had his information from good authority. But he, upon further interrogation, acknowledged that this authority had never seen such books. What, then, was his evidence? "Somebody told me that somebody told him that something existed." It so happened in every part of the information on which the subjects before them were founded—subjects on which he was unfortunately in a minority. Inquiry was refused, and they were desired to take every assertion in the papers on the table as an ascertained fact. Of those papers some were too vague, and a great many were not the result of personal knowledge. He regretted that a noble lord, the lord-lieutenant of the west riding of the county of York—whom he regarded with much respect, he had almost said personal regard—he regretted that the noble lord was not present, for he was told that he had stated it to be a fact that sedition was taught in schools. He wished to ask the noble lord, whether, having been recently in the country, he had got any further instance on the spot. If the practice existed at all, instances of its existence might have been easily found. He had been long of opinion, that religion, though inculcated in youth, could have very little authority with adults if supported only by the force of law; but he knew no common punishment sufficient for those who imbued the young mind with irreligious principles. On those subjects, then, stated by the hon. gentleman, he was a total infidel. He did not believe in the facts. While he had the deepest regard for religion, he had too much regard for civil and religious liberty to sacrifice it without conviction of necessity. He would not do it on suspicion, because suspicion ought to have no weight or authority without the support of facts. He hoped he should be excused for saying a few words here upon the kind of defence set up on his trial by Mr. Carlile—a defence in which proceedings in that House were alluded to, and his name, as the mover of a bill on which Mr. Carlile rested his defence, had been mentioned. He knew nothing of Mr. Carlile, and almost of the whole of his defence he was ignorant. But if he had rested his defence on the bill which he had the honour and very great satisfaction to carry through that House, no defence was ever more void of foundation. He had had a conversation with the most respectable and venerable person who was at the head of the church of England, and to whom he could appeal if he were in that House, before the bill was proposed, and they had agreed that the common law respecting blasphemy was not affected by it. He would not now touch on the law of blasphemy, nor would he enter into the question whether blasphemy might not better be left to its own fate. He was sure of the concurrence of an hon. and learned gentleman on the other side, in the opinion that Christianity needed not the support of the civil power. He was perfectly satisfied that it would occasion no danger to our religion if every statute for its defence were done away, or had never existed in this country. If the laws against blasphemy had existed, or had been put into effectual execution at former periods, the christian religion never could have existed as it now did in this country—because the principle of those laws must go to this extent—that every government should have the power of protecting the religion which is established; and, if so, it must have been effectual against the reformers in behalf of the Catholics. This was his creed, and he should never hesitate to avow it. With respect to the question before the House, and particularly the new punishment of banishment, he begged leave to say, that he had never been more surprised than at the arguments used last night. When they considered the changes of time—when they viewed the great and extensive operations of that great innovator—when they reflected, that, as had been last night said, the great excellence of our constitution was, that like the skin of the human body, it enlarged itself, and grew in exact correspondence with the growth of the institutions which it embraced—when they observed these things, must they not think it very extraordinary, that not only the precedents of our Saxon ancestors were referred to in support of any legislative proceeding but those of the Tudors and Stuarts? He should have thought that the very circumstance of such measures having been resorted to then, would be sufficient reason for their condemnation now. If, however, any thing could surprise him more than another, it was another argument used last night. Although this was in fact a continuation of last night's debate, yet it being irregular to refer to a former debate, he would only mention the argument. The extent of education in this country had been regarded as ground of reprobation and censure rather than of applause. This was going very far back indeed. Upon the same grounds, the invention of printing ought to be condemned altogether, and reprobated as the bane of society, and John Faustus and his associates ought to have been consigned to the dungeons of the inquisition, instead of being regarded as the greatest benefactors of mankind. Knowledge was valuable, not as the exclusive privilege of a few, but as a means of happiness which extended its benefits to all classes, and enabled the lowest to raise themselves in the scale of existence. But he did not mean to go into that discussion; he had risen only to say, that the hon. member's statements were without foundation in fact.

Mr. Money explained. He had expressly referred to the papers on the table as containing proofs of his assertion. The magistrates of Chester had said that the facts could be verified on oath.

Mr. W. Smith explained. He was aware of that; but he repeated that the assertions in those papers were too vague to be trusted.

Mr. J. P. Grant could not avoid expressing his surprise at the very extraordinary conduct pursued by his majesty's ministers, relative to the progress of all the measures they had proposed since the meeting of parliament. He could see no reason to justify the precipitancy with which they were hurrying bills through the House, which went to shake the foundation of English liberty. He hoped, however, the manner in which they were passed, would have its due impression with the country, and that such members as were not devoted to the Treasury, would pause before they sanctioned proceedings of the most indecent and unnecessary description. In proposing a bill which went, beyond all precedent, against the liberty of the subject, ministers did not think it worth their while either to state why it should pass, or why the modification which it was understood to be their wish to make in it hereafter, should be made. His opposition would, he feared, be ineffectual, but he should consider himself guilty of a gross breach of his public duty, did he suffer the bill to be read a second time, without being afforded sufficient time to look at its provisions.

Mr. Tierney said, that in opposing the haste with which the present measure was attempted to be forced through the House, he was only actuated by a sincere desire to perform a great public duty. He was sure the noble lord would do him the justice to say, that during the whole course of these proceedings, he had not endeavoured to retard their progress by a factious or vexatious opposition. The present bill, however, which was most novel in its provisions, was not brought forward as the other measures had been; and he conceived he was not asking too much, when he called on ministers not to press it before the Christmas recess, but to pause until they met again after the holidays. The noble lord, it seemed, was not disposed to accede to that proposition. Since that was the case, he would make his appeal to other gentlemen in the House, who, though they might approve of the measure, were not quite so eager to have it immediately disposed of. They perhaps, would agree to his proposition, which he declared, in all sincerity of heart, was not intended to impede the course of proceedings which government recommended for adoption, but was meant to afford a proper opportunity for due deliberation on one of the most important subjects that was ever brought before the legislature. Many gentlemen were, he knew, willing to give a certain degree of confidence to ministers; but he believed no member of any administration, before the present period, ever thought of introducing a bill from the other House of Parliament, containing the most important enactments, without feeling the propriety of opening, distinctly, his view of the subject, and stating the necessity in which the measure originated. He was quite sure, that, in another place to which a bill passed in that House had been sent, some of his majesty's ministers deemed it their duty to state the grounds on which the measure had been introduced, and agreed to. They did not think it was sufficient to say that the bill ought to be passed, merely because it came from the other House of parliament. Such a proceeding was unprecedented. It was the more necessary also, that explanation should be given in this case, because the bill as sent down here from the other House had been altered. All the noble lord had said on this point was, that transportation was too severe a penalty, and that banishment should be substituted; but he offered no reason to show that transportation was too severe, or that banishment should be preferred. Now, however, at this late period of the year, without stating any argument in support of its necessity, the noble lord called on them to recognize a principle, not only hostile to the liberties of the country, but totally new in its legislation; for whatever might have been the practice with respect to individuals, there was never before a case where a whole class of offences was, without discrimination, subjected to this species of punishment. In dividing on this question, his object was, to see whether a certain fair period of time could not be procured for properly considering this measure. With this view, he felt it to be an imperative duty to proceed to a division. Knowing that he was not acting from any wish to create an unnecessary delay, he implored gentlemen to support the motion of his noble friend, and not to carry a measure of this kind without consideration, because it came from the Treasury-bench. He hoped the House would pause before they hurried this measure forward at this time; since hurried it must be, if it were agreed to before the recess. There was no circumstance which pressed for an immediate decision: there was no reason adduced for not postponing its consideration to the period proposed by his noble friend. He did not wish to trouble the House farther; he did not want to protract the debate; but he should not discharge the duty he owed to the House and the country, if he did not use his best efforts to procure an opportunity for a solemn pause, in order that this measure should be thoroughly considered and properly understood.

Lord Castlereagh appealed to the House, whether, in former discussions, a full opening had not been made, with respect to the nature and tendency of all the measures which had recently been brought before them; and amongst them, of that which was now immediately under consideration. If the present measure were as complicated in its details as the bill for preventing seditious assemblies was described to be, considerable inconvenience might have arisen had it been introduced without a regular opening. It was very unfortunate that ministers could not, by any line of conduct, please the gentlemen opposite. To-night they were not satisfied, because no opening speech had been delivered; although the nature of the measure rendered such a speech unnecessary. But, on a former occasion, when he stated that his hon. and learned friend would introduce the seditious meetings bill by a speech explanatory of its nature, that course was also deprecated by the gentlemen opposite, as an objectionable proceeding. His hon. and learned friend, in moving the second reading of that bill, fully described its enactments, which were rather complicated; but the present bill required no such introduction, since it was by no means extensive in its detail. It was undoubtedly a bill of great importance, but still it was altogether a bill of principle, and he conceived that when he originally introduced the whole of the proposed measures to the House, he had sufficiently opened the principle on which this bill rested. The right hon. gentleman said, that this was not the same bill as that which was sent down from the Lords. He (lord Castlereagh) asserted that it was precisely the same bill, but he thought it would bring the House more fairly to the question, when he reminded them that he had apprised them on a former night that he would in the committee propose to commute transportation for banishment. Having on the occasion to which he had already alluded, so fully stated the scope and principle of the bill which was intended to be brought into the other House of Parliament, and observing that it was called for by the notoriety of the situation in which the country was placed, it did appear to him now a very extraordinary circumstance, that gentlemen should declare their ignorance of the nature of the measure. He really did expect that, according to the common course of business in that House, some of the gentlemen opposite would have stated what their objections against the bill were. The speech of the noble lord however (whom he always heard with pleasure), was directed against all the measures of government rather than against this particular measure. He had censured all that ministers had done, and all that they had proposed to do. The hon. member for Norwich had expressed his sentiments on a bill which had passed a few years ago, had adverted to Mr. Carlile's trial, and indeed had touched on almost every subject, except that which was immediately before the House. When the debate took this sort of course, he felt with his hon. friends near him, that if he got up for the purpose of addressing the chair, he must either enter into those explanations of the bill which he had previously given, or digress into subjects not at all relevant to that before the House. When he saw such a phalanx of talent before him—when he knew the expectation which was naturally excited with respect to the debate of this evening, he was led to suppose, that some of those hon. gentlemen would endeavour to expose the inutility and impolicy of the bill; and he could assure them, that if any of them made a display of that kind, it would not go without an answer. But he could not see why he and his hon. friends should be called upon to combat air, or to fight where there was no appearance of an enemy. Now, when this night was fixed for the consideration of this bill, as he understood with the consent of all parties, it was certainly not fair to call on the House to stay in the middle of its proceedings until after the holidays. He asserted, looking to the situation of the country, that the House would not show a proper sensibility for the suppression of that horrible system which prevailed, if, having passed bills of less importance, they showed an unwillingness to accede to this. The right hon. gentleman might reproach ministers for having shown a comparative coldness to the true interests of the country, if after they had carried measures for regulating public meetings, and for other points of considerable importance at the present moment, they had refrained from checking that evil by which the morals of the people and the peace of the country were more likely to be shaken than by any other cause whatsoever. He stated originally, that he looked on the measures which were connected with the press, and which were intended to support the character and morals of the country, as of infinitely more importance to the safety of the state than any others that could be devised or imagined. If parliament separated without performing this great, sacred, and so lemn duty to the country; if they separated without averting the monstrous danger which threatened the empire; if they separated without dispelling the disgrace which hung over their heads, by permitting blasphemous publications to be disseminated without restraint, they would ill discharge the duty which had devolved upon them. He decidedly protested against the doctrine, that ministers were bound to get up in that House, and make speeches, when no objections were offered against their measures. If he had not originally opened this subject with sufficient fulness, he certainly might now be called on for information; but as that charge could not be made against him, it lay on the other side of the House to state their objections; and when they did so, he felt confident that they would be refuted.

Sir James Mackintosh said, he had entered the House with expectations of a very reasonable kind—expectations which, reasonable as they were, he was sorry to perceive were likely to be disappointed. He had entered the House with the expectation that those who proposed an innovation in the criminal law of the country—an innovation affecting the most important of all the constitutional rights of Englishmen—a law against the freedom of the British press—would show some reason for such a proceeding, before they called upon the House to entertain the proposition; but the noble lord reversed the usual course of business, and argued, that gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House should state their objections to the measure. To state their objections to the measure! To offer arguments against that in support of which no argument had been offered! In his opinion, every individual who agreed to this proposition without full explanation from those by whom it was introduced, would make himself a party to an outrage against the constitution—would become a party to a precedent of the most scandalous and reprehensible nature. Surely it could not be argued, that because the bill came from another place, it was therefore to be adopted here, on a simple proposition to that effect. It was a measure of the highest possible importance, and before the second reading was moved, its nature should have been fully described to the House. He hoped the circumstances would be recollected by the House and the country, under which it was brought forward by the noble lord. He hoped the introduction in such a manner of a new penalty for an undefined offence would not be forgotten. He hoped it would be remembered, that it was in the noble lord's administration that such an innovation, on such a subject, was avowedly tolerated. Let the House bear in mind that not one syllable of reason had been adduced for this innovation. When the bill came from the House of Lords, it was read the first time without opposition, in conformity with the usual courtesy which prevailed in such cases. It passed the first reading without discussion or observation, because no man, he thought, in his senses, could have supposed that the noble lord had forgotten all the maxims of sound argument and just reasoning, and adopted the opinion, that the burthen of proof rested with those who opposed the measure. He (sir J. Mackintosh) always understood that such proof rested with the proposers of a law, and not with those who were called upon to consider it. The noble lord had told them, that in the case of the seditious meetings bill, he had found it necessary to make a separate statement. Was it, he asked, on account of the comparative importance of the bill, that he was obliged to do so? The noble lord would perhaps answer, that its intricacy in point of detail rendered such a proceeding necessary. The present bill, the noble lord might perhaps observe, only authorized new principles, new precedents, and new laws, in their penal legislation respecting the liberty of the press, and was therefore of so frivolous a nature as to render statement or explanation quite unnecessary! There was no shadow of ground for the distinction which the noble lord was solicitous to establish. The introduction of a new principle and a new law on general grounds, such as those alluded to by the noble lord, required that those grounds should be stated, as well as the facts which called for the introduction of a measure of complicated details. What did the noble lord state in his opening speech on a former occasion? He had listened to the noble lord with the deepest but most painful attention, and having done so, he would maintain that the noble lord had stated no ground whatever for this measure. The noble lord had stated indeed, that blasphemous libels had increased, and he had argued the necessity of putting them down by a severe penalty.

But did the noble lord prove that necessity? Did he show that the inadequacy of the punishment awarded by the law as it at present stood, was the cause of this increase of blasphemous libels? Was it stated by any gentleman in the House that this was the case? It was not: no individual could make such a statement. He believed such a position to be absolutely untenable. Many things ought to be proved before the House agreed to such a measure. Ere they could wisely or honestly adopt it, the existence of the evil must be shown—the inadequacy of the existing law to meet it—the efficacy of the remedy, and its likelihood not to produce a greater evil than that which it was intended to remove. Not one of them was made out by the noble lord, and indeed it was impossible that they could be in a few cursory paragraphs of the noble lord's speech—a speech in which the noble lord, certainly with great ability had taken a review of the whole state of the country. It was impossible that the noble lord could, in part of that description, pay such attention to a question of this extent and importance as it manifestly demanded. What the noble lord had now said was quite beside the question. It was not a question whether a bill for putting down blasphemous libels was, or was not, of more importance than the others, which had been passed to meet particular offences. The other measures were introduced to check what was termed an urgent existing evil. If they were to be adopted at all (and he did not think they were called for) they must be adopted immediately; but that which was a measure of a preventive nature did not demand the same degree of hurry. It was of much more importance than the immediate passing of this bill, that the House should keep up to the accustomed forms of legislature—to those decencies and decorums which ought to attend the enactment of any penal law; and much more so, when new penalties were about to be directed against the liberty of the press. They ought not to lose sight of that gravity and calm deliberation which should be witnessed in every deliberative assembly, when new and heretofore unknown penalties were introduced for their adoption. He therefore, most unquestionably, would not enter into the discussion of this measure on the present occasion. He would consider himself highly blameable if he did; as that would be to assume that the measure bore on its face its recommendation to the House. Time for due consideration ought to be allowed, and to obtain the necessary delay, he would vote for the motion of his noble friend who had proposed an adjournment of the question.

The Attorney General observed, that the remarks on the course of proceeding adopted by his majesty's ministers, which had fallen from gentlemen on the other side, were well deserving of notice. They appeared to him to have arisen from a misunderstanding of what had formerly taken place. His noble friend had, on a former occasion, distinctly stated the nature of the alterations intended to be proposed in the committee, and therefore he thought the imputation of his hon. and learned friend, was without foundation. Still less founded was the assertion which his hon. and learned friend had made, that his noble friend, or any other of his majesty's ministers, or indeed any gentleman on that (the ministerial) side of the House, had treated the present as a frivolous measure. Measures connected with the state of the press had been insisted on by his majesty's ministers, as those of the utmost importance, and therefore deserving the most serious consideration of the House before they became the law of the land. When he recollected the manner in which the noble lord opened the present debate, and the speeches which were delivered by gentlemen on the other side of the House, they appeared to him directed to any thing rather than the matter immediately under discussion. They had again restated to the House the question at Manchester, and a sweeping condemnation of all those measures produced by it. Some allusions had been made to himself in the course of the debate, intending to provoke him to address the House, which he was always unwilling to do, unless his duty rendered it absolutely necessary. He rose last night to answer certain remarks which were then thrown out, but was on that occasion prevented from stating his opinion. The law, they were told, as it at present stood, was sufficient for the punishment of libel; and observations were made relative to the conduct of an hon. and learned friend of his, to whom he had unworthily succeeded. He begged to state to the House the circumstances in which his hon. and learned friend was placed, particularly in the year 1818, when no prosecutions were commenced. The observations which came from the other side of the House on this subject were most extraordinary, and astonished him not a little. It was the first time, he believed, that gentlemen opposite had reproached the law officers of the Crown for not exercising their powers. Let the House consider the situation in which the law officers of the Crown were placed. If they wished to prosecute with effect, and at the proper time, motions were brought forward in parliament, charging them with having prosecuted too much. An hon. and learned predecessor of his, in the years 1810 and 1811, had selected a number of cases of libel, which he prosecuted with effect. A motion was in consequence made on the subject in parliament, and observations similar to those which he had since heard were not only directed against that individual, but the policy of prosecuting at all was strongly questioned. In 1817, when libels were disseminated through the country, attempts were made to put them down, not by the ex officio informations of the attorney-general, but by instituting prosecutions in inferior courts. Then a motion was made in parliament questioning the legality of the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, who maintained the right of those inferior courts to exercise a jurisdiction in cases of libel. Was it likely, after this, that magistrates would interfere to repress libels in their different districts, when a doubt was thus thrown on their authority? Prosecutions were afterwards instituted in the metropolis, and acquittal followed acquittal. Two remarkable cases of this kind occurred (those of Mr. Wooller). In one of them a verdict of acquittal was recorded; in the other the defendant was found guilty, but the verdict was set aside in consequence of an informality, all the jurymen not having been in court when the verdict was returned. He was ready to meet the hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the trial and acquittal of Mr. Hone. What was the nature of the libels in that case—for he must so call them, as they had been so decided since the acquittal of that individual? In mentioning these circumstances, he by no means intended to impeach the verdict of the jury by which Mr. Hone was tried. It was said, as the ground of Mr. Hone's defence, that the primary object of those libels was, not to bring into contempt any part of the Litany, but to libel and scandalize certain persons named in them. He never heard those publications defended, but many attempts had been made to justify the verdicts. Gentlemen on both sides of the House allowed that the parodies were improper. He would ask, why they were so considered? The reason evidently was, because gentlemen must have felt, that whatever the intention of the defendant was, the necessary effect of those publications must be, to bring into contempt those parts of the Litany which were parodied. Whatever was the intention of Mr. Hone, if such an effect were produced, he (Mr. Hone) was answerable for it. But no sooner came the first day of the sessions, though no amendment was moved to the Address, although it was concurred in by gentlemen opposite, still they one and all rose to state their opinion, that it was a cruel persecution of this individual, and that the attorney-general had exercised a most unwise discretion. They, however, admitted the impropriety of those publications. He was told at that time, that to prosecute them was a most dangerous system, because it tended to disseminate the poison more widely [Hear, hear, hear!]. One hon. gentleman had said to-night, that the Christian religion did not want the aid of the civil power for its support, as he (the attorney-general) had stated on the trial of Carline. He admitted that it did not demand the aid of the civil power for the promulgation of its doctrines or the preservation of its tenets; but when publications were sent forth, such as those disseminated by Carline, was it not necessary, for the protection of the lower orders, that those prosecutions should be carried on? Was not the prosecution of such an offender likely to repress the offence? But gentlemen on the other side of the House wished the law officers of the Crown to be tender of prosecuting libels; and it had even been declared, that the more foul the libel, the more dangerous the prosecution, because it gave a greater publicity, and sometimes excited commiseration for the party prosecuted. The case of Mr. Hone was quoted in support of this statement, and allusion was made to the lavish subscription which had been procured for the relief of that individual throughout the country. He did not mean to impute improper motives to any one; he would hazard the censure of the hon. member for Shrewsbury by declaring, that whatever might have been the motives of those who thus subscribed, the effect of their conduct was most prejudicial. What must be the effect on the country, where a man, who happened to be acquitted for publishing pamphlets considered on all hands improper, confessedly of a mischievous nature, was immediately held up as a persecuted individual, and therefore worthy of public support. At the time to which he alluded, a prosecution was considered beneficial. He might almost say, that premiums were offered for prosecutions. His hon. and learned predecessor had actually received letters from individuals, calling on him to prosecute them. There were not only acquittals, but the persons acquitted were held up as martyrs. These circumstances were not very encouraging to those whose duty it was to prosecute; for the House would perceive that the right of the attorney-general to prosecute should be maturely considered before he proceeded. No prosecution ought to be instituted by him, unless he meant to carry it on with effect, and where he was not conscious in his own mind of the probability of a successful issue. The House would also agree with him, that there was, and perhaps there ought to be, a prejudice in the minds of jurymen, and of the public, against Crown prosecutions. An attorney-general would, under these circumstances, do wrong to launch into prosecutions for libel, without considering the nature of the libel, the temper of the times, and temper of the jury. There had been five acquittals within the walls of the courts of justice, as well as a subscription out of doors for persons who had been prosecuted for libel. Feeling, therefore, as an attorney-general must do, that he was likely to be called to an account in that House for the exercise of his power, his hon. and learned friend was completely justified in not proceeding without very great deliberation. Early in 1819, prosecutions were commenced against Carlile, not only for blasphemous publications, but for a seditious libel having the tendency to encourage people to act upon the principle of assassination. His hon. and learned predecessor having instituted those prosecutions, and finding also that others were instituted by a society in this town, who made it their business to look after offences of this kind, had a right to pause before he filed other informations, until the result of the pending prosecutions was known. He did not in consequence file any more informations, lest he might be accused of harassing individuals unnecessarily. It was impossible, from the press of business in the court of King's-bench, to bring on the trial until the month of October last, at which time his hon. and learned friend had retired from office. This delay was by no means unprecedented. In 1795, when a noble and learned lord (then Mr. Erskine) prosecuted Williams for publishing "The Age of Reason," he declined bringing the case to trial until a full special jury attended. He (the attorney-general), however, was determined to proceed, whether the number of special jurors who attended was great or small. The result was, that Carlile was convicted, and he had no doubt that that conviction had produced a useful effect. On his entrance into office, such was the number of libels which inundated the country, and the cheapness of the forms in which they were published, that, painful as the duty was, he had felt it necessary to prosecute, not only by ex officio informations, but also by another way, in the inferior courts; but if indictment were multiplied on indictment, if information were heaped upon information, it would have been impossible to meet all the cases of libel. They might as well think of instituting actions against all the persons who attended at the meeting at Manchester, or any other illegal meeting, if an hon. and learned friend of his would allow him so to call it. His hon. and learned friend had said, that this was only a preventive measure. Could he say that the placing an additional punishment on a particular offence known to exist, was mere matter of prevention? One object of the bill, he apprehended, was this—by affixing an accumulated punishment on an offender who had committed a second offence, at once to visit him for his past conduct, and to prevent a recurrence of it in future. What could be a greater offence against a society, constituted like our's, than an attempt, first, to overthrow the religion; and next, to subvert the government? By this bill, an endeavour was made to prevent the mischief, before it went to any great extent. It first enabled the Court before whom the party was tried, to seize the libellous publication, whether in his own hands or those of any other person. His hon. and learned friend had said, that no proof was given of the existence of mischief; but was it not clear in the case of Carlile, who, up to the very eve of his judgment, had continued to sell those blasphemous publications for which he was punished? This instance was ground enough for the enactment subjecting the libels, after conviction, to be seized by the order of the Court; and it was provided, that if a new trial should be granted, the property should be restored, society being protected in the mean time against the diffusion of the evil. Could any thing be more pernicious to society than the publication of those seditious and blasphemous libels with which the country had been deluged? It was said that this bill enacted a new punishment. That was not the case. In 1796 a bill was passed, by which the party convicted of the offences therein mentioned was subjected to banishment. Banishment was not so severe a punishment as transportation, because it enabled the person on whom it was inflicted to select his own place of retreat, and saved him from being forcibly detained among felons. He trusted he had shown that an evil did exist, against which the House were called upon to furnish a preventive. This being the case, he apprehended that the provisions of this bill would have a tendency to repress that evil. It would operate to prevent a second offence, because when persons had committed a first, they would be more careful not to offend again. Whatever objections might be made to the details in the committee, he thought the public would not be satisfied unless that House should consent to pass this bill. His majesty's ministers did not wish to break in upon fair discussion, but it was necessary to provide a security against blasphemy and sedition; and, in framing this measure, it had been considered, that prevention was better than punishment.

Sir James Mackintosh rose to explain. He said he had been misunderstood. He intended to distinguish, and he thought he had distinguished prevention by previous restraint from prevention by punishment and example. His hon. and learned friend, had told them, that banishment was not a new punishment. He (sir J. Mackintosh) had merely stated, that it was a punishment not now existing as applicable to offences of the press.

Lord Althorp said, that as allusion had been made to him, he thought it necessary to rise in order that he might state to the House the grounds on which he had objected to the prosecution of Mr. Hone. His objections to that prosecution arose from the circumstance of the hon. and learned gentleman who then held the office of attorney-general, having appealed from one jury to another, with the view of obtaining a conviction for a libel of the same nature. This perseverance accorded but little with the relaxation which followed it concerning cases of a much less equivocal nature. The objections which he and his hon. friends entertained against the present measure were, that it was wrong to bring in a new penal law, when the existing laws had not been previously tried. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that prevention was better than punishment; but he (lord Althorp) contended, that the noble lord opposite and his colleagues had no right to impose fresh restrictions on the press at the present moment; when the sufficiency of the existing restrictions had not been ascertained.

The Attorney General, in explanation, defended the conduct of his hon. and learned predecessor in not pressing any more prosecutions immediately after the acquittals which had been alluded to.

The Marquis of Tavistock said, that the hon. and learned gentleman had that night, although in a tone very different from that of his hon. and learned colleague on a former evening, brought forward a charge against those who contributed to the relief of Mr. Hone. He had hoped, that after what had passed in that House from time to time, respecting the prosecution of that individual, it would not have been necessary for him to say one word upon the subject. He had thought it had been clearly understood, that whatever might be the opinion with respect to the conduct of government in that prosecution, there could be but one feeling of disgust with respect to the parodies in question. One of the hon. and learned gentlemen opposite had thought proper on a former occasion to say that it was owing to those who expressed their disapprobation of the prosecution of Mr. Hone, and who had contributed to the subscription for that individual, that blasphemy and sedition had since gone unpunished. He (the marquis of Tavistock) must request the indulgence of the House, while he stated shortly what the motives of his conduct had been. Having seen others not only not prosecuted, but loaded with honours and pensions, after having published parodies of a similar nature, only that they were in favour of the government; and having seen in the case of Mr. Hone, that if the parodies had not been against his majesty's government, we should not probably have ever heard of them; having seen contrary to the spirit of our laws three prosecutions carried on by the attorney-general for the same offence; although Mr. Hone, after the acquittal on the first of them, had given a promise—a promise which he had since kept—that he would not republish the parodies, he (the marquis of Tavistock) thought it proper to mark his sense of the conduct of those proceedings, and he had no hesitation to add his admiration of the abilities of Mr. Hone in conducting his defence against all the power and talents which had been arrayed against him. As to the attempt to implicate him (the marquis of Tavistock) and those who had pursued the same course, in the charge of approving and extending the progress of blasphemy, it was too absurd to be maintained for a moment; although he confessed he felt some surprise at the course of argument which had been pursued by the hon. and learned gentleman as he had some recollection of the time when the hon. and learned gentleman was accustomed to treat similar topics in a very different tone. However objectionable the mode of political discussion by parody on the sacred writings unquestionably was, Mr. Hone could plead abundant precedents for it. He would appeal to a right hon. gentleman opposite, whether he had not in his former, perhaps he might call them his less prudent days, indulged in such a mode of expressing his feelings; and whether at the time he did so, he was not, nevertheless, capable of entertaining a just abhorrence of blasphemy and sedition.

The Solicitor General observed, that he was so pointedly called upon by the speech of the noble lord and by that of the hon. member for Shrewsbury last night that he did not think he should discharge his duty to himself if he did not rise to offer an explanation of the language imputed to him. Three weeks had elapsed since he had made use of the expressions alluded to. They had occurred at the commencement of the debate on the present bills, and yet, strange to say, though the hon. member for Shrewsbury was present at the time (whether the noble lord was or was not he could not say), he had not ventured to bring forward the charge when what he (the solicitor general) had said was fresh in the recollection of the House, but had postponed doing so until an interval of three weeks had elapsed. He would dare any hon.

member in the House, who was listening to him at the time to say, that there was the slightest ground for the charge. He never had said that the conduct of the gentlemen opposite, in Mr. Hone's case had given rise to all the sedition and blasphemy which had since flowed in upon the country. He never in his life had given a more guarded opinion than on the occasion in question, and he would defy any one to say that his expressions were not that, without censuring the motives of the persons who entered into a subscription for Mr. Hone, he was confident that such conduct had had the effect of holding out a hope of impunity to blasphemous and seditious libellers. That was his sentiment on that occasion, and he now deliberately repeated the same. He would ask the noble lord on what grounds did he bring charges against him (the Solicitor-general) for his former conduct? He would ask the hon. member for Shrewsbury on what ground did he charge him with inconsistency? He had never before the time of his entrance into that House belonged to any political society, or was in any way connected with politics, and even if he had intended to connect himself with any party, he confessed that during his short parliamentary experience he had seen nothing in the views, the policy or the conduct of the gentlemen opposite, to induce him, as a true friend of the constitution to join them. On a former night he stated what he stated now, and what could not be contradicted, that on the three trials of Mr. Hone, a judge, of whose talents and knowledge of English law he had the highest opinion, and who was distinguished for his independence of character, declared the publications to be profane libels; that the present chief justice of the King's-bench, who filled that situation with so much honour, declared that the publication produced on the trial at which he presided was a profane and impious libel; that another person was tried and found guilty for the publication of one of those libels; that another person suffered judgment to go by default for publishing one of those parodies, and that the court in passing sentence described it to be a profane and impious libel. With all these circumstances before his eyes, and relying upon the knowledge of the laws of this country possessed by the respectable individuals beforementioned, was it, he would ask, too much for him to say, that notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, he considered the publications profane and impious libels? When the question was afterwards brought before that House by a noble lord, and seconded by an hon. and learned individual now no more, for whose great talents he had always entertained the highest respect, and of whom no person could speak in any terms of approbation to which he would not subscribe, that hon. and learned individual then said that he did not mean to state that the publications themselves were undeserving of censure, but that the conduct of the attorney-general in the conduct of the prosecution was highly improper. In a month afterwards the hon. member for Norwich again brought the question before the House, and admitted that the publications were censurable, although he contended that they were not deserving of a criminal prosecution. This therefore went forth to the world, that though the judges of the land had declared these publications to be profane, and though the gentlemen in that House always arrayed in opposition to the ministers of the Crown, had allowed the publications to be censurable, yet they ought not to be visited by a prosecution. He would ask any man what effect could such a declaration have on the people, other than that extreme effect of encouragement to seditious libels? But that was not all. There was in a short time afterwards a meeting held for the avowed purpose of entering into a subscription for the man who was before pronounced by the judges of the land, as the publisher of profane and impious libels; at which meeting a worthy alderman member for the city of London, presided; and at which meeting an hon. baronet member for Westminster, was present; and at that meeting was Mr. Wooler allowed to make an inflammatory attack on the judge who presided at Mr. Hone's trial; whom he described as one who had in the course of the trial acted the part rather of a vindictive prosecutor than of an impartial judge of the land, and yet no dissent to such sentiments was offered at that meeting. On the contrary they were received with great approbation, and a subscription for the relief of Mr. Hone was immediately opened. When speaking of the influence which the conduct of gentlemen of the first rank and patriotism, who subscribed on that occasion, had on the people was it too much to say, that it was impossible under such circumstances to expect a verdict of guilty against persons prosecuted for a similar offence? He had nothing to answer to the arguments on the principle of the bill, because he thought they had been completely answered by his hon. and learned friend. He should now sit down, having supported the opinion which he had given on a former night, and having rebutted the unfounded charges which had been made against him in the course of the debate.

Mr. Scarlett allowed that he never had heard that his hon. and learned friend was a member of any political society, or that he was connected with any political body. All that could be said was, perhaps, that his hon. and learned friend now entertained opinions different from those he had formerly expressed, respecting his present associates; but there was nothing wonderful in this; it was natural that we should like people better the more we became acquainted with them. The very apprehension of being thought inconsistent would excuse some warmth—a warmth which seemed to verify the old proverb, “That proselytes were generally enthusiasts.” That it was not intended to discuss this bill was manifest, for the gentlemen on the other side had not advanced any argument in support of it; he had heard no indication of their sentiments, except a scoff or a laugh, which was not an argument. With respect to the particular question, whether or not there had been a due activity in the prosecution of libels, he must say that he did not think the reasons urged by the other side in defence of their declining to prosecute were of sufficient weight. He meant to say nothing unkind of individuals, for whom he felt great respect, and of the purity of whose motives there could be no question, but it was his duty to state his opinion freely. When he spoke of individuals in public stations, he must be understood as speaking of nothing but errors in judgment, of a relaxation in some cases, and too severe activity in others. He would take up the conduct of the law officers of the Crown since the year 1811, and he would say he was one of those who thought that the activity exercised at that period called for animadversion. Every body knew, that in prosecuting for libel, persons might sometimes be convicted who were not in any way chargeable with moral guilt. He had been present on one occasion at the time to which he had just alluded, when twenty people were brought up for judgment, every one of whom was as little involved in any participation of the moral guilt of the offence of which they were convicted, as any hon. member of that House. Among them were several women who lived in distant parts of the country, and whose only connexion with the offence was, that having annuities on newspapers, their names as required by act of parliament, were lodged at the Stamp Office as joint proprietors of those papers. They all received sentence, not indeed a very severe one (they were fined 20*l.* a-piece); but still the prosecution of such persons argued an activity on the part of those who prosecuted them, which excited strong sensations, and not of approbation, in Westminster Hall. The next Attorney-general seemed to act on the principle that frequent prosecutions for libel did more harm than good, and he believed that in the course of four years there was but one prosecution, and that for a libel on one of the royal family. Then came, under a subsequent Attorney-general the prosecutions against Wooler. One of them was for a libel not of a very offensive nature, but one or two passages struck him as likely to produce a verdict. When the Attorney-general had opened his case, Mr. Wooler made a defence which exhibited a very extraordinary degree of talent: and, feeling all the respect that he did for the Attorney-general, he must say that he thought Mr. Wooler had greatly the advantage over him. The conviction of Mr. Wooler might be attributed rather to the mode of his defence, and the topics touched on by him, than to any arguments used by the Attorney-general. As an example of the mode of defence adopted by Mr. Wooler, he (Mr. Scarlett) would state, that Mr. Wooler, in his defence, said that the Bill of Rights was a bill of wrongs and insults; and avowed himself the follower of Paine's political doctrines. In fact, his own speech did more to overturn his own arguments than the speech of the Attorney-general. In the second case, the libel was a mere piece of pleasantry against some members of the administration, and Mr. Wooler conducted his defence in the same tone of pleasantry, observing that after the former prosecution, which he called a tragedy, this was a farce. The jury acquitted him, and he (Mr. Scarlett) thought they did right. For his own part, and he must be supposed to have some experience on the subject, he believed there could not be a more fair, honourable, and intelligent tribunal in the world than a London jury. Then came the case of Mr. Hone; who was indicted for three libels; one a parody on the Litany, another a parody on the Catechism, and the third a parody on the Athanasian Creed. When Mr. Hone was brought up, the information was read at great length, and every count but the last charged him with an intent to revile the Liturgy. He (Mr. Scarlett) thought at the time that Mr. Hone would be acquitted; and he said so to a learned gentleman who now filled with the greatest credit to himself the situation of a judge in the court of King's Bench—he meant Mr. Justice Richardson, who was then one of the counsel for the prosecution. His reason for so thinking, and he then stated it, was, that so many distinguished persons, bishops, deans, and ministers of state, in all times and ages, had published parodies, and he did not believe that twelve men could be found in the metropolis, who could, on their oaths, conscientiously find a man guilty of blasphemy, for doing what had so frequently and by such persons been done before him. As he had foretold, Mr. Hone was acquitted. The second prosecution was for a parody on the Catechism; this was something worse; but Mr. Hone had produced in his defence, a parody called "The Freeholder's Catechism," written by Dr. Arbuthnot, in the reign of queen Anne, but which by mistake he had attributed to Mr. Wilkes. It was in fact written by Dr. Arbuthnot, in favour of the government of that day, and was thought to be a very useful composition. Mr. Hone, was again acquitted. As to the third parody, on the Athanasian Creed, he (Mr. Scarlett) had no sooner read the record, than he asserted that he had no doubt of an acquittal. Indeed, a parody did not necessarily infer an intention to revile the thing parodied. How many parodies, for instance, had been published on Pope's Letter of Eloisa to Abelard? It was well known that Mr. Porson was very fond of a parody on that poem; but who would impute to him or to the poem any wish to revile the poetical character of Mr. Pope? He was one of those who thought that these compositions ought not to be applauded. He did not think the present an irreligious age; if not so devout as former ages, it, however, paid the greatest attention to the outward forms and decorums of religion; and perhaps it was for this very reason that parodies, which appeared so innocent to our forefathers, were so shocking and offensive in our eyes. But a jury to whom it was put as Mr. Hone put it, whether they could think he had a design of reviling or degrading the Christian religion, by doing that which bishops and ministers of state had done before him, or whether they thought that his object was purely political, could not in their conscience convict him of the former offence; and as to the latter, the Attorney-general, though certainly not deficient in courage, had not ventured to appeal to the jury for a political verdict. If the acquittals of Wooler and Hone were the grounds on which the opinion was founded, that juries would not convict in those other cases of atrocious libel to which reference had been made, he (Mr. Scarlett) felt assured that this was a grievous mistake. He was convinced that not one of those aggravated libels could have been brought before any jury without a certainty of a verdict of guilty. As to what had been said by his hon. and learned friend on former occasions, of the policy of prosecuting libels, he conceived that much depended on the nature of each particular case. There were many cases, no doubt, where prosecution might do harm by giving publicity to a libel not likely to be otherwise circulated; but where a libel, and one, too, of a malignant nature, had already circulated very considerably, especially where it had been disseminated among schools, as was alleged to be the case at present, there nobody could deny that it would be highly useful to brand the libeller with a verdict of conviction; nobody, at least, could deny that such a person was a fit object against whom an Attorney-general might call in aid the operation of the laws. He would not impute motives to his majesty's ministers; but if it was their object to put down the press by the clamour of the House of Commons, they could not proceed in a way different from their present course. The cry was—"The laws won't do; juries won't convict; give us severer laws:" whereas the fact was, that the aid of the laws had not been invoked in those cases where juries would be sure to convict. He was not one of those who thought the power of filing ex-officio informations ought to be taken away from Attorney-generals; on the contrary, he thought it a power which if discreetly exercised, was a great benefit to the country. Nor had any objection been made to that power by his honourable friends; their view was simply this—that as it was a power which if indiscriminately applied, would be in many cases rigorously severe, it ought not to be pressed on ordinary or inadequate occasions; but if the country were really in that alarming state described by the Attorney-general, then why not bring some of the worst cases before a jury? It was a libel on juries to say that they would not convict in such cases. Why did government sleep throughout 1818, when they might have obtained convictions of libels unquestionably blasphemous and seditious? Was it necessary that such publications should be tolerated, to afford a pretext for the introduction of coercive measures and restrictions on the liberty of the subject? He was convinced that nothing more than ordinary attention was necessary to procure conviction according to the present laws, and that ministers were not entitled to demand any additional restrictive laws until the present laws failed to bring delinquents to punishment.

Colonel Wood, adverting to the assertion of the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, that no argument had been offered in support of this measure, observed, that no argument had been advanced against it. He would give a reason why he should most conscientiously vote for the bill. It had two objects—one to seize libels, and the other to send out of the country those who persisted in vilifying the civil and religious institutions. With respect to the parodies published by Mr. Hone, the House could not be unaware of their mischievous tendency. The impression against them would however, he believed, be still stronger, if the mode of their distribution were fully made known, for that would naturally increase the alarm which the currency of such publications was calculated to produce in every religious, considerate mind.—Where would the House suppose he first saw these parodies? It had pleased God to bless him with a large family and he actually found one of these profane and impious libels in the nursery of his children! He must, however, do justice to the young folks, who said that the jokes were very good; but very shocking. Parliament would neglect a very material duty if it did not take measures to guard the public against the pollution of such prophane and impious productions. With that view, then, he would vote for the first part of this bill, and he would also vote for the second part, because although a sincere admirer of civil and religious liberty, he thought that those who after one conviction could not refrain from a second attempt to destroy the religion and government of their country, ought to be sent out of it.

The question being put, That the word "now" stand part of the question, the House divided: Ayes, 190; Noes, 72: Majority, 118. The bill was then read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, December 22.

MARRIAGE ACT.] Dr. Phillimore moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the act of Geo. 2nd, called the Marriage act. The bill would be similar to that which had received the sanction of the House last session, but which had never been discussed in the Lords, in consequence of the wish of a learned lord to have time to consider the subject. In the interval, he could say, that many cases of nullity of marriage had been decided, as atrocious as any which had excited the indignation—as distressing as any which had excited the sympathy, of the House. He meant cases in which husbands had stepped forward to take advantage of their own perjury to bastardize their issue, or in which innocent persons had been affected by the severity of a law they could not guard against.—Leave was given.

CONDUCT OF COLONEL FLETCHER, A MAGISTRATE OF LANCASHIRE.] Mr. Bennet said, he had a petition to present from an individual, praying that the House would not entrust additional powers to magistrates, as he had suffered peculiar hardship from the exercise of that discretion with which they were now invested. The magistrate who was particularly referred to in the petition, was a colonel Fletcher, of Bolton. He should have hesitated to have received such a statement, if he had not inquired respecting the character of the petitioner, John Lever, and found that, though in a humble walk of life, he bore a good character.

So early as 1812, it was proposed to the petitioner, by Samuel Fletcher, whom the petitioner considered an agent of colonel Fletcher, to become a spy. This the petitioner refused. He was told by Sam. Fletcher that it was wished to send him through York and Lancashire to Derby; and he was told, as a rule for his conduct, that he might go the length of cursing the king to set others a-going; that if he was apprehended, he need not be alarmed, as he would be liberated, though he might not know by what means. The petitioner, with more spirit than discretion, informed his acquaintance of the offer that had been made to him. In consequence of this, he conceived he had fallen under the anger of colonel Fletcher. He was some time after taken up and carried to prison, and while in confinement he was exhibited as a sort of spectacle, under the name of general Lud, as no other individual could be found to answer to that supposed character. After some time, as no allegations could be proved against him, he was dismissed. A short time after, he was taken out of his bed, and put into confinement, without knowing for what, till at last he found that he was committed to Lancaster gaol on a charge of murdering a man he never saw. As to this part of the case, he had inquired, and found in the calendar for 1812, that John Lever, the petitioner, was committed by colonel Fletcher, on the suspicion of having murdered Mr. Chadwick, of Beech-hall. He was also able to state that a physician had certified, that the individual, so far from having been murdered, had died of a fever; that there had been an absurd report of his having been injured by a blow received in a scuffle, but that it had been proved on the inquest to be untrue. Yet, notwithstanding this, colonel Fletcher committed the petitioner on suspicion of murdering this individual. The petitioner stated, that to his astonishment no bill was presented to the grand jury against him. Whether this was true he had not the means of knowing, but from the books of the gaol he found the entry respecting the commitment which he had read, and underneath "a bill for misdemeanor." His belief was, that there was no bill preferred, and no one bound over to prosecute. When the petitioner was brought up, expecting to be tried for murder, he was tried for a political misdemeanor, and, as he had no means of repelling any charge, was found guilty. The witnesses against him were two persons of notoriously bad character, who swore to what the judge was said to have pronounced the most ridiculous story. The two witnesses swore that the witness told them, that "he was for the death of the king, and that it must be sweetened with a pound of sugar." The petitioner prayed for an inquiry into his case.

Mr. Huskisson said, that the House could not think of entertaining and re-trying a case which had been already disposed of in a court of justice. As to the other part of the complaint, if the magistrate in question had misconducted himself, he could be severely punished by the law; and if the petitioner had received injuries, the law was open to him for redress.

Mr. B. Wilbraham said, that the facts of the case were very different from the representation of the petitioner. In May, 1812, the petitioner had been apprehended, not by colonel Fletcher, but by another magistrate, for giving as a toast "the death of the King." While he was detained for that offence, colonel Fletcher received a letter from Mr. Graham, inclosing another from the deputy inspector of hulks at Portsmouth, with an affidavit made by John Harper, a convict, that three years before, about the time Mr. Chadwick of Beech-hall, was murdered, the deponent returning from market heard two men at a little distance from the road ill-treating another. The two men were John Lever and A. Gordon. They threatened the deponent, that if he told what they had done, they would serve him the same. He was terrified and went on his knees, and promised never to speak a word of it. He afterwards received a present of a suit of clothes from Lever. Mr. Fletcher finding that the relations also entertained suspicions, very properly committed Lever; but about the time of the trial, it was found that the relations would not prosecute, the evidence being insufficient, and merely resting on the assertion of the convict, for whom it would have been necessary to have procured a free pardon before his testimony could have been received. Yet it was not on this account to be expected that he should not be tried for the former offence, and he was accordingly brought to trial, found guilty, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment. The House must feel in its justice, that it was rather a hard case to have an accusation of this nature preferred against any gentleman, after a lapse of seven years, when the papers essential for his defence, were likely to be lost. Really the hon. gentleman's mouth seemed as open for the reception of charges of this sort, as the lion's mouth at Venice. This accusation was brought forward against a gentleman who had for 22 years performed the duties of a magistrate, to the satisfaction of every loyal man in the country. But this magistrate was one of those who acted at Manchester on the 16th of August, and hence was exposed to the hostility of a certain class of persons, who were now endeavouring by petitions to that House, and every other species of expedient, to cast reflection upon all the magistrates concerned upon that occasion. It had been repeatedly stated, that the magistrates acted on the 16th of August under the special directions, or with the previous advice of his majesty's ministers. This statement had been positively contradicted by some of the ministers themselves—but still the charge was repeated. He had, however, now the authority of the magistrates themselves, to state to the House, that they had received no directions whatever from ministers, how to proceed on the 16th of August—that their conduct on that occasion was entirely their own, and that whatever might be thought of that conduct, the responsibility for it belonged to themselves alone. Then as they were so responsible, and as they were likely to be called upon to answer for their conduct before a legal tribunal, he submitted, whether it was fair towards these gentlemen, to have farther prejudices excited against them by such petitions as that before the House.

Mr. Bennet said, that the petitioner complained that, after having been confined for some time upon a charge of murder, he was tried only for a misdemeanor, of which he was convicted, mainly upon the evidence of two persons, who had been heard to threaten, that they would go to Lancaster for the purpose of "doing him." As to what the hon. member had said with respect to the lion's mouth at Venice, he should only observe, that he felt it his duty to prefer any charge which he believed to be true, against those who abused their power, for the purpose of oppressing the people. When parliament was about to invest the magistrates with new and extraordinary powers, it was right to state the manner in which the powers already possessed were abused.

Mr. Brougham observed, that he recollected the trial of the petitioner in 1812, and perfectly remembered that the petitioner, who had been committed for a misdemeanor, was, before he obtained bail, detained upon a charge of murder, which detainer must have rendered it difficult for him to collect the materials for his defence. The petitioner was, it appeared, treated very harshly in the course of his imprisonment; but, notwithstanding all those circumstances, it was much to be regretted that this complaint should not have been preferred long since. For it was certainly a grievance to the accused, that it should have been deferred for seven years, as that must render it more difficult for him to make out the grounds of his vindication. But it was a strange fact, that notwithstanding the committal of the petitioner by the magistrate alluded to for murder, no bill was presented against him to the grand jury. The petitioner was, however, convicted of the misdemeanor for seditious words, which he uttered when half jocular and more than half in liquor. In consequence of this evidence, the judge charged in favour of the petitioner, but still he was convicted. He (Mr. B.) had, however, a much more extraordinary sample of the same jury at this assizes, for they, with express reluctance, acquitted thirty-eight persons who were charged upon the evidence of only one spy, whose evidence was contradicted by the most decisive proof of an alibi, accidentally discovered. The judge's charge was in favour of the accused, and yet the jury hesitated for ten or fifteen minutes before they returned the verdict of acquittal, declaring at the same time, that they thought the accused guilty, although the evidence was insufficient. This declaration excited the disgust of every candid man in court, and especially because it appeared to proceed from prejudice, the prisoners being accused of a political offence. The jury were, however, so indignant at the disappointment of their prejudice in the acquittal of these men, that they actually convicted every one accused before them throughout the remainder of the day.

The motion was negatived.

MOTION FOR PAPERS RESPECTING THE BANK OF ENGLAND AND EXCHE-

QUER BILLS.] Mr. Maberly, after he had moved for sundry accounts relative to the revenue, which were ordered, next moved "That there be laid before this House, an account showing how the sum of five millions, voted for the purpose of paying off debt due to the Bank of England on the 5th July 1819, has been applied, distinguishing the dates of the different payments."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the hon. gentleman had framed a series of motions calculated to produce a view of the state of the consolidated fund, and also to bring before the House an account of the progress made in the repayment of the advances of the Bank, in consequence of the measures adopted last year for a resumption of cash payments by the Bank. With regard to the first object, he had no objection to bring it in the clearest manner, and to the latest date, before the House. The justice of incredulity, as to the expectations he had held out, would be seen by the result. Rumours and surmises of every kind had been in circulation on the subject. The House was well aware that there had been a considerable falling off in the quarter ending the 10th of October last, as compared with the same quarter in the preceding year. The chief deficiency, which had occurred in the customs, amounted to above 916,587*l.* The deficiency of the stamps was 96,728*l.*; and in the excise, 192,117*l.* There was, however, an increase in the Post-office, and on some other branches of taxes; but the difference between the deficiency and the increase, made a total deficiency of 1,151,556*l.* in the quarter ending the 10th October, 1819, compared with the same quarter in 1818. The House would observe that the 916,000*l.* of the customs constituted a great portion of this decrease. Various circumstances might be referred to in accounting for this large deficiency of the revenue; but he should mention only two, which would of themselves be found sufficient to explain the difference between the two quarters. The first was, the time at which the new taxes began to operate. It was perfectly natural that persons who were apprehensive of an increase of duties on their stock, should have endeavoured to pay before the 5th of July last. This had caused a deficiency in the October quarter equal to all the payments that would otherwise have been made in it. The other circumstance was, that a considerable stagnation had taken place in the course of the year in our foreign trade. The export trade had, in the period referred to, diminished to the amount of 7,000,000*l.*, and there was consequently a corresponding diminution in the export duties. But he was happy to say, that notwithstanding this falling off in the customs, there was no appearance of any material defalcation in the internal consumption of the country. The excise furnished a much better criterion of judging than the customs. It was, indeed, the best criterion of the actual state of the country, and might be referred to as the test of its prosperity. He should, therefore, endeavour to show what had been the state of several articles which came under the excise during the year ending the 10th October 1819; and that of the same articles on an average of three years, ending the 10th October 1818. The quantity of tea which had been charged with the duty, on an average of these three years, was 21,600,000 lb. The quantity which paid duty during the year ending the 10th October 1819, was 22,740,000 lb. The quantity of tobacco on the average of three years was 17,590,000 lb.; the quantity last year 17,755,000 lb. The account of the quantity of malt on which the duty had been charged was not yet made up. The amount of British and Irish spirits was for the average years 5,092,000 gallons; for the last year 5,190,000, being an increase of 100,000 gallons. With regard to wine, he should include all descriptions. The average of the three years was 3,455,000 gallons; the amount of the last year 3,670,000 gallons. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to make similar comparisons of the quantities of foreign spirits, leather, and other excisable articles on which there had been an increase. The comparison he had made, and the great general increase of the excise duties on the whole year, afforded a very favourable prospect, not only with respect to the revenue, but the general prosperity of the country. It proved that in whatever degree local distress might exist, it had by no means been so great as to affect the general consumption of the country. The decrease was only in the customs; and though the deficiency for the whole year in that branch had been considerable, it was not general with regard to every article. In some an increase had taken place, and this was the case with respect to printed calicoes, to the amount of 60,000*l.* He now came to the current period, of which no complete account had as yet been made up; but he was happy to inform the House, that the produce of both the customs and excise had greatly improved since the 10th of October last. It appeared, that the produce for the current quarter would be nearly equal to that of any year he remembered, though there was the sum of 150,000*l.* short on the general account up to Saturday last. He now felt himself called upon to explain the ground upon which he opposed the hon. gentleman's motion. It had always been held as a principle, that parliament should not inquire into any diplomatic transaction while negotiations were pending. He thought that this rule of the House ought to be extended to transactions of a pecuniary nature, and that they should refuse to inquire into them until they were completed, unless where some specific ground of charge was laid. In addition to this, such an inquiry would open a wide field for the operations of stock-jobbing. He thought it best, therefore, to confine what he should say on this subject to a very general observation. He had no objection to inform the hon. gentleman, that a large sum had already been paid to the Bank, and that means were taken for the full payment of the 5,000,000*l.* in question. Funds were provided and would be applied to that purpose. As, then, no ground had been laid for inquiry, it would be better to refuse a motion which had that tendency. The objection which he had made to the present motion, applied also in some measure to another which the hon. gentleman intended to bring forward. He meant that which called for an account of the money in the exchequer. No ground had been laid for such a disclosure, and he thought that every man must be aware that the practice was to keep the money in the exchequer as low as possible, on account of the interest. With respect to the object of another motion, he could inform the hon. gentleman that no advance had been made on the malt-tax. With respect to the alarm created by reports of the transfer of British property to France, it might be true, that property had been so transferred, but he believed it could be only to a small extent. That no considerable sums had yet been transferred to the French funds, appeared from the state of the exchange; and there were circumstances which led him to conclude, that no very large sums were likely to be so invested. Looking at the exchange, that index of the state of money transactions, he concluded that the late remittances to France did not much exceed the average of late years. Besides, there were circumstances in the state of the French laws, which would always operate powerfully against such transfers. A person who invested property in the French funds was deprived of the power of disposing of it by will according to his pleasure; for by the law of the country, all real and personal property became liable to be equally divided among his children. This law rendered any testamentary disposition nugatory. [Mr. Brougham asked across the table, whether the right hon. gentleman meant that real and personal property were equally subject to this law.] For the truth of what he had stated he referred to the book published by M. Cottu, a French lawyer, who had lately visited this country for the purpose of inquiring into the state of British jurisprudence. Gentlemen would there find an examination of the laws of succession in France and England, and the preference given to the latter on account of the author's objection to the equal division of property in his own country. A Mr. Bristed, who had given an account of the state of America, had spoken in a similar manner of the disadvantage arising from the abolition of the law of primogeniture in the United States. Thus, two authors from opposite parts of the world concurred in preferring the British system of succession to every other. The pre-eminence which Virginia had maintained in the union of the American States Mr. Bristed chiefly attributed to the circumstance of that state having preserved the English law of primogeniture. He certainly was not disposed to reject the compliments which these writers had paid to the long established law of this country. He should only add, that from the state of the law in France, if money was transferred there, the owner, if he did not wish it to be equally divided among his children, must take care to dispose of it during his life, for a testamentary disposition would be of no use.

Mr. Ellice was surprised that the right hon. gentleman had assigned no better reasons for refusing the motion of his hon. friend. The statements he had made by no means bore him out in his conclusions. In making his comparative statement on an average of three years, ending the 10th of October 1818, compared with the year ending 10th October, 1819, he had forgotten that the distress of the country had not acquired its greatest influence, until within the last six months. Its operation on the revenue began, therefore, to be felt more particularly in the quarter ending on the 10th of October last. Besides, the year 1817, one of the three which the right hon. gentleman had included in his average, was one of the worst which had occurred, and therefore contributed to render the average unfair. To attribute the great defalcation of the last quarter to the payments made in the preceding, was not consistent with the view the right hon. gentleman had taken of the increase in the quantity of articles charged with duties, and the undiminished consumption of the country. He had stated that all the great exciseable articles remained unreduced. In answer to this he must say, that he was afraid the reduction of the revenue was only begun. He had seen a good deal of the distress of the country, and knew it to be in a melancholy state. The right hon. gentleman had made statements to show, that the consumption of tea, spirits, and wines, was not diminished. It was probable that there might be some increase on wine, in consequence of the right hon. gentleman having included Cape and every sort of wine in his calculation. With regard to tea, a comparative statement of the quantity paying duty was fallacious, as the duty was ad valorem. He knew, from a person well informed on the subject, that the duty on high-priced tea had fallen off; the increase in quantity must therefore have taken place in the coarser kinds of tea. There was a deficiency on the September sales to the amount of 199,000*l.*, and on the present sales it would be 350,000*l.*: so that there would be altogether about half a million of deficiency on that single article. The right hon. gentleman had referred to the practice of the House in refraining from inquiring into pending diplomatic negotiations, and had argued that the same rule ought to be observed in pecuniary affairs. He doubted the soundness of this reasoning. Existing negotiations were not inquired into because it was supposed possible that something might be disclosed which would give offence to the party

treated with, and perhaps widen the breach. The analogy which the right hon. gentleman wished to establish would indeed be well founded, if he and the party with whom he was treating were not on good terms. If there were a want of harmony between the government and the bank, the objection of the right hon. gentleman to the motion would be reasonable. He had been very anxious last year to obtain an account of the state of the consolidated fund, and of the arrangements made for paying the bank; and from what had been stated respecting the sum of 1,200,000*l.* paid within the last month, that anxiety was much increased. Very extraordinary rumours were afloat respecting the manner in which that 1,200,000*l.* had been raised. The reports of the means which had been resorted to were certainly not creditable to the government, and he did not believe them. It had been among other things stated, that arrangements had been made for procuring assistance from abroad, and that those securities in the French funds to which government was entitled by the late treaty, were pawned to individuals to raise this money. This he could not credit. There was another point of great alarm. It had been stated that only a small portion of the new taxes would be applicable to the consolidated fund. That was saying, that three millions were still to be drawn out of the pockets of the people; and a greater sum still must be drawn from their pockets to pay the Bank. The right hon. gentleman among his reasons for refusing the account asked for, said, that it would open a field for stock-jobbing. Now, he would ask the right hon. gentleman whether the latter part of his own argument had not in it some tincture of stock-jobbing? The object was, to describe the difficulties to which persons transferring money to the French funds would be liable, by which the right hon. gentleman, no doubt, hoped to produce a favourable effect on our own. This was certainly a very laudable wish, but still the purpose was stock-jobbing. He doubted, however, the accuracy of the account given of the effect of the French law on funded property. He recollected, that about a year ago an alarm prevailed respecting the effect of the French law on the property of foreigners in their funds, and that a circular letter was published to remove the impression. If money were deposited in a banker's hands in France, he believed that banker could not say that he would withhold it from the executors of the person in this country who had deposited it, because the law required that it should be equally divided among the children. The executors, as in this country, he supposed, would be entitled to recover the money and pay debts. The law with respect to funded property, he imagined, would be the same as with respect to money lodged with a banker.

Mr. Lushington said, that the consumption of tea had been considerably increased during the last year. It was certainly greater last quarter than during the corresponding quarter of last year: and if hon. gentlemen would look at the several quarters as compared with those of the two last years, they would still have reason to consider the revenue generally as improved. He thought it more far and proper to take an average of two or three years, in these cases, than to refer only to a particular period. In regard to the produce of the new taxes, hon. gentlemen seemed to think that they ought to have brought more into the exchequer: they imagined that the gross sum of 3,190,000*l.* should come into it week by week, and month after month, in certain regular proportions. But if those gentlemen would have the goodness to refer to the papers before the House, they would find it was impossible that the taxes submitted to the House last session could be realized more quickly. This was owing to the long credit which it was necessary to allow to retail dealers, traders, and other venders of the articles taxed. In the article of malt, which was to produce 1,500,000*l.*, not a particle of that sum could be procured till January. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. gentleman would perceive how fallacious any calculation must be, founded on an expectation that government was to receive about 800,000*l.* every quarter, of these taxes. To convince him of this, he would state, that of the duties last mentioned, they had received 160,000*l.* up to the 10th of Oct. last, which was all they could reasonably have expected in that time.

Mr. Grenfell considered this question as involving in it, in some measure, the discussion of the measures taken by the House for the resumption of cash-payments on the part of the Bank. It was on that occasion suggested, that some regulations should be imposed upon government as to the periods in which they should repay the 5,000,000*l.* to the Bank. He could not forget that he had had the honour of being an ally of the right hon. gentleman in the discussions which then took place; and he could not help considering, that it would be most unwise, and unnecessary, for them now to interfere with respect to the repayment of those 5,000,000*l.* As to whether the whole of those repayments should be completed between the months of July last and April next, it appeared, that the repayment of a sum of 1,200,000*l.* had actually taken place, with which he was well satisfied; and that being the case, he should vote against the motion.

Mr. Ricardo said, it appeared to him that the House would act very unwisely by interfering as to the arrangements entered into by government for the repayment of the 5,000,000*l.* of advances to the Bank. At the same time he was at a loss to conceive what danger could arise from giving any information upon the subject. It had been objected, that the production of that information would lead to extensive stock-jobbing. He thought it would have just the contrary effect; for stock-jobbing was always best assisted by secrecy—by the circumstance of some individuals possessing certain information, which the other parties, with whom they transacted their bargains, were ignorant of. Now, supposing the statement required were made known, no jobbing could take place; because every one would then know all that had occurred, as to the repayments. With regard to what had fallen from the chancellor of the exchequer, that the state of the exchanges afforded a means of knowing what capital was going out of the country, he thought very differently. Supposing he wished to invest a sum of 50,000*l.* in France, or any other country; might he not order his correspondent to invest the produce of the goods he had sent out (50,000*l.* for instance) in the public funds, or in other goods, or in lands? No alteration could take place in the exchanges, unless there was a bill negotiated. The official accounts annually laid before the House, relative to our exports and imports, were such, that it was impossible to draw any correct or practical inference from them. He remembered to have heard it stated, that at the time of the union with Ireland, each of the two countries gave a relative and comparative statement of her exports and imports; when Ireland made out that she had exported the larger quantity of commodities to England, and England appeared to have exported the larger quantity to Ireland. No correct information, therefore, could be derived from such returns. He should vote for the motion of his hon. friend.

Mr. Kinnaird believed that one of the greatest evils which lessened the confidence of the public in the resources of the country, and which gave rise to all those rumours that could not surely be of advantage to it was, the ignorance in which the public were kept with respect to the intentions of the chancellor of the exchequer. As to the manner in which the right hon. gentleman was to repay 5,000,000*l.* to the Bank, he was confident that the reports which had been circulated relative to that simple fact, had done more injury to the funds than any thing else, and had more encouraged stock-jobbing, against which he would ever set his face. He should vote for the motion of his hon. friend.

Mr. Maberly begged to ask the right hon. gentleman, whether he did not consider this as a matter of finance? Whether the principle, upon which the act of parliament directed the repayment of 5,000,000*l.* to the Bank, was or was not conceived with a view to lessen the unfunded debt of the country, and to enable the Bank the better to pay in specie? Parliament had made provision for the repayment of one debt of 5,000,000*l.*, only 1,000,000*l.* of which had been paid; and they had borrowed, in addition, other 5,000,000*l.* Was this a subject for inquiry or not? By borrowing 5,000,000*l.* upon the consolidated fund, they had, in fact, increased the debt by 1,000,000*l.*, instead of decreasing it by 5,000,000*l.* The right hon. gentleman had stated, that the customs were deficient, in the quarter from July up to the 10th of October, upwards of 900,000*l.* The right hon. gentleman told them that they must not look at the exports and imports, but at the exports. The right hon. gentleman begged them to look at the great article of tea, and to observe the number of pounds sold. But he seemed to forget that the increased consumption of this article furnished no test of the improvement of the revenue, as the duty upon it was an ad valorem duty, and thus, following the original price, might decrease in aggregate amount with an increase of consumption. The right hon. gentleman well knew, that in the ensuing year he must look for a defalcation of 1,000,000*l.* in the duties on that article. Let him look to facts. Was it not known to him that the distillers did not begin to work till much later than usual this year, and that this year the brewers had brewed 100,000 barrels of beer less than they did during the last? All the great articles of excise had declined. He did not for this blame the right hon. gentleman, because he could not force a demand from customers on the continent. Certainly his majesty's ministers could not therefore be blamed: nor was it to be expected that they were to furnish people with money for the purchase of tea, tobacco, and other articles. But what the right hon. gentleman was to be blamed for was this—that he made his calculations too sanguinely, and then had to justify them; and accordingly, on a former occasion, he was more sanguine in those calculations than the committee appointed to inquire into the same subject. This was, he feared, certain—that if there was this difference between the quarters, it must go on. The right hon. gentleman could not expect to raise the same taxes out of a reduced which he had received from a large expenditure.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Maberly then moved for “an account of all Exchequer Bills received in payment of duties between the 1st of July and the 21st of December, 1819.” The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, by way of amendment, the insertion of the words, “10th of October,” in the place of “21st of December.” After a short conversation, the House divided on the motion that the “21st of December” stand part of the question: Ayes, 30; Noes, 90. The main question, as amended, was then agreed to.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] Lord Castlereagh moved the third reading of the Newspaper Stamp Duties-bill.

Mr. Bernal said, he had this day conferred with some news-paper venders, and proprietors of news-papers, residing in different parts of the country, and they all agreed that some of the clauses would materially affect those employed in vending cheap publications. They were men of small capital; and the clauses, if severely executed, would be the ruin of them; that which required them to find security would fall most heavily on them. It was impossible for them to find those securities which the act demanded of them; and therefore for the last time, he had to entreat the noble lord, and the chancellor of the exchequer, to apply some remedy to the grievance, by not persisting in the measure as it now stood.

Mr. George Lamb said, he would make no apology for rising on the same side immediately after his hon. friend, as it seemed to be the system adopted by the gentlemen opposite, to allow those upon his side of the House to go on speaking one after the other, till somebody on the opposite benches might think it convenient to answer. In looking at the measure before the House, it was impossible not to remember a declaration of the noble lord, that it was not his wish to establish a censorship of the press, as if a member of the Crown thought it necessary to disclaim having entertained a proposition from which our ancestors—he did not mean those of Alfred's days, with whom we had very little in common, but those of later date would have revolted with horror.—Perhaps, however, ministers did not go so far as other members of the House in supporting arbitrary principles; for while one hon. gentleman had held that the freedom of the constitution ought to be abridged, another (the hon. member for Corfe-Castle) had said, that Mr. Justice Blackstone had become an obsolete writer. Notwithstanding the awful authority, however, of the member for Corfe-Castle, he must venture to differ from him on that head. He considered the very learned and admirable writer in question of the highest authority, and reasonably held him in that estimation to which his celebrated work entitled him. But if these measures were to be still pursued; if the system which was prepared by the noble lord a few weeks ago were yet to go on, he must certainly think the Commentaries of Mr. Justice Blackstone on the law of England were indeed about to be laid on the shelf, as hostile to the state of things which those measures and that system were calculated to produce. He did not know whether the Attorney-general and the Solicitor-general meant to favour them with a new set of institutes of the constitution which they had promulged; but if the progress of arbitrary legislation were to go on with the same fearful rapidity with which it had advanced since the House re-assembled, he was afraid that the sheets of their work would be scarcely dry before it would become altogether inapplicable to the existing state of the times. As to Mr. Justice Blackstone, however, though perhaps he incurred the risk of being thought equally obsolete to quote such an authority, it never entered into his head to suppose that any thing like pains and penalties could be imposed previous to publication. All that that great man laboured for, was, to justify the responsibility of the publisher after publication.—His words were:—"Where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious, or scandalous libels are punished by the English law, some with a greater, others with a less degree of severity, the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated. The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published." Such was the forcible demonstration of Mr. Justice Blackstone. In the course of the previous discussion, there had been an attempt made by the gentlemen opposite to distinguish between authors and publishers, and to prove that the restraints laid upon the latter could not affect the former. But it ought to be recollected, that in some cases they were the same persons, and in most cases their interests were completely identified, so that no restriction imposed on the one could be inoperative on the other. The securities required were said to be intended for the purpose of excluding from the management of the press, persons of desperate character, and placing it in the hands of those who were men of substance, and who consequently, both from regard to the station which they held in society, and the pecuniary loss to which they would be subjected in case of abusing the right of free discussion, would be cautious not to publish any work of a seditious or blasphemous nature. But could it be said, that the necessity of entering into recognizances and finding securities was not a censorship?—A censorship, not like that which formerly existed in this country, and which still existed in other parts of Europe—a censorship, not adapted to exclude articles of a wicked or dangerous tendency,—but a censorship directed against writers and publishers of a certain fortune, be their principles good or bad, their works useful or pernicious? No man now, unless possessed of a certain amount of wealth, would be allowed to address his countrymen through the medium of the press; and the poor author, however gifted with talents would be reduced to silence. Lord Coke had said, that there were five trades condemned to perpetual beggary—namely, the alchymist, the informer, the monopolist, the concealer, and the poetaster. The trade of the alchymist was now gone, since the philosopher's stone had been despaired of; that of the informer had lately been prosperous; he would not go over the rest, but would say, that by this bill the author who was condemned to poverty was likewise condemned to silence. Would the measure, by thus raising the pecuniary qualifications of public instructors, tend to render the press more respectable, or exclude those libels which it was the object of the legislature to suppress? It had no such tendency. The rich man, who valued little the sum which it was necessary to offer in recognizance or security, might still publish his libels, however libellous, without the least restraint but the sacrifice of a few hundreds. His money could secure him a ready publication of the most wicked and pernicious works as easily after the passing of this bill as at present; while a man with less wealth, but with more talent or principle, would be restrained from benefiting either the public or himself through the medium of the press, merely because he was poor. Let the House take into consideration the situation of a young man of genius, desirous of becoming an author, after the passing of this act—a young man without wealth or rich connexions, but conscious of talents and acquirements that would fit him for enlightening the public mind on the most momentous questions of politics and government, and enable him to lay the foundations of a lasting reputation for himself. Before he could establish any periodical publication, he must go to his friend to ask him to be his surety; and what would that friend answer to such an application? His answer would be, "I have the highest opinion of your talents and principles; I place the most perfect reliance upon your honour, as far as depends on yourself; I would trust you with my fortune, or my life; but you are going to engage in an occupation in which no human knowledge can guard you from an offence which no man can define, in which no care can preserve you from punishment, in which nothing but supernatural vigilance and constant attendance among your devils, can save you from exposing yourself to a conviction for libel, and me from a forfeiture of the bond you request me to enter into." It had been truly said, in a former debate, that many men who had become the glory of their country and the ornaments of literature, had risen from such low beginnings, that they would have been unable to comply with the conditions required in the present bill. To show the original situation of many who had afterwards risen to honours and distinction in the country, he would refer the House to a debate which took place on a motion regarding the conduct of the benchers of Lincoln's-inn passing a by-law to exclude from their society, persons who had been connected with the public press, when an hon. gentleman who now held a high judicial appointment, and who was then a member of the House (Mr. Stephen, master in chancery) declared that he himself would once have been liable to the exclusion; and advocated the cause of the gentlemen in question in a manner equally honourable to them and to himself. He desired the hon. gentleman opposite to picture to themselves Mr. Burke when he began his literary career, struggling with the embarrassments of poverty, and concealed in the shade of neglect, but laying the foundation of that literary eminence, and preparing those works which had afterwards become the admiration of the world; he desired them to conceive to themselves this great man obliged to go to some miserly friend or some sordid acquaintance, to request his security before he could publish any of his thoughts to his countrymen or procure a licence to comment on the acts of statesmen. From the risks that such friends would incur by entering into the bonds required by the bill, they might have refused, and he might have been prevented from publishing those works which had procured him so much celebrity. It was no fanciful or theoretical danger, that of being liable to penalties without being privy to the libel, or even when opposing its publication. A case had come into court not long ago in which a young man, the editor of a newspaper, was convicted of a libel and punished with imprisonment, though it appeared on the trial that the offensive paragraph had been inserted by command of the proprietors of the paper, for which he was responsible, without his knowledge, and contrary to his wish. On the subject of this bill, he felt more keenly than on the other measures that preceded it; for the House was not now called upon to legislate for any certain or specific evil, as in the case of the training prevention bill—an evil acknowledged on the most certain evidence to exist, and imperiously demanding the interference of parliament to put it down—but they were required to legislate without any apparent necessity for new laws, on the opinions of the authorities throughout the country, who demanded new powers, and joined from the highest to the lowest, from the justices of the peace down to the police officers in Manchester (who received the recommendation from their predecessors, and would transmit it to their successors in office) in recommending restrictions on the press. But before they said that education was an evil, before they declared that the present laws were insufficient to repress blasphemy and sedition, before they stigmatised all the societies in the country that had for their object to discourage impiety and suppress vice, gentlemen ought to consider the nature of the new remedy that was proposed to be applied. He conjured the House to pause before they contributed by this measure to put down the generous and philanthropic spirit which induced men to labour for the dissemination of morality; before they prevented the people from reading the Bible and the excellent and cheap tracts circulated by those men, towards superinducing the beneficial results of the Christian religion. Those who had spoken in support of the bill seemed to think that they could suppress by it one part of the press, and allow the other to remain free—as if they could make one law for the blasphemous and seditious press, and another for the moral and religious—as if they could make a statute to stop the mouth of the blasphemer, the atheist, and the seditious libeller, which would not likewise affect the writer who advocated sound principles in morals, politics, and religion. It was in vain for him to contend against the passing of this bill. The House had already allowed it to be carried to its last stage, but it had not yet decided that it should continue a permanent law. He, therefore, if the bill should pass, would offer a clause after the third reading, if no other hon. gent. should think proper to do so, to limit its duration. He hoped the House would consent to the clause, not declare its opinion that b as i sedition would be permanent in this country by refusing to accede to a temporary measure for their suppression.

Mr. Pryce said, that parliament ought not to surrender the liberties of the people permanently to a temporary alarm. It had hitherto been the glory of the English press that it had no previous censorship, but this boast it was now called upon to surrender. Before ministers asked for new powers by this extraordinary measure, they were bound to show that the existing laws were insufficient to suppress the evil complained of after having been duly carried into execution. He was willing as well as the other gentlemen on that side of the House, to sanction measures for the establishment of tranquillity, and he had no objection to the imposition of a tax on some publications, provided the liberty of the press would not be destroyed by the remainder of the Bill. He blamed the government and the law officers of the Crown, for declining to bring on more prosecutions, in consequence of the acquittal of Hone. He must connect the present bill with the other measures which had been brought forward by ministers; and in his mind the system taken as a whole, created more grounds of alarm than the state of the country which it was intended to meet, alarming as that was. In order to see the intentions of ministers, the bills should be considered as they were originally introduced, and not as they were subsequently modified. The honourable gentleman then went over the changes made in the traverse-bill, the seditious meetings bill, the blasphemous libel bill, and the bill now before the House; and contended that their original severity showed the conviction of ministers, not that the power of the Crown should be reduced, but that the influence of the people should be reduced. It had been well said by Montesquieu that the existence of freedom in England mainly depended on the right of petition by public meetings, and the freedom of the public press. How alarming was it to see the former nearly annihilated by the bill for preventing meetings, and the latter about to fall under the enactments of the measure now in progress. He besought the House to weigh well the consequences which would attend the present bill before it gave it its sanction. At least it ought to be rendered temporary. The sentiments which he had uttered were those of an honest man, and he requested the House to pardon him, while he entreated it to give the measure full consideration before it should be finally adopted.

Mr. J. Smith said, he could not refrain from delivering his sentiments on that part of the bill which required recognizances and securities, convinced as he was that it must be ruinous to a useful body of men. Some objections to it were so evident that they met every eye, and yet no necessity had been shown for enacting it. He himself had at one time great apprehensions from the blasphemous and seditious press, but his mind was set at rest on the subject by the speech of an hon. and learned gentleman last night, who had proved that juries were not unwilling to convict when the prosecution was judiciously commenced, and the trial properly conducted. That speech remained unanswered, and appeared to him unanswerable. That the law-officers of the Crown had not tried the strength of the existing laws, as they ought to have done, before they demanded an alteration of them, was evident from events that came under his own observation. Nothing could exceed his surprise at reading an account of the Smithfield meeting of July last, and at finding that the chairman was not prosecuted for the language of the resolutions signed by him. By one of these resolutions the persons who concurred with the chairman declared that they would not obey the laws beyond the beginning of next year; by another, that they would not pay taxes beyond a certain period; and by a third, that the national debt was a swindling concern on the part of the House of Commons, and ought not to be liquidated. He took it for granted, as he just then arrived in town, that the individual who presided at the meeting, and whom he had never seen in his life, would be brought to trial, and that he then should see him. He concluded that the law could not be allowed to sleep, and that the only question would be, whether the language was merely seditious or not also treasonable. Certain it was that no government could long exist which allowed any portion of the people to pass such resolutions. He really believed that if a prosecution had been immediately instituted against the parties to the Smithfield meeting, the late fatal occurrences at Manchester might never have taken place. Why was not the law enforced, and offenders brought to trial, before new laws were called for? He wished gentlemen to consider whether the present bill would not do more harm to the interests of a body of men who were employed in the trade of circulating cheap good publications, than good in the prevention of tracts of an opposite tendency. Its operation in the first case was certain. It must condemn to absolute ruin a set of men as obedient to the laws, and as well affected to the constitution, as any member of the House, without offering any proportionate advantage; and how gentlemen could bring their minds to support a measure of which this must be the consequence, he was at a loss to conceive. He would not agree to it till it was proved that it was calculated to check more mischief by suppressing bad publications, than to produce injury by ruining a numerous and useful body of men. As an honest man he could not consent to the measure, and the sentiments which he felt, with respect to it he was assured were entertained by most of the inhabitants of the country. Measures, such as the present, could not be enacted with safety, and the House would, he hoped, not consider him intrusive, when he assured it that he sincerely deprecated the enactment of them.

Mr. Cooper had conscientiously supported his majesty's ministers in passing the bills, which the necessities of the country required to be passed at this important time, and for that reason he would state why he would support them on the present occasion. The press, like other things, was a good or an evil, as it was well or ill employed. The freedom of the Press was productive of benefit, while, on the other side, its licentiousness tended to the injury of the state. All infractions of the law required to be punished, but chiefly infractions of the law on the part of the press, which, instead of breaking the law, ought to labour for its being properly obeyed. Some additional measure of this kind, he thought, was called for by the extensive spread and incalculable multiplication of blasphemous and seditious works. This increase he attributed in part to the effect of Mr. Hone's acquittal. That acquittal excited alarm among all the friends of religion and order, and encouraged a noxious brood of scribblers to proceed with greater audacity, and to scatter their venom through the land. The measures which his majesty's government had introduced would operate as checks to the mischief. It was objected to the present bill, that it was equivalent to a censorship—an imprimatur. This was not the case. It merely required publishers to give security beforehand, that they would abide the award of a judge and jury, in case of publishing any thing libellous. The House had already done much. It had passed a bill to prevent drilling; it had passed a bill to enable magistrates to seize arms that might be turned against the peace of the country; it had passed a bill to regulate public meetings, and to expedite justice; but all these measures would be still insufficient, unless they were aided by a law to restrain the corrupt and mischievous, the blasphemous and seditious press. He thought the measure deserving support, which contributed to put down those pests of civilized society—the itinerant orators, men, who were (as Cobbett called them, in his better days) the parasites of the mob. He was fixed in his opinion that the corrupt, seditious, and blasphemous press ought to be restrained, more especially that part of it which infused a weekly venom into the popular mind; and he, therefore fully accorded with the great majority of the House, in giving sanction to measures, which could alone effectually produce the desired result.

Mr. Calcraft agreed with the member who had just sat down, that no measure was of more importance than that which went to regulate the freedom of the press. He agreed likewise with the hon. gentleman, that when publication without previous censorship was allowed, the person who published ought to be liable to all the consequences of his own act. This was the law of the land at present. It had been acted upon and found sufficient in the best periods of our history. The only question between him and the gentlemen opposite was, whether the existing law was now sufficient to restrain the licentiousness of the press, without any new enactment. He complained of the increase of blasphemous and seditious libels as much as any of those who supported the bill. Indeed, he might ask, did any one in the House defend that tainted part of the press? All that he called upon the supporters of the bill for was, to show that the law, as it had existed for 120 years, was now insufficient to correct the evil of which he as well as they complained.

He contended, in opposition to them, that the law had not been tried and found wanting; and he would appeal to a document on the table to confirm the truth of his statement. What said that paper to which he alluded? It showed that in the year 1818 there was no information filed or prosecution commenced against blasphemous and seditious libels. Why then complain of the law as insufficient, before its insufficiency was proved, or before an attempt was made to execute it? From the same paper it appeared, that in 1819 there had been various informations filed, and those that had been tried had led to conviction. The name of the notorious offender Carlile stood at the head of the list with two convictions opposite his name. Did this prove the insufficiency of the law? Why then bolster it up by this bill? Was not the present bill an innovation on the constitution of the country? Was it not a contraction of the liberty of the press? It was not shown, it had not been presumed that there was a necessity for alteration. Why, therefore, was it attempted? An hon. and learned gentleman had quoted precedents from the recognizances entered into by victuallers, who were bound to give security to keep the peace, and to prevent disorder in their houses, but the cases were very different. The offence of publicans was definite, that of libels indefinite. The recognizances of publicans was small, being only 10*l.*; that of publishers was considerable. Was a continual system of declamation against the abominable parts of the worst publications a sufficient proof of the necessity of fresh laws on the subject? If the present laws had not proved sufficient to convict blasphemers, then indeed there might be ground for innovation,—for new enactments. But it was evident that this was not the fact. He had no hopes to make any impression on the members opposite, although they were but few then, but who would soon become numerous, to vote for the bill. A number of respectable men had presented petitions against the bill, and would they have done so, if they had not considered it thoroughly objectionable. Blasphemy was abhorred throughout the country. All knew how odious the conduct of Carlile, after it became evident, on his trial, appeared to the country. With regard to the acquittal of Hone; it was well known that he had been prosecuted for an attack on the ministers, and not for his having parodied any thing sacred. With respect to parodies, they had been adopted by men of the most splendid talents, of the most enlightened understanding, and of the most elevated station. The prosecution against Hone was a mere act of hypocrisy. It was impossible that a jury could convict that individual, when they saw that statesmen, bishops, and lawyers had published similar productions; and that a parodist was actually a cabinet minister. The worst of the business was, that the measure was to be permanent. It was declared to be for the security and prosperity of the country; but when did England flourish, if not during the last 150 years. While her press was free, that freedom would always contribute to her greatness and her glory. The Solicitor-general had defended the clause requiring security from publishers, on the ground that recognizances were required from publicans; but the cases were different, as the offence of publicans was definite, whereas that of libel was indefinite, and the recognizance of publicans was small, being only 10*l.*, whereas that of publishers was considerable. The hon. gentleman proceeded at considerable length to oppose the bill on account of its tendency to prevent the spread of knowledge, to repress rising genius, and to restrain young authors in poverty, from a free publication of their works. He denied that Mr. Hone's acquittal had the tendency attributed to it, and said the jury could not have punished that individual when they saw that statesmen, divines, and bishops, had published similar parodies, and that a parodist was now a cabinet minister. He concluded by saying, that if the bill passed, he hoped it would be made temporary.

The question was put on the third reading, which was agreed to without a division. Mr. Bernal then proposed a clause limiting the operation of the bill.

Lord Castlereagh had the strongest objections to the temporary duration of this bill, and especially to the duration for the short period of one year. If the House could really consider the provisions of this bill as destructive of the liberty of the press, he should be prepared to admit, that whatever the present exigencies of the country might be, it ought to be merely temporary. It was his opinion, however, that there was not a single clause in this bill which could be rationally considered as an invasion of the liberty of the press; on the contrary, he believed that it was admirably calculated to guard the nation from immorality, irreligion, and those other abuses by which the liberty of the press was always seriously endangered; and therefore he could not see any grounds for restricting its duration to a temporary period. Before he proceeded farther in his argument, it might perhaps be expedient to explain what he understood to be meant by the words, "liberty of the press." The liberty of the press, then, as he understood it was, the right which every individual, under the restrictions of the law, and subject to the decision of a court of law and a trial by jury, had to communicate his sentiments to his fellow-countrymen upon every subject, whether that subject was of a moral, a religious, or a political nature. To him the law of libel seemed as necessary to guard the liberty of the press, as any law made to repress the natural violence of human passion was to guard the existence of society. It was therefore the duty of parliament, whilst upon this subject, to follow up the two principles which it had previously sanctioned, and by so doing, to preserve the country from the influence both of local and of general prejudices. The first of these principles was, that all publications commenting on public events, and thereby frequently conveying intelligence of them, should be rendered liable to a certain stamp duty; and the second was, that the publishers of such works (the character of which was too well known for him to dilate upon) should be made responsible for all that they published, and should, by the security demanded of them, be prevented from evading the sentence of the law in future, as they had too often evaded it in times past. With respect to the second branch of the measure, the law had already subjected the printer to a responsibility; and in order that that law might reach him, he was obliged to put his name to that which he printed. But the evasions which had been resorted to, rendered that precaution inadequate to its object. An individual who afforded no security, although possessed of capital, found means of employing a deputy for the purpose of frustrating all the objects for which the legislature required the name of the printer. Now, in order to comprehend the policy of the law founded upon these two principles, it would be requisite to look not only to the present bill, but also to another, which would come under their consideration that evening; it would then be seen, that it was framed with a view to prevent the publication of blasphemous and seditious libels, and not with a view to inflict vindictive punishment upon any person offending against its enactments. That his majesty's ministers were not hostile to the liberty of the press, was evident from this circumstance—that the law now proposed would not affect the larger part of the press, but would only apply to the lower portion of it; to that class of minor publications of the country which was made the deliberate vehicles of mischief—that class of publications which was avowedly directed against the morals and religion of the country, and for the subversion of the government. The individuals against whom this law was intended to operate, had persuaded themselves that the press, as it was now conducted, was strong enough to subvert the government, and had even boasted that in their hands it would have sufficient power to accomplish that purpose. He, therefore, trusted that the House would acquit his majesty's ministers of any hostility to the press in general, when they saw that the provisions of this bill were directed not against the press itself, but against those who made an improper use of it. Now, what were these provisions? One of them extended the stamp duty to all pamphlets of a certain size and description; and to this provision he was not aware that any objection had been started; indeed, it would be a matter of no small difficulty to start one, for if parliament thought it expedient, either for the sake of increasing the revenue, or for any other purpose, to extend the stamp duty now imposed upon the regular newspapers to those publications which at the same time that they contained the most treasonable doctrines, were little better than a fraud upon the respectable part of the newspaper press, where was the person who would dispute the right of parliament to do so? He therefore thought, that none of the gentlemen who sat opposite him would venture to make any objection to this part of the bill, which, as it went to protect the property of the regular newspapers, who had long contributed to the revenue, under the operation of the stamp laws, from an unfair competition, ought to be of a permanent and not of a temporary nature. Having thus proved that to the first part of the new law any limitation of time would totally unnecessary, the next point to be considered was, the second provision in it—he meant that which demanded security from those who employed their capital and talents in the production of such papers as he had just described. And here he thought it proper to observe, that he perfectly agreed in what had fallen from a learned sergeant on a former occasion, that this clause did not apply in any respect to authors; it applied solely and expressly to printers and publishers. In consideration of this clause, he should keep these three sets of men quite distinct, and should first treat of it as it was said to apply indirectly to authors. Now, he would put it fairly to any member in the House, and would ask him, whether he really thought that any regulation of the present bill, extending to printers or publishers, would be an impediment to any author—whose work was not of a dangerous or seditious tendency? After that question was answered, he would put another, and would ask of what nature that work must be which no printer could be found hardy enough to publish? As the law at present stood, an author might compose a blasphemous, seditious, or treasonable libel; he might carry it to a printer living in a garret, and able to change his residence at a minute's notice with as much indifference from London to Manchester as he would from Manchester to London, or any other place: he might find a printer thus circumstanced, who for a small sum would send this work into the world; and after all, he, the author, might say that he was still amenable to the laws of his country. He might, however, screen himself by placing his printer or his publisher before him. And would any one say that it was proper to allow any man to do so? Would any one defend the law which allowed any person to send a flagitious composition before the public, through the agency of a man who could so easily change his residence, and who, therefore, ran such small risk of meeting with punishment? He would now consider the manner in which this clause affected the printer and the publisher. It had been censured as a very harsh and a very impolitic measure to demand security from them before they were allowed to commence their respective trades; but when it was considered what an extent of capital there was in this industrious and commercial country, now unemployed, could any one suppose that there would be much difficulty in men of character procuring the sureties required, now that the sum required for them was reduced in London to 300*l.*, and in the country to 200*l.*? But it was said that this bill would displace from their occupations men of small, or rather of no capital—who had no other property than the instrument by which they lived. He allowed that it would have this effect; that, to a certain degree, such an effect would be an evil; and that, if there had not been another evil, produced by the present state of the law, more than counterbalancing the former one, he would never have thought of thus depriving any persons of their means of living. The ministers had of late had to combat with the most notorious libellers; and yet, though prosecutions had in some instances been instituted, law could not touch them, as they carried on their business by means of intermediate agents, who were well known to be agents, though the legal advisers of the Crown were not able to procure such evidence of that circumstance as was requisite for a court of justice. A name indeed was given in, but that did not render the party really guilty in any way responsible for his offence. That responsibility had been evaded by persons of talent, character, and property, employing their talent, character, and property, in suborning individuals, who were so low in station, that their punishment produced scarcely any effect on the community, to place themselves in that prominent situation in which they ought by no means to be placed. He therefore maintained that if the House had acted on principles consistent with the freedom of the press, in demanding to know the names of the printer and publisher of every publication, it would not violate those principles, in demanding of the printer and publisher of every publication security for any fine imposed upon them, in case of their publishing improper compositions. Indeed, it was quite foolish to suppose that there was any thing in this bill which trenched upon the freedom of the press; the press had no enemy except its own licentiousness; and that, he hoped, would be entirely abolished by the votes of the House that evening. He had no objection to the House considering this clause as introducing a restriction upon capital, but he must strongly insist upon its not being considered as introducing a restriction on the press. He was even ready to admit that, in a commercial country like our own, nothing was more injurious than to lay restrictions upon capital. They were never sure they were on true ground except when capital was allowed to find its fair level. But then he must at the same time contend, that every case like the present should be considered along with all its circumstances. Of the competency of parliament to impose such a restriction, and to demand such security, the argument used by his hon. and learned friend on a former occasion, must have convinced every member in the House who was to be convinced. Parliament had often required such securities from the mercantile interest of the country; and indeed, to speak the truth, the whole of our commercial relations depended on the securities which existed between merchant and merchant. No man could act as merchant without finding securities; and what was the effect of this circumstance? Why, that no man of fair character ever found it difficult to procure them, merchant always being willing to give security for merchant. Indeed the whole history of our legislation was full of examples of restrictions on capital and industry, when the safety of the country demanded them. In the distillery laws, as well as many others, the House by their regulations had constantly shown, that the preservation of the morals of the people was always with them superior to every other consideration. The restrictions now proposed were not restrictions on the press, but restrictions only on the capital employed in printing or publishing. Where was the hardship in calling upon a printer or publisher to give those securities, which were so customary in the mercantile world? The only effect which it could have upon either of them would be to render them cautious regarding the works which they ushered into the world. The present measure was therefore to be considered in two distinct points of view—first, as it applied to the revenue; and secondly, as it applied to the public morals. That it was of importance to the moral character of the country, no one could doubt; that the preservation of that moral character was a point of greater consequence even than the preservation of the revenue, no one would dispute: if, therefore, he had proved in addition to this, that though it was a restriction on capital, it was not a restriction on the press, surely he had shown good cause why it ought not to be temporary. Looking to the mild and salutary manner in which the laws of England were executed, he could see no reason why any limitation should be placed to the duration of it. The House, if the law were harshly executed, would have the power to modify it, or, if at any future period, when our present dangers were past, it should think good to do so, to repeal it altogether. At this time, however, it was the imperious duty of parliament to meet the evil fairly in the face; to express its opinion upon the measure fully, earnestly, and solemnly; and by that expression of its opinion to convince the nation, that though it was determined to uphold the press, as a free press, it was also determined to make those who conducted it responsible for the offences of which they might be guilty.—As he did not wish to trespass against the attention of the House, he should divert shortly to the other bill, with which the present was connected. With regard to the punishment, he would say that he was desirous of avoiding any description of punishment, in its nature or character uncongenial to the nature of the offence. But he trusted that while the House would avoid any punishment that was of a nature uncongenial to the offence, it would on the other hand take all possible care to deter offenders from committing crimes of such dangerous tendency as the crimes connected with blasphemous and seditious libels. The view of this subject which had been taken on a former occasion was perfectly fair. It was, “Did ever the punishment exist; and if it did exist, will it be necessary to apply it as a remedy; and, if applied, will it be sufficient to remedy the evil for which it is intended?” That the punishment had existed, nobody acquainted with our laws and history could for a moment doubt. That it was at present unnecessary had been contended on the supposition, that if the prosecutions for libel had been more numerous, the offence would have ceased before the present time. But on this argument it was only necessary to remark, that those who used it were prophets of what never could be now ascertained. That it would prove an adequate remedy he firmly believed; and being such, if it was not sanctioned by law, every other effort they might make for the preservation of the public tranquillity would be unavailing; and the moral feeling of the country would be greatly disappointed. He repeated, it—the moral feeling of the country would be greatly disappointed. That the moral feeling of the country was interested in the question could not be doubted after what had been witnessed during the debates on this subject. Indeed such was the general conviction within those walls, that his majesty's ministers had trusted to the impulse of the House; they had declined speaking themselves, and those members who had voluntarily come forward in their defence, had spoken more ably and more eloquently than ministers could themselves have done, and therefore it was impossible for any one to doubt for an instant, in what direction the feeling of the country was running. If, therefore, parliament had paused in the midst of its labours, if it had left the country, as some hon. members had advised, exposed during the whole of the Christmas holidays, to the dangers arising from the blasphemous and seditious pamphlets of the day, they would have fallen low indeed in the opinion of their constituents, and would not have been entitled, as they now were, to their thanks and approbation. With respect to the propriety of increasing the punishment on a replication of the crime, (leaving out any convictions for offences committed antecedent to the first conviction, under the present measure) such a course was recommended by every principle of justice or true policy. If the person once convicted of a blasphemous and seditious libel, committed that crime again, this bill, therefore, recognized the justice, as well as expediency, of visiting the second conviction with a severer punishment than the first. He did not indeed, expect to hear it contended by any one, that an aggravation of punishment for a cumulative offence, was not reconcilable with every principle of penal justice. In the event of a second offence, the House would see that the court would be reduced to this dilemma—either they must mete out his punishment to the offender, without taking into consideration his aggravated guilt, or else they must deal with him in a severer manner than they did on the first occasion when he appeared at their bar to receive judgment. The first of these alternatives was so inconsistent with reason, that no person could be found to defend the adoption of it: and the latter was so fit to be adopted, that banishment was chosen as the best mode of inflicting that additional severity which the aggravated nature of the offence made it requisite that the offender should suffer. As for transportation, he trusted he should hear no more of it, especially as it had been thought fit to withdraw that penalty from the bill, except in cases where the convicted person returning to Great Britain before the term of his banishment was expired, showed a neglect of the court by whose sentence he was condemned. In such cases transportation was to be the fate of the offender, and not death as it was originally intended that it should be. But it had been said, the species of punishment was harsh, and that men ought not, for such an offence, to be subjected to the possibility of suffering the punishment of banishment from the realm. It had been contended that banishment was entirely unknown and quite novel to English legislation. If it was a proper punishment for the offence, the novelty of it could be no insuperable objection, because the laws of England were not so perfect as to be beyond the reach of amendment. But banishment as a punishment, was not novel. To go no farther back than the 36th of the king, that act contained a clause in which it was enacted, that in case of a second conviction for a seditious libel, either by speaking or writing, the punishment was to be banishment or transportation. It was, therefore, a little too much for any member to tell the House that banishment, as a penalty, was novel to the House. Indeed, the most appropriate punishment that could be devised for offenders of this class, was to separate and sever them from that society to whose religious and political institutions they found it impossible to reconcile their sentiments. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House had imagined cases, and had quoted them, as if they had all the weight of facts; they had first supposed a publisher to be twice convicted of selling libellous publications owing to the inadvertence of servants, and had then complained of his case. Would any hon. member pretend to say, that if the inadvertence was proved to the satisfaction of the court, that such a penalty would be inflicted on the defendant as that on which they were now debating? Allowing, however, that it was inflicted in some particular case, would not the House, if it was to regard all the instances of hardship which could be imagined as likely to happen under a penal law, as so many established facts, be compelled to make laws in such a manner as would spare the villain, and would deprive the innocent man of the protection to which he is entitled? Happily, the nature of our laws was such, that a corrective was soon applied to any abuse which might grow up under them; and that corrective was always to be found in the mercy with which the laws were administered. Therefore, to quote cases like those which had just been mentioned, was to tell him what nobody would believe, that the laws of England were administered with harshness and severity. He trusted that, as ministers had not shrunk from the responsibility of the situation in which they were placed, but had applied themselves with alacrity to meet the danger, parliament would afford them its succour to repel it with all that firmness and resolution for which it was distinguished. He trusted that the House would see that they had not trenched upon the freedom of the press, though they had placed a restriction upon capital. If he knew how that could be withdrawn without bringing danger on the press itself, he would willingly withdraw it; but as he did not, he must still continue it in order to continue the press in freedom; for he was convinced, that if the press were left to itself, it would be ruined by its own licentiousness, and would receive its death-blow, not from arbitrary kings or profligate ministers, but from those who would avail themselves of its energies in such a manner as would totally destroy them. The system of regulation now recommended, was not new; and if ever the House were justified in interfering with industry, it was in a case which involved the whole fabric of the morals and religion of the country. On those grounds he should resist the bringing up of the proposed clause.

Sir James Mackintosh rose with extreme reluctance and solicitude, to deliver his sentiments on the question now before the House. His great wish, on this occasion was, if possible, to limit the duration of the bill. The observations which he should have the honour to address to the House would have that object, and that object only. He would not be tempted, by the example of the noble lord, to enter into a discussion of the general system of measures which were now in progress through parliament. If he had been in health, he would have taken the proper time for that purpose. But he feared the time for making an impression on the House had gone by—he feared the time had passed, when, with any prospect of advantage to the public, he could proceed to take an extended review of those measures. Unfortunately, when he might, perhaps, have done so with some degree of effect, he was rendered incapable by severe illness. If the noble lord had confined himself strictly to the question before the House—to the motion of his hon. and learned friend—whether a limitation should be fixed to the existence of this bill, whether a temporary duration might be adopted consistently with the determination which the House had, he thought, unfortunately come to—a determination to support its principles and provisions—he should have been better able to consult his own strength and the convenience of the House. As it was, however, he felt himself called on to make a few observations on the extraneous matter which the noble lord had introduced in the course of his speech, and some remarks on the general principles to which he had adverted. It would ill become him to dissent from the opinion of the noble lord, that the penal laws of this country were capable of amendment. To the furtherance of such an amendment the remainder of his short public life would be zealously devoted. Such an amendment the exertions of a noble friend of his had greatly forwarded, by obtaining a limitation of the power of the attorney-general with respect to the time of bringing on ex officio informations. That, he thought, was the greatest and most beneficial alteration of the criminal law of the country, that had been effected since the Libel bill of Mr. Fox, in 1794. The restriction of the power of the attorney-general and the libel-bill were the two most important constitutional measures that had been effected since the emancipation of the press from the despotic control of a licencer, in 1694; the bringing back of which unnatural authority seemed to be the present wish and intention of some intelligent and enlightened members of the House of Commons. It gave him the highest degree of pleasure, when he reflected, that those great benefits had been obtained for the press by two persons, for the memory of one of whom he entertained the highest veneration, and for the other of whom he entertained the warmest friendship and affection. The noble lord was, he conceived, mistaken, with respect to the nature of the other bill before the House, when he declared that the magnitude and extent of the evil justified its provisions. If the magnitude and extent of the evil were the only question, there would be little hesitation in assenting to the proposition of the noble lord: he acknowledged with shame, he acknowledged with detestation, the existence of publications in this country, which no man of a just or well regulated mind could read without the deepest abhorrence. If the prevalence of those libels alone, if the attacks which they contained on the government, if the ridicule which they contained of religion, if the abuse which they lavished on civilized society, if the incitement to crime of every kind which they afforded, if any, or all of these causes could justify this measure, there would be little hesitation in that House as to the course which ought to be pursued. Every other feeling ought at once to give way to the great consideration of preserving the people from such a contagion. But it was proved, as clearly as any moral proposition, that those evils, from whatever cause they might arise, were not to be traced to inadequacy of punishment, and therefore that fresh penal measures were not called for. Inadequacy of punishment might occasion the growth of a particular species of crime. If many prosecutions took place, if many convictions followed, if many punishments were the consequence, and if still, particular atrocities were continued, it might argue a defect in the criminal code. That would be a case where the nature of the evil would point out a specific remedy. There it might be inferred that the remedy would be found in an increase of punishment, because the existing punishment did not eradicate the evil. But could it be said, where there were no prosecutions, and where consequently there had been no convictions, that there the law was defective? He begged not to be misunderstood when he alluded to there having been no prosecutions—he meant not to insinuate any charge against his hon. and learned friend opposite; he agreed in the principles which his hon. and learned friend had laid down on the preceding night, as being those on which an individual in his high situation should proceed in conducting prosecutions. He only maintained a general proposition; he attached no blame to any person: what he maintained was, that in cases only where prosecutions had been instituted, and no useful example had been made, a new system might be tried as an experiment. But it was not the mere existence of the law on the Statute-book, but the due exercise of the punishment that might be inflicted under it, that could deter from crime. If the punishment of libel was death by the law, and no prosecution took place, the mere nominal punishment could not avail to suppress the evil. But, suppose, as had been said, that certain of the existing evils arose from the indisposition of juries to find verdicts against particular defendants, would the increase of punishment, he would ask, make juries more anxious to convict? He would not reason it so far, as increase of punishment evidently had a tendency to defeat the object which those who awarded it had in view. Was it the difficulty of obtaining proofs that rendered convictions less frequent? If it were so, would additional punishment lessen that difficulty? Would not witnesses, on the contrary, become more unwilling to appear, and would not those who did appear display more art and cunning, in order to destroy the effect of their evidence? With all respect for his hon. and learned friend, to trace the existence of the evil to any cause that pointed to an increase of punishment was not the way to find out the true remedy. On the contrary, he considered that increase of punishment had a considerable tendency to produce rather than diminish guilt. He would take that opportunity of stating, that when this bill went into a committee, it was his intention, as the best proof in his power that he meant to check the publication of blasphemous and seditious libels, to propose a definition of the crime to which the increased punishment should be applicable. He would endeavour so to frame it, that none but those who were actually and wilfully guilty should be punished; but he would attempt to exclude from the operation of its provisions those occasional indiscretions, those unconscious bursts of feeling and passion which if they did not constitute the chief merit, were inseparable from the ardour of all great public writers. He would propose a definition, which would spare the general press of England, at the period of its greatest purity—at the period when it boasted the most splendid talents—at the period when it had effected the most signal services for the country and for Europe, from the ignominy of being confounded with traitors, with blasphemers, with those who were guilty of every species of atrocious crime! He would most sincerely endeavour to propose and carry such an amendment as would confine the action of this bill within those boundaries which could alone justify the adoption of any new measure. But to proceed to the bill immediately before the House. The most extraordinary doctrine of the noble lord, to which he begged to call the attention of the House, was the assertion, that the measure was not dangerous to freedom; that it was not an infringement on the liberty of the press, but an improvement of the existing laws. He was willing to allow that circumstances might arise under which it might be necessary to impose restrictions on the liberty of the press, or the constitutional rights of the subject, for the sake of public order; that even a case might be stated in which the sacrifice of a portion of the press might be resolved upon without a crime, in obedience to the awful demands of the moment; but still, however palliated, excused, or justified, the nature of the thing was unchanged—it was a restriction, a great and serious restriction upon the liberty of the press. If the noble lord had not, he thought, unnecessarily, gone into the general argument, and treated the measure with reference to its two branches—the imposition of a new stamp duty, and the obnoxious provisions which demanded recognizances—if he had not contended that it was not an infraction of the liberty of the press, he (sir J. Mackintosh) would have discharged his duty by saying a very few words on its manifest tendency; but it was impossible for him not to protest against the doctrines of the noble lord as being in themselves untenable, and leading to consequences of the most fearful nature. The House were called on to make a great sacrifice, and the House ought to understand the nature of the bill before they ultimately decided. The noble lord said, that the measure might be considered either as a regulation necessary to improve the law respecting the press, or as a sacrifice of a portion of the liberty of the press for the purpose of preserving the public tranquillity. The latter, he thought, was the true mode of arguing this measure; but let the noble lord view it as he pleased, a restriction on the liberty of the press, a great and serious restriction, it undoubtedly was. This proposition was not perhaps so true with respect to that part of the bill which provided for a new stamp duty: indeed, that part would not be so at all, but for the preamble of the act, which declared, that it was not a tax proposed for the purposes of revenue, but in order to protect the public against various mischiefs. It was indeed like some commercial measures with which they were familiar: it was a protecting duty against publications of a certain size: it was a protecting duty to destroy a class of publications, to the general character of which, as stated by those who had spoken in favour of the bill, he entirely subscribed. But whatever evil those publications were calculated to cause, might, as he had already shown, be repressed by the laws which were at present in existence. Much had been said of copying the example of the Whigs on this occasion: and his right hon. friend, the president of the board of control, had undertaken a singular task in the discharge of his public duty as a member of parliament. He, one of the most eloquent, and most accomplished, and most distinguished ministers of a prince of the house of Brunswick, never lost an opportunity of showing his wit, and exercising his sarcastic talent, in abusing those who placed the predecessor of his master on the throne. No occasion had lately arisen, no subject had been introduced, that his right hon. friend did not descant on this his favourite topic. Those who joined with him in this amusement seemed to forget that, in that House, sixty years ago, those splendid flashes of wit, those lively sallies of imagination at the expense of the Whigs, would have been considered not only highly unbecoming, but almost treasonable; although they were now nightly repeated to the infinite merriment of those to whom they were addressed. His right hon. friend seemed to exult over the fall of the Whigs, when a few nights since he adverted to the time when, as he said, "it had pleased God to put an end to their reign." He would not say who put an end to their reign, but he would say, that they were preserved as long as it was necessary; they were preserved while the throne was in danger: but when the Crown was no longer menaced, when the sovereign was in safety, when the succession was firmly settled, it was then thought fit to sacrifice them, because they would not be the ready and subservient tools of prerogative.

tive. He knew that his right hon. friend who bade the country beware of the Whigs, who indulged himself and all his friends with various jokes about them, was extremely happy when he could find out any acts of those unfortunate and proscribed individuals, who for 60 years had sat on the opposite side of the House, for three or four years only, when those acts bore any resemblance to those of his friends. His right hon. friend had never indulged them with any comment upon the conduct of the Tories. He would there have met with a better precedent to his hand. It would be found in the amusing publication in which Swift described to Stella his visit to London, (and the coincidence was rather curious as applicable to the present measure) that Swift had himself, being then a distinguished Tory, suggested the first idea of a stamp duty, for the avowed purpose of preventing publications against the government. A history of that transaction might tend to render the debate less dry than it at present was. On the day of the expulsion of Walpole from that house in 1712, a message was brought down from the queen, complaining of the inundation of profane and blasphemous libels which threatened to overwhelm the country. And by whom was that message brought down? That message was brought down by a person most infelicitously selected, a man of great genius, of extensive learning, of powerful grasp of mind, but not very remarkable for his attachment to religion, or for any great delicacy on the score of writings directed against religious belief,—that message was brought down to the House by Mr. Secretary St. John. This they were told by Swift, that parricide who endeavoured to destroy that very press to which he owed so much, to which he owed all his fame, and at that very moment all his preferment. But what did he tell them further? That this iniquitous measure entirely failed; for those who were the friends of faction contributed money to the persons whom they employed, which enabled them to support the tax, and to publish as usual; while those who meant honestly, who were engaged by no party, could not procure the means of carrying on their business under the new regulation. The act therefore had a very different effect from that which was intended. But to pass to the most important clause in the bill, that which called for securities from printers and publishers. The noble lord said that it was not a restriction on the liberty of the press, but on the capital employed in printing and publishing. For his own part, he could not succeed in comprehending this distinction. He had always thought that the liberty of printing and the liberty of the press were one and the same; that the terms were perfectly synonymous. The noble lord's authority might be convincing to some; but he was confirmed in his own opinion when he recollected, that one of the most able pieces ever written on this subject, the production of one of the greatest geniuses this country or the world ever saw, was entitled "A Discourse on the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing;" the author, John Milton. It was most clear, that authors would not be very likely to flourish, if printers and publishers were obliged to find heavy securities. They had often heard of obscure young men, possessed, however, of great abilities, rising by the exertion of their genius, from the level of ordinary life to those high situations which, it was the glory of the constitution of this country, were open to all. These restrictive measures would act as a barrier against their advancement. But the noble lord, who was born to rank and affluence—who had no necessity to struggle for honours and emoluments, and who had no opportunity of appreciating the obstacles by which obscure genius was encountered, argued, that young men of talent would find no difficulty under this new act in arriving at fortune and fame by the exercise of their abilities. His hon. friend (the member for Westminster) had described so truly, so ably, the situation of an humble individual struggling under the operation of such a measure as this, and endeavouring to free himself from the trammels thus imposed on him, that he (sir J. Mackintosh) was almost ashamed to add one word to what his hon. friend had said on the subject, but he could not avoid it altogether. The noble lord observed, that if the works of a young man were not libellous, or blasphemous, or seditious, he need not fear to get a person to print and publish them. But what were they talking of? What did the bill particularly refer to? Not to single works, but to periodical publications. And he would ask any lawyer, who understood the practice of the courts, who had marked the undefined, and he would add almost undefinable nature of this offence, whether a prudent man would feel himself justified in becoming security for one who was every day liable to commit an inadvertent error. Would a prudent individual grant his security to an ardent-minded young man, however virtuous, however well-intentioned, who, he knew would be every day approaching the barrier of the press, and who, if he had spirit (and if he had it not, he would not be worth talking about), would be very apt, at one time or other, to overleap that barrier? When an individual, thus situated, approached his friend, and asked him for this delicate proof of his esteem, would not his friend be inclined to say, "I know you are honourably minded, I know you are a most excellent young man, but I will not become answerable for errors you may innocently commit." He would ask of gentlemen, whether there ever was a writer on passing politics—a writer of mind and feeling—who did not, at sometime or other, fall into the offence of libel, and subject himself to the visitation of the law? He knew that sycophants—men of weak capacities—individuals destitute of the fire of genius, who could dress common-place sentiments in smooth language; these he knew, dealing in fulsome trash, might avoid libellous matter. But a man of bold mind, imbued with an ardent love of freedom, reared up in principles of veneration for the constitution, glowing with an honest desire for the welfare of his country, it would be impossible for such a man sitting down to write in defence of that constitution or of that country, to avoid the fearless and animated style which such a theme inspired in such a breast; and by which he might suddenly be subjected to a legal process. He understood the noble lord to say, that this was a law intended merely to restrain an evil: it was indeed a check wholly restraining the efforts of genius, or, at all events, every unprejudiced mind must allow that it would tend greatly to lessen that number of young and intelligent men who wished to take that particular road to distinction: who wished by that particular pursuit to serve the interest of their country. On the other hand, those who did engage in that species of literary career, loaded as it would be by the shackles imposed on it by this bill, and above all, affected by the fear of bringing their friends into danger, would, when they found themselves ineffective opponents—when they found they could not espouse with fame that line of politics to which they were attached, at last degenerate into parasites; for in all arbitrary governments a system of parasitism prevailed. Where men could not write and act boldly, they became mean, timid, and subservient. The pompous inflated style of those flatterers was sometimes called the Asiatic style, but it should be denominated the despotic style: for wherever a despotism prevailed, there also this style prevailed. The fact was, the mind of man was generally in a state of activity and excitement, and if it could not be allowed to vent itself against those who misgoverned, it wrought itself into a sudden state of sympathy and even affection for what it was not allowed to hate. Those who were not permitted to write that which was fact, whom the arm of power prevented from following the bent of their inclination, frequently became the sycophants of those whom they had before detested. Wearied with the repose and lethargy of despotism, they worked themselves up into something like exertion; and flew from dulness to hyperbole. Flattery was the natural resource of human beings under such circumstances; and the worst of it was, that the flattery was not always insincere. The very sincerity of the mind stamped it with baseness. The noble lord argued that this bill did not trench on the liberty of the press, but merely affected the freedom of the trade of printing. How could the noble lord separate them? They could not be dis-united. That was the road the author was travelling in search of fame and fortune, and if it were barred against him, how was it possible that he could succeed? It was the printer and the publisher who placed him before the world, and to deprive him of their aid, was, in effect, to destroy the ability of the author himself. But it was said that the measure would affect only seditious and blasphemous libels. How, he would ask, did the noble lord distinguish them? Men of learning frequently found it extremely difficult, and the uneducated were not likely to discover the difference. The hardship of this bill was well illustrated by a case which had been stated to the House; it was that of a poor and indigent person who set up trade the other day in a very humble line, and who, if unable to procure the required recognizances, would be totally undone. This individual was, when he entered into business, in the situation of many other persons who from very humble beginnings, as publishers, had finally arrived at the highest condition in life. He understood from those who had the opportunity of judging correctly, that the effect of this measure requiring recognizances would be to drive 1-6th of the printers and publishers in London and its environs out of employment. "But," said the noble lord, "they will immediately turn journeymen." This would certainly be a very sudden conversion of one rank of men into another. Now let the House mark what real misery was described in that light language: at what time would they become journeymen? When employment was taken away from them, when their means of subsistence were destroyed. Thus in a moment they would be deprived of the prospect which they had previously cherished of arriving, by an exertion of industry, at an eminent station in society. This information came from the principal booksellers and printers in the city of London—men who professed as great an attachment to the liberty, honour, and prosperity of their country, as any set of individuals, be they who they might. They were men of large fortunes honourably obtained in trade, and they were wholly disinterested as to this question. They were anxious to assist young men who were struggling to emerge from poverty, and who were pursuing that path of fair ambition which the operation of this bill would shut against them for ever. He heard last year with infinite pleasure, the becoming language of an hon. baronet when introducing a bill for the protection of children in cotton-manufactories: he observed, "that nothing could be a more proper return to those by whose exertions he had realized his fortune, than to minister to their conveniences and comfort." On the same principles the booksellers and printers of London appeared before the House, and asked of them to spare those rising tradesmen whom this bill threatened with ruin, and who, if it passed, but for the assistance of the workhouse, must be deprived of shelter and sustenance. Many of those respectable men who thus solicited them, had emerged from the same lowly condition, and, now that they were blessed with affluence, they had more good sense than not to prize their having so risen by their own efforts, more than if they could boast of an illustrious descent. This bill was a

restraint on discussion, through the medium of the press, and every restraint of that kind was a restraint of public liberty. The question then turned to this. Ought this restraint not at least to be made a temporary one? Was there any reason for giving it a permanent duration? He was persuaded, that his hon. and learned friend would not adhere to the particular term which he had stated in his clause, if any disposition appeared in the House to alter the term, but still to render the bill of temporary duration. He was sure his hon. and learned friend would be satisfied, if the measure were to do any thing except permanently to restrain the English press. Let the House recollect these words. Let them pause and consider them; let them reflect on their meaning and purport: "a permanent restraint of the liberty of the English press." That was the object of the measure then before the House. Were gentlemen prepared, without farther consideration, to consent to such a bill, which could not be necessary for the mere purposes that had been stated? Let them take it on one or two grounds—that relative to the restraint of printing, or that which respected the security of the public peace. Let them argue it in the first point of view; let them consider the measure as intended to be an improvement of the laws relative to the press, for so the noble lord had described it; but when he stated, that under the existing system there was an evasion of the law, that there was no mode of collecting fines, the noble lord went a great deal too far. Had the noble lord forgotten, that the law, as it now stood, had other punishments besides fines? Did he not recollect, that when the offending party had no property out of which a fine could be paid, the penalty of imprisonment was increased in proportion? He need not state the old saws of the law on this point, which said the same thing in Latin. In its present state the press had remained without a licenser from the year 1694 to the present hour. In that long period there were many times of danger and difficulty, but a permanent measure like this was not resorted to. He would not argue whether the bill would now press heavily upon the people, but whether it was necessary that it should be permanently directed against the liberties of the people. Speaking in that House, he would maintain that it was directly opposed to popular freedom, and he viewed in the same light every measure which abridged the liberty of the press. If it were intended to be an improvement to the constitution would it not be better to adopt it for a little time, that they might be enabled to judge of its effects? If any alteration were proposed in the government—if any improvement were offered to be made even in a public office, they would be told “Let us see for some time how the project acts, let us see how it works, before we make a permanent law on the subject.” The act of lord Grenville, which effected one of the greatest and best reforms that were ever made in the state—that act which went to destroy a scandalous system of corruption, was at first only temporary. Its effects were known before it was adopted as a permanent measure. Had the House of Commons so little regard for “The Liberty of the Press” that they would not proceed with the same forbearance towards that great right which had made us renowned amongst the nations, which was eulogized by all foreigners, and which, not satisfied with praising, they now endeavoured to imitate? Would they show less caution, would they show less gradual care, in adopting such a measure as that before the House, than they had manifested with respect to lord Grenville’s act—a measure of great importance surely, but not so essential to our freedom, not of such vital importance to us (to use a modern phrase) as the liberty of the press? He recollected the debate in that House in 1795, under circumstances similar to the present; he recollected the speeches of Mr. Fox and of sir William Grant (two of the greatest and most enlightened men in the country) on that occasion; and he well recollected the manner in which the last named individual opened his defence of the measure which was about to be proposed. He (sir W. Grant) said nothing of an improvement of the constitution. “I propose these measures,” said he, “under the pressure of a sad and dire necessity, which has left us no choice but to abandon the whole frame of society, or to take away rights of infinite importance.” That great man stationed himself on the ground, of “dire necessity,” and, in doing so, displayed all the prudence and wisdom, and foresight, which were inseparable from every step of his life. The noble lord, though he had put forward the idea of a general improvement of the constitution, betrayed a consciousness throughout the whole of his speech, that the measure was only called for by the exigency of the present moment. Why, then, should it be of longer duration than others which arose from the same state of things? One of the other bills, the Seditious Meetings bill, was enacted in 1795, and therefore they were acquainted with its operation. But since the licenser was removed from the press, they knew of no restriction on printing. The bill was unexampled and unprecedented. Nothing like it or approaching to it was to be found in the good times of our history, when the press was unfettered and free. It affected one of the most essential privileges of Englishmen; that of discussing public measures. Was it, then, too much under these circumstances, to beseech the House to influence the noble lord by some manifestation of feeling, to consent that this should be a temporary measure? The noble lord had shown singular propriety in giving way to the House with respect to the provisions of one of those measures; let him then consider the present bill as a mere experiment on the constitution, or else as a temporary measure to expire at a given period. He had heard with some surprise, an hon. gentleman some nights ago assert, that the liberty of the press formed no part of the Bill of Rights. This was calculated to disparage that bill, to lower it in the estimation of the country, and would have been well worthy of those who wished to make the people think that it was not a Bill of Rights, but a bill of wrongs. He was much surprised that such an assertion should have fallen from an hon. gentleman who was intimately acquainted with the constitution of his own country, and was the historian of another great and free state. He was indeed astonished, that a gentleman who was so deeply versed in the history of the constitution in every part and particular, who had written a history of a powerful and independent republic, who had passed a great part of his life in studying the laws, should have forgotten the circumstances connected with the Bill of Rights.—The Bill of Rights was not only a declaratory law, but was connected with many others containing the most important enactments. He would show how the liberty of the press had a connexion with the Bill of Rights. At the time of the Revolution, a committee was appointed, lord Somers being of the number, to consider of the best securities for the religion, laws, and liberties, of the people of England—the religion, laws, and liberties which the people of England had ever since supported against the machinations of fraud, and the efforts of violence. The committee brought in a very voluminous report, containing many heads and articles. Parliament divided those which related to new laws from those that were declaratory of ancient rights; every declaratory clause in the Bill of Rights referred to something mentioned in the preamble as having been perpetrated by the deposed king against the rights of the people. There were other laws passed in king William's reign; the Toleration act—that Magna Charta of religious liberty, which was founded on one of those articles, but which fell far short of what the benevolent and enlightened mind of William had meditated.—Another of those articles declared the necessity of the frequent meeting of parliament. Out of that article the Triennial act arose, and therefore it was identified with the Bill of Rights and the constitution. Undoubtedly the government of king William (which he kept up by every sort of compromise, sometimes with one party, and sometimes with another, who agreed in nothing so much as harassing and persecuting their benefactor, whose name had since been degraded by the enemies of freedom), was not so compact and united as it ought to have been. The king abandoned and left his government to the care of his ministers, anxious to perfect and complete the great design which he had long meditated—the deliverance of Europe from a single despot, an event which was not accomplished until after his death, when that great captain,—the duke of Marlborough, carried into execution all that William had designed. The laws which he had adverted to were still to be considered as glorious measures emanating from the Revolution. Of the same character was the refusal to continue the Licensing act of Charles the 2nd, by which refusal the liberty of the press was established. The liberty of the press was, therefore, the offspring of the Bill of Rights, and arose from the spirit of the Revolution, which, in the sacredness of its character and all the elements of greatness, was one of the most interesting and important transactions in the history of the state; as well as one which most merited the attention and admiration of mankind.

Mr. Canning congratulated the House on having at length heard, in the long-expected, and not too much to be admired, speech of his hon. and learned friend, those reasons against the system of measures proposed by his majesty's government, which up to that period had not, he thought, been fully stated to the House. In many, perhaps most of the general principles laid down and enforced by his hon. and learned friend, he entirely concurred. But he thought the whole scope of his argument would go, not merely to the present measures, but to any possible restraint by which the complete and unfettered freedom of the press might be affected. Yet even in that principle, as a principle he was not inclined to differ from his hon. and learned friend; for he thought with respect to the press as with every other part of human freedom, that it was a matter of regret when the legislature was forced to interfere. It certainly was a matter of great regret, when to existing restraints, they were obliged to add others not hitherto enacted; and he considered that the justification of the original, or the augmented restraint, was only to be found in the necessity, or high expediency of the case—not in the value of the rights of any set of individuals, but by a comparison of their rights, with the rights and interests of the community of which they were members. It was one great beauty of the English law, that about small things it did not trouble itself. Much was left to the good sense and discretion of the community, and it was only when that good sense was overborne or laid aside, that legislation stepped in, for the purpose of securing those good manners and good morals which formed the cement of society. It undoubtedly was more desirable that they should be secured without positive enactments, but positive enactments were frequently absolutely necessary. His hon. and learned friend seemed to have adopted the idea, that up to this moment the press was that "chartered libertine," which it had been so eloquently described to be; and that this was the first time that parliament had touched the press; as if it did not live under restraints, which showed the impossibility of ascribing that principle of perfectibility to it which his hon. and learned friend had assumed. Whether it was or was not necessary to impose a new modification on the liberty of the press, certain it was that in looking back to former times, they would find precedents sufficient for such a proceeding. He well recollected the conflict of intellect (and a similar conflict he never expected to see again) which was witnessed in the House of Commons in 1794-5. His hon. and learned friend, in adverting to that period, had overlooked the circumstances of the very last restraint which was imposed on the press. When his hon. and learned friend said, that these measures must operate to the entire destruction of the freedom of the press—that there would be an end to discussion—that men of talent and education would be reduced to complete silence as soon as they were passed, he forgot that the same prophecy, uttered in the same style, was pronounced at the period to which he had adverted. The prophecy did not indeed come from his hon. and learned friend, who was not then in the House, nor yet from the Whigs, whom his learned friend had accused him (Mr. Canning) of reproaching (of whom, indeed, he spoke with less respect as a corporation, than he did in their individual capacity), because they had seceded from their duty; but from a right hon. gentleman opposite, who did persevere in his attendance on parliament. The act which gave rise to this prophecy provided, that presses should be registered; that no person should publish any thing without the printer's name, and that every printer should keep a copy of what he printed. These laws, then introduced, were made permanent laws, of which it was predicated, that if they were passed, they would be equal to an imprimatur, and that the liberty of discussion would be destroyed for ever: yet these laws were passed, and he would ask of all those within the walls, and of every man without them, to whom what passed in that House was conveyed, whether the permanency of those laws had tended to narrow the freedom of discussion; or whether, since they had been enacted, one particle of the liberty of the press had been abridged? His hon. and learned friend's present apprehensions were just as visionary as were the fears which existed at the period to which he had adverted. He had no doubt (and it was because he had no doubt that he willingly agreed to those measures), that when they were passed, notwithstanding all that was said of the danger with which they threatened free discussion, there would not be any want of a full canvass that day twelvemonth, of the measures of government, or of parliament. And if it became more respectable and efficient by being rid of that extraneous matter by which it was at present incumbered and polluted, he believed, instead of losing any thing of strength or power, the free press of this country, as applied to honest purposes, would have greatly gained. His hon. and learned friend seemed to forget, that the object of these measures was, to come at the person really accountable for any writing that might be published. He had drawn from his rich and fervid fancy, an animated picture of a young man wishing to raise himself into public notice by literary efforts (as was his own case, and that of his hon. and learned friend), possessing great talents, looking ardently forward to a career of literary glory, and stopped in the very outset of his efforts by this law. His hon. and learned friend was not borne out in delineating this picture. If he looked to those names which flourished in the annals of British literature, he would not find printers and publishers enrolled there, but authors who were dependent on them. They might indeed be found quarrelling, struggling, and estuating under the tyranny of those persons; but his hon. and learned friend could not easily show him a man of that ardent and enthusiastic character which he had supposed his hero to be, anxiously looking at the gain attending practical publications. This measure was not intended, it was not calculated, to throw any obstructions in the way of genius, but it was to restrain offences which arose from mere pecuniary considerations, and which could most appropriately be prevented only by means of pecuniary consideration. In speaking to that part of the question, it was not fair in his hon. and learned friend to excite and interest the feelings, by representing a person arrayed in all the splendid colours which the richness of his own fancy could supply; it was not fair to impose upon their judgments by exhibiting before them an ideal representation, dressed up in all the colours of the rainbow. If the young author should be free from the influence of pecuniary motives, this law would not be applicable to him, and all the interest excited in his behalf was not available to the present question. He begged to say, that in stating the sentiments of young authors respecting printers and booksellers, he did not adopt them as his own. There were not more respectable persons in the world than those who presided over the press of England. Whatever might be said of those times when literature and bookselling stood to each other more in the relation of market and sale, now that they were not distinct and separate, now that they were united, there were not to be found in the world persons so generous, so noble, so liberal to the young aspirant, as the booksellers of this country. On that score, as well as on others, he would throw no obstruction or impediment in the way of publication; and he as well as his noble friend had accordingly removed from this bill every thing which in their judgment could be removed without impairing its utility and efficacy. What inconveniences still remained, must be classed among the unavoidable inconveniences of the times; and traced, not to an unnecessary pruriency of legislation, but to the diffusion of an evil, with respect to the magnitude and malignity of which there was but one opinion in that House, and with respect to the expediency of checking or not checking of which there was no more question than there could be whether one who had the power should take his stand between the living and the dead, and stop the plague. If a few inconveniencies should exist, if the interests of some persons should be partially injured, if certain difficulties should be presented to those who were now on the threshold of their career, men would soon adjust to the new state of things, their hopes and fears, their plans and exertions; they would gradually obviate all the inconveniencies, and leave only to be contemplated in this measure, an additional security to the peace and prosperity of the country, which would enable them to proceed without impediment and with additional confidence. Of all the amendments that could possibly be offered, the present amendment for making the measure temporary was the one to which he was least disposed to accede. There was or there was not ground for passing this measure. If it was proved to be necessary, there could be no reason to believe that it would in a short time cease to be necessary. On the contrary, the venom accumulating till the expiration of this law should arrive, would then be diffused with increased activity and effect. The general character of the press ought to be rescued permanently from the blots which tarnished its beauty and its force. Then would it proceed as it before had proceeded, rendering most essential services to the country, to the cause of freedom, to the happiness of the world. His hon. and learned friend had not mixed up much of his argument with the consideration of the other bill on the table (the Libel bill), but as he had not been able altogether to separate two questions so closely connected, it perhaps would be for the convenience of the House if the little he (Mr. C.) had to say (for though the bill was important, the provisions were but few, and would not require many observations), he said on the present occasion. The hon. gentlemen opposite had somewhat lowered, and justly lowered the tone of their opposition to that bill—and he knew it would be stated, and truly, that the change in tone proceeded from the concession which had been made by commuting the punishment of transportation for that of banishment. With respect to that commutation, it was the more gratifying to his personal feelings, that it had been conceded to the request of that very respectable body of men, the booksellers of the metropolis. Another petition had since been presented from them, but he hoped that having received this concession to their first application, they would not think it hard if their second application was not received with equal favour. The grievances stated so ably, and with so much distinctness and discrimination in the first application, no longer existed as an objection to the measure in question. If parliament were now legislating for the first time against a crime destructive of the institutions of the country; if they were now to select the punishment which would deter others from following the criminal example, and warn the offender from the repetition of his offence, that punishment was the one which removed from the country and the society which he disturbed, him who, after having offended and received punishment, showed a disposition so rooted in his nature, as to return to the same course. What punishment so appropriate, as to oblige him to abjure the realm whose peace and happiness he had repeatedly invaded and endangered? If this punishment had been so unknown in our history as it was asserted, but not proved, to be; if it had been as new as this act; if it had never existed before; if they were called upon for the first time to assign a punishment for this indefinite, and, if he might not be mistaken he would use the expression more noble offence (for all political offences were of a higher and nobler order than mere larceny); if they were to enact some punishment which would save the country from the perils occasioned by the offences, and remove the offender from the sphere of offending,—the punishment of banishment, if not already invented, ought to be found out for the purpose. His hon. and learned friend, as well as many other hon. members, had said, that this measure would leave the press in a worse state than at any period since the revolution. But it was not considered that the state of the press had since that time been greatly improved and elevated. It was not above three or four years since the punishment of the pillory was abolished. Up to that very late period a power was in the breast of the judge to apply that punishment to the crime of libel. Did he regret the alteration thus made in the law? No. He would not refer to his vote upon that subject, for that was nothing; the punishment having been abolished by acclamation. But if it had been then proposed to substitute banishment on a second conviction for the pillory, in all cases, would any rational man have denied that the law would be made better by the change? If this had been the only alternative, would the House have hesitated to adopt it? The pillory was at all times in the discretion of the judge; banishment would be in his discretion only on a second offence. The pillory had been most happily abolished, as it was a most degrading and infamous punishment—a punishment holding up men of letters and education to the gaze and insults of the populace. Be it recollected, too, that this punishment had been applied in modern times. The press had therefore gained a higher rank than it held before. He would go as far as any man in separating the respectable part of the press from those who were hostile, not only to the present government, but to all government. But it was one of the necessary evils of the aggregation of society, that justice could not strike its victim, without in some degree alarming or dispersing the herd among which it sheltered itself. It was no disgrace to the more noble animals, that those who associated with them but to degrade them were singled from amongst them; but the House could not have shown itself equal to meet actual danger, and suppress menaced rebellion, unless it put down the principles which agitated the country, and which wanted only courage in the advocates of them to display themselves in open rebellion. An hon. and learned gentleman had said that the government had already done enough, that the measures already passed were sufficient, and that parliament should beware of driving the people to despair. Good God! drive the people to despair! of all—not fallacies, for fallacies implied a use, though a perverted use, of the reasoning faculties,—but of all the vulgarisms that could disgrace discussion, of all the abuses of terms which could be committed, the misuse of the word “people” was the worst. What was the meaning of the word “people?” The people, as synonymous to a nation, meant a great community, congregated under a head, united in the same system of civil polity for mutual aid and mutual protection, respecting and maintaining various orders and ranks, and not only allowing the fair and just gradations of society, but absolutely built upon them. That was a “people.” But in a mass of persons, first stript of the government, then stript of the aristocracy, then stript of the clergy, then stript of the magistracy, then stript of its landed proprietors, then stript of its lawyers, then stript of its learning, then stript of every thing which ornamented and dignified human nature—in such a mass he could no more recognize the people, than he could recognize in the tub of Diogenes the man of Plato. A mere populace, deprived of every thing essential to what by common consent was called a nation, could not, without the grossest perversion of terms, be called a nation. But when the term “people” was applied to a portion of a community arrayed against the interests of the nation; not only distinct from, but hostile to the nation; when the term was applied to such as these, it tended directly to encourage insurrection and rebellion. He was sorry therefore to hear an hon. and learned gentleman of so much eminence, give into the use of so vulgar an application of language, and insinuate that these were two hostile parties—the government, endeavouring to appropriate a certain portion of the constitution, and the people praying to be allowed to retain their rights. The hon. and learned gentleman had expatiated on the claims of a portion of the people, while he had left out of view that part of the people without the security of which there could be no order, no safety, no happiness. On their behalf, who were last in the fair arrangement of society, the hon. and learned gentleman had been more solicitous than on that of all the other orders of the state. But in behalf of all the other orders of the state, and on behalf of the last order too, he (Mr. Canning) implored the House to quench, not as a temporary experiment, but with eternal and lasting indignation, the accursed torch of discord which was blazing or smothering throughout the country. He earnestly deprecated the notion of treating this evil as lightly as an excise bill or a custom-house regulation; and he trusted that parliament would not give the authors of the tremendous metaphysics, so unfortunately prevalent, the hope that any hesitation existed on the subject; but that, on the contrary, they would at once enact a measure that would save what was respectable, annihilate what threatened destruction to all order and security, and thus prevent at the same time the present continuance and the future repetition of the evil which called for their interposition.

Mr. Denman, in explanation, disclaimed any such confined and partial use of the term "people" as had been imputed to him by the right hon. gentleman. The people for whom he had addressed the House, and on whose behalf he had implored consideration and protection, were a part of the nation, born and nurtured under the constitution, and inheriting a right to its liberties and laws. The measures now under consideration would annihilate their rights. When this bill should pass into a law, the liberty of England would no longer exist.

Mr. Brougham remarked, that the right honourable gentleman having found the speech of his hon. and learned friend, to which he had professed his intention of replying if not unanswerable, rather dangerous to approach, had, by a species of tactics not unusual with him, flown off from it to other topics, and fastened upon a casual expression used by another hon. and learned friend of his, but not meant in the sense attached to it by the right honourable gentleman. Yet to this casual expression the splendid part of the right hon. gentleman's speech exclusively applied.—

The right hon. gentleman had first asked what the consequences were of the measure passed in 1799, of which the same consequences had been predicted as were now predicted of this measure. He had told the House, that it had been said at that time that the constitution of England was gone, that the liberties of England were at an end, and that the people were all slaves. The House would judge of the accuracy of the right honourable gentleman's report of what had taken place in 1799, from his report of what took place in 1819, when he put, and put not unwarily, into the mouth of his hon. and learned friend what his hon. and learned friend had neither said nor meant. There was not a more common way of triumphing in argument, than by exaggerating the argument opposed to you. On his side of the House they were not so bad logicians as to cut the ground from under them by exaggeration. A bill was passed in 1799, not to be named in the same day as to degree, nor even to be placed in the same rank as to manner, with the present bills, but which contained a considerable innovation on the law (which if he had been a member of the House he would have opposed) by compelling in all cases printers to furnish evidence against themselves. They were compelled to enrol their names at the Stamp office, to keep a copy of every paper they printed, so that there was never a difficulty in getting evidence of the writer, or the person who was responsible for the writer, of every libel in such papers. It was however, on the efficiency of these measures that he in great part relied as an argument against the present bills. Was it nothing that such an act as that of 1799 had passed? Had it armed the government with no power? Because that bill had been passed, was it not a strange argument to maintain that the important powers thus granted to the government, formed a reason for passing another measure carrying to excess in degree the principle of the former act, and introducing besides a new principle in the legislation of the country? The right honourable gentleman had said that the bill would not touch the sound part of the press; but this allegation he had by no means supported by argument. Men of genius were too often as penniless as they were friendless, and every eminent writer must at first be unknown and untried. Now, how could it be supposed that any man of common prudence would for the sake of a friendless and penniless writer, subject himself to a security of 300*l.*; or, if the publisher were different from the printer, for 600*l.*?—Would any man of prudence subject himself to such a risk, without any security for the prudence or the solvency of the untried writer? The booksellers who crowded the table with their petitions, declared they would not. But the right honourable gentleman said, that this difficulty could easily be got over. If so, he asked, how was it to be got over? It was said that the security of a friend would operate as a caution to the writer; but where was the writer to find the friend? The right honourable gentleman then told them, that the offender must be struck, although the multitude of nobler animals with whom he associated should be scattered. But this was the very reason why he opposed the measure. If the present law were enforced, it would be seen that it possessed full power to separate the innocent from the guilty. If it did not possess that power, let the failure be proved, at least let some instance of that failure be pointed out. When the failure of all other measures had been proved, then would be the time to propose a measure which would involve the innocent and the guilty, the noble and the ignoble in the same punishment. They had been told in the course of this discussion that it was to the tendency of the actions of men, and not to their motives that they must look; that the intention was evidenced by the tendency, and that they should not inquire further. In the case of the verdicts, for instance, on the trials of Mr. Hone, an hon. and learned gentleman had risen in the House, and said that God forbid he should impute any bad motive to those juries, but that the tendency of their acts was to sap the foundations of our religious establishments. Then again, as to the subscribers for Mr. Hone after his acquittal (though, by-the-by, he was all along spoken of as if he had been convicted), they were spoken of in the same manner as the juries, being as much bepraised and as severely censured [a laugh.] Their motive it was said, no doubt, was charity—a thing almost as sacred as the verdict of a jury, but the tendency of their act was most mischievous. In the same manner he should consider the conduct of the ministers; their conduct, with respect to the press had been most pernicious in its tendency, though God forbid he should say any thing of their motives. But if,

as he should be able to show, the conduct of ministers had an inevitable tendency to produce the effects which were now manifest, he asked with what face they could come to parliament and ground on three years toleration of the licentiousness of the press, if not a subversion, a serious restriction of its liberty. He had already mentioned to the House some instances of the length to which the licentiousness of the press had been carried. He had been told by some, that it was incredible such things could be written in this country.—He too should have been incredulous as to the existence of such writings, but for the evidence of his eyes. In one of these productions (Sherwin's) the question of resistance was seriously discussed in a series of weekly discourses, not stating the matter as in speculation, but applying it as to the present times, and the present rulers, under the head, "The Folly of Petitioning Parliament." This was in the years 1817-18. In the course of these essays, the people were told, that unless "they awakened from the fatal delusion of petitioning parliament," unless they taught their tyrants that bayonets were not made for tyrants alone, but for the people, there was an end of the last remaining hope of liberty. The general subject was brought home, and applied by practical illustrations. He should still doubt, if he had not the evidence of his own senses, that such language could be published by an Englishman, and in the city of London. He next read an extract from the same publication, in which it was recommended to "pull down the present dynasty." On the 12th of July, 1817, a number was published which contained this expression;—"When reform (the writer had made it previously manifest, that by reform he meant revolution) shall have taken place, it will be asked why a million and a half is given to one man. (Here the writer showed his accuracy, when he said that his majesty had 1,500,000*l.*, just as a lord of the admiralty had 1,500*l.* for his private or personal expenses.) It will then be asked of what use he is, what service he performs, or whether it would not be as well if his services were dispensed with, &c." Afterwards occurred an expression that persons were "degraded by the name of subjects." Again, "Petitioning is now synonymous with patience. Government must soon expire for want of means; but ought we to wait for that period?" He begged pardon for trespassing so much upon the patience of the House, by reading as he had done from a printed book in the absence of the hon. member for Montgomeryshire, who, if he had been present, would perhaps have made it necessary to call the individual to the bar of the House. It was not in this publication alone, that such doctrines were to be found; there was an infernal constellation of such writers. The Cap of Liberty; The Medusa; The Gorgon; &c. and surely never were names better adapted to the things. All were not alike; the bolder tried the way, and when impunity was deemed secure by experience, others followed.—In 1817, there were but two or three; in 1819, ten or twelve had sprung up. In one, assassination was alluded to by the expression “the bountiful interposition of Providence, by the assistance of John Bellingham.” In another, on the occasion of a memorable death, which he thought had united all the country in a common sorrow (that of the Princess Charlotte), the writer anticipated a disputed succession, and discussed the qualifications of monarchs. “We had,” he said, “experience that a king might be a fool and an idiot; that the more unprincipled the man, the better the sovereign; that he ought to be a villain, or the monarchical establishment of England would fall off from its reputation.” Another remarked, that the attorney-general had at length mustered courage to notice the writer’s labours.—This was three months after the libel had been printed. Then, indeed, when the measure of the attorney-general’s forbearance was full, notice was taken of this publication, and three months after that notice this display of tardy vigour was made matter of taunt by its object, who added, that he was determined to lose his life rather than that the government should continue. Then followed a libel on the private character of our venerable monarch, which so far exceeded all he had read in atrocity, that he must be spared the pain of repeating it. That was in November, 1817; and he desired to know whether the writer had ever been brought to trial? If the trial had come on, it certainly was not in any court of justice in this kingdom, for the only notice that had ever been taken of the libel was in the publication itself. On the 26th of September, 1818, a new line of attack was commenced: then appeared some observations on the administration of justice, in an article, entitled “Remarks on the murders about to take place at the Old Bailey”—alluding to the trials for forgery. The world was not left in the dark as to the writer’s opinion of the judges. One of the remarks was—“The knave on the bench will not fail to say,” &c.; meaning of course the chief justice, or one of the puisne judges. Yet this man was never brought to trial. It had often been said, that assassination would never be allowed to be openly advocated in this country; but the following extracts would show that it had been publicly recommended, and recommended, too, with impunity. The work of colonel Titus, in Cromwell’s time, called Killing no Murder, was no bad beginning; but this which he was about to notice, and which appeared in the spring of 1818, went much farther. The writer, after remarking that he had lately met with an old book called, Killing no Murder, proceeded to apply the doctrine of colonel Titus to the men who now governed the country, pointing them out individually, by naming the offices which they respectively held. He afterwards said, “When they began their system of tyranny by suspending the Habeas Corpus act, the proper way would have been to have put them to death.” Again, it was asked by this writer, “Are not any means justifiable that may put an end to such a system? and would not that man who should destroy such a government, deserve well of his country?” But he should not trouble the House with any more of these extracts. If those cheers meant that the extracts which he had already read were not to the purpose, he denied the fact; for they showed, that with these atrocious libels before them, and with the means of putting them down in their hands, those whose duty it was to suppress them had not attempted to use the existing means. If, on the other hand, it was meant by those cheers that he had read more than was sufficient to prove his position, his object was answered. As that, however, might still be doubted, he should take the liberty to read another passage, to show that assassination had been unequivocally recommended. [The hon. and learned gentleman then read a long extract, in which it was stated that taxes were unjust, and that any man who imposed them, or demanded them, whether minister, magistrate, or collector, might be justly put to death with any weapon, either dagger, sword, knife, or pitchfork.] Such was the flower that sprouted in the spring of 1818, after the libels which had been published when the leaves were falling in the preceding autumn had been allowed to pass unpunished. And what wonder that the impunity with which they had so long been permitted to transgress should have led to this result—should have induced them to recommend the assassination of the governors of the country? This it was that brought him to the same conclusion with his hon. and learned friend, that till it had been shown that the existing laws had been applied, and had been found ineffectual to put down the mischief, parliament ought not to make new laws, putting additional power into the hands of those who had made so little use of that with which they were already vested. When any one contrasted the late apathy with the rigour, amounting almost to persecution, with which at one period all liberal principles had been treated, he thought that one main cause would be discovered of the extent to which this licentiousness had of late been carried. About eight or nine years ago, a prosecution had been instituted against an individual, for publishing an article, of a character very different indeed from that of the publications to which he had just referred. Of that article, the most libellous part was the following expression:—“What a glorious example it will be in the power of the Prince Regent to set when he succeeds to the throne!” and the person first brought to trial was not the original publisher, but one who had copied it into his paper from another publication. The result was, that he was acquitted, and properly acquitted, not only in the opinion of every liberal person unconnected with the proceeding, but he might say, in the opinion of the learned judge who presided at the trial, and who summed up the evidence with a leaning to the side of the defendant. Now, he would call on any honest man, to lay his hand on his heart and say, whether he believed that any course could be pursued more calculated to sap the very foundation of the laws, than this unequal manner of administering justice—one day allowing treason, blasphemy, and incentives to assassination, to pass unpunished and unnoticed, and another day incurring enormous expenses by prosecuting persons who had not offended against the laws. Having said thus much on the question immediately before the House, he should not have trespassed longer on their attention, had not something been said on a former night, which had made a greater impression than almost any other circumstance that had been stated respecting the progress of blasphemy and sedition, but which he had the means of completely contradicting. He alluded to what had been said by the right hon. member for Dublin, respecting the practice of teaching blasphemy in certain schools, called Union Schools, in the north of England. Schools of that description were of such service to the community, that they ought not to be charged without sufficient reason. He believed it was the schools at Stockport and Macclesfield against which the accusation was brought; and a gentleman of great respectability, who had inquired into the matter, had furnished him with the means of showing that the accusation was perfectly groundless. This gentleman, who was as great an enemy to sedition and blasphemy as any of the hon. gentlemen opposite, had visited the schools in question, and from his letter, part of which he would read, the House might judge of the nature of those schools. The hon. and learned gentleman then read extracts from the letter, in which it was stated by the writer, that he found in the schools 25 bibles and testaments; that the primer used was Mrs. Trimmer's spelling-book (was this “the blasphemous primer?”); that the teachers were steady serious persons; that the expense of the schools was defrayed by a subscription of one penny a week for each child; that sermons were preached every Sunday; that the preachers who officiated were five in number—three Methodists and two Calvinists; that in the morning, prayers were read before any instruction, and that prayers were read in the evening before the dismissal of the boys. In short, that the whole discipline of the school was connected with prayer. Here the hon. and learned gentleman, observing some symptoms of impatience, said, he was aware that many persons liked better to listen to accusations than to the refutation of groundless charges. Those who maintained that the “intensity of light” which had burst on the people, disqualified them from enjoying liberty; those who held that education was a curse, calculated to make the people bad subjects; those who entertained such opinions were more likely to be heard than himself, from the cause which he had stated—namely, that groundless charges were litened to with more patience than the refutation of such charges. He thought it important, however, that these schools should be defended from an unfounded accusation; and he was sure that no one would rejoice at the correction more than the right hon. and learned gentleman who had been led into this error. Could it be supposed, that in these schools they were in the habit of using blasphemous primers, and that, whenever a person rapped at the door, they put them out of the way, and got Mrs. Trimmer's spelling-book ready to be exhibited? The writer of the letter before alluded to stated, that the discipline of the school was of an evangelical cast, and that meant too religious. He was not one of those who was credulous enough to believe, that in the presence of visitors nothing but the Bible and Mrs. Trimmer's Catechism was in the hands of the children, but that the moment strangers turned their back, the masters, with shut doors, taught irreligion and blasphemy. To expect the House to believe that such was the real state of the case, was to draw so unconscionably on its credulity, that in his opinion the draught would not be accepted. He believed that not one atom of treason or irreligion could be found in these schools. He should not forget to state, that they had some copy-books, containing sentiments respecting the affair at Manchester, which were not likely to be relished by persons of ultra-tory principles; for although there was nothing whatever of a seditious nature in them, they were expressive of opposition-politics. It ought to be observed, that the magistrates had no affidavits of the facts which they had stated respecting these schools; they had merely sent up the report on hearsay. The gentleman from whom he had received the facts which he had submitted to the House, added in his letter, that all these schools were supported by subscription, and that, as there was not one of the subscribers so high in rank as a shopkeeper, it was with the utmost difficulty they were able to support them; but that still they struggled, at the expense of their own comfort, to provide instruction, religious instruction, for their children. Yet against these persons a clamour had been raised, and they had been represented as wretches, who were not content with speaking and publishing blasphemy and sedition, but were even labouring to poison the minds of their children with those principles. Thus much he had thought it necessary to say in vindication of these schools, although the subject was not immediately connected with the question under discussion.

Mr. Plunkett said, that every person who had heard the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, must be sensible that he owed it to himself and to the House, not to suffer the allusion which had been made to what had fallen from him on a former occasion to go unanswered. It was now nearly a month since he had taken the liberty of offering his humble sentiments on the situation of the country. At that distance of time he had made use of expressions, which, he ventured to say, had been that night most completely although he was sure not intentionally, misquoted. He would take the liberty of stating what he believed he had said, and thus the mistake which had arisen would be set right. He was first charged with having said, "that the conduct of magistrates ought not to be too critically inquired into." Now he begged permission so state, that at the time he made use of this expression, there was no appearance of an indemnity being asked for on the part of the magistrates, nor, as he was apprised, of any intention existing of screening them from the operation of the law as it affected their conduct. He conceived that their conduct was open to inquiry in the court of King's-bench, and he did say, that it was inconsistent with the dignity of the House to stop short in the task which their public duty imposed upon them, for the purpose of critically inquiring into their conduct, and for parliament to exercise a degree of criticism which could not have been exercised in a court of justice. This was what he meant to say, and what, he believed, he had said. The next charge brought against him was, that he had looked for a definition of liberty among the records of the Roman empire, and in the Justinian code. He had defined personal liberty to be potestas faciendi quicquid leges licet; but he had at the same time said, that there was as well as a personal a political liberty. It would have been candid in the hon. and learned gentleman to have stated, that he had made that distinction. His hon. and learned friend had brought another charge against him, which was that he had asserted, that the "intensity of light" which was thrown on the people unfitted them for the enjoyment of liberty.

Mr. Brougham. I did not say that you directly said so, but such an inference was deducible from your expressions.

Mr Plunkett resumed. He would now state what he did say on that occasion, he had said that an intensity of light (which he did not regret but rejoiced at) was thrown upon every subject for the last few years, that public curiosity, with respect to the affairs of government was excited to such a pitch, that the faculties of the great portion of the people were not sufficiently exercised to consider well and thoroughly—that therefore it was likely to lead them into error, and that it was the duty of parliament to see that good and wholesome food was administered to the minds of the people. His hon. and learned friend had said that he had charged some of the schools in England with teaching blasphemy and sedition. He admitted that he had said he believed blasphemous libels, which had been made the subject of public prosecution, had been formed into primers for the purpose of inculcating into the minds of children that description of pestilence. His hon. and learned friend had stated, that it was a mistake to say that any thing like blasphemous or seditious doctrines were taught in certain schools. But admitting the statement of his hon. and learned friend to be quite correct, would that serve to prove the fallacy of the information which he (Mr. P.) communicated to the House, upon a former evening? That information he still believed to be correct; and surely his hon. and learned friend was not prepared logically to maintain, that because he was acquainted with certain schools where no such mischievous system of education was admitted, that therefore this system was not pursued in any other schools. His hon. and learned friend's contradiction could not, indeed, be effective, unless it applied to the precise schools in which he (Mr. P.) had the best authority for stating, that instruction in blasphemy and sedition actually prevailed. But he had this evening had a letter put into his hands by a member of that House not then in his place, from which letter it appeared that the blasphemous doctrines which had of late been so widely circulated, and so justly censured, were inserted in primers, for the purpose of inculcating children in a particular school, the name of which he felt it would be in-delicate to mention. The letter he should be happy to communicate to his hon. and learned friend, but he did not feel that he should be justified in pointing out the particular school, as the individual concerned would have no opportunity of defending himself. And now having said so much as to his personal vindication, he begged leave to say a word or two with respect to the merits of the bill under consideration, which, in concurrence with the language of his right hon. friend on the other side of the House he could not conceive in any degree an infraction of the liberty of the press. In the first place, this measure did not in any degree interfere with the great standard and truly useful works which were published by the respectable booksellers: and then as to those ephemeral publications which were called newspapers, which were highly respectable, and in which facts were fully stated—in which productions were generally tolerated, as they ought to be, far beyond the line of argumentative disquisition, this measure only proposed to put other periodical publications on the same footing as those newspapers. What then, could be fairly urged against the adoption of such a measure? It was said that there was a class of publications containing ribaldry and trash which no respectable newspaper would admit, because any newspaper inserting such stuff would not be read long or continue respectable; and that such publications should be tolerated for the indulgence of a certain part of the people. All that was intended was, to impose the same duty on those publications which were now sold for twopence as upon newspapers, and this he would say, that if any portion of the people required such a supply of filthy luxury—if they would have such a separate table, they must pay for the gratification of their depraved appetites. His hon. and learned friend, whose eloquence he heard with the admiration which the whole House must have felt, had deplored the fate of young literary aspirants, who he said would suffer by the operation of this measure. But how suffering was to be apprehended he could not at all imagine, and he could not help expressing his astonishment that this distinguished individual who was so worthy to be the great historian of his country, could condescend to mix with the clamour that was raised on this occasion, and to utter such a statement.

filth and ordure, was calculated to restrain the liberty of the press, and to injure that freedom of discussion which was the pride and glory of the constitution of England. The aspirants alluded to by his hon. and learned friend would have ample opportunity, notwithstanding this measure, to send forth their productions to the country, and therefore there could on that score be no reason to oppose the enactment of such a law. The bill was only calculated to suppress those publications which were likely to abuse rather than to maintain the liberty of the press. In the whole course of his political life he had never done any thing more satisfactory to his own mind, or which appeared to him more deserving the approbation of his country, than the part which he had taken on this and the other measures, which, with a view to the public safety, the House had lately felt it necessary to adopt.

Mr. Tierney thought that his right hon. and learned friend when he complained of misquotation on the part of others, ought at least to have taken care not to fall into a similar error himself. He had insinuated, that all on that side of the House objected to this bill on account of the lower class of publications which were sold for two-pence being about to be placed in point of duty upon a footing with other newspapers. He would appeal to the House whether that construction of their arguments was not incorrect. So far from objecting to this equalization of duties, they had, and more especially himself, distinctly stated that they had no sort of objection to this part of the measure. But what was most extraordinary on the part both of his right hon. and learned friend and of the right hon. gentleman opposite was, that they had totally omitted what was the real objection to this bill, and that was the clause which called upon booksellers to enter into recognizances, in London of 600*l.*, and in the country of 400*l.* If this were not a fetter upon the liberty of the press, in the name of God let the bill pass. It was no less, in fact, than saying, that whatever might be a man's talent or virtue, if he attempted to enter into this sort of speculation, he would immediately become tainted and suspected, and must find security for his good behaviour. His right hon. and learned friend and the right hon. gentleman studiously avoided the great objection to this bill, that the danger to the liberty of the press did not arise from its provisions against the seditious, but against every branch of the hitherto free press of the country. How was it that both these gentlemen never adverted to the recognizances which this bill called parties to enter into, without any previous or possible knowledge of the nature of the subject on which they were to write? How came it, that in contradiction of all former principles in the law of libel, the booksellers and publishers were now made the objects of jealousy and penalty? This was a principle not at all consistent with those sentiments which were once expressed by a noble and learned lord now in the other House, who, if, a speech of his when he was attorney-general, which was in the first person, and which he presumed from that circumstance had been reported by himself, were correct, distinctly stated, that his object was, to get at the libeller, and not at the publisher. Allusion had been made by a right hon. gentleman to his own sentiments on this subject; he was sure (although he never corrected a speech of his delivered in that House in his life, at the same time that he had to acknowledge the extreme but unmerited accuracy with which what he had said had been reported), that no sentiment of his could be found at variance with the opinions which he had expressed on the present occasion. [The right hon. gentleman was now making some reference to the Whig opinions of his right hon. and learned friend, which he regretted had not been given more Whiggishly, when he was seized with a sudden indisposition, which for some time deprived him of utterance. Having partially recovered, he proceeded.] He hoped the House would excuse him. He was entirely exhausted. Indeed he felt unequal to the task of addressing them when he rose. But were it the last time that he should ever be allowed to speak in that House, he was most solicitous to avail himself of it to record his protest against the system of measures now pursuing. He believed it in his conscience to be wholly ineffectual to its proposed object, while he feared it would be most prejudicial to the liberties of the people. He conjured the noble lord to make the present bill one of experiment. He conjured him to consent to its limitation to one year. If its advantages should be illustrated by the result, the noble lord might then with good reason call upon parliament to prolong it. If,

as he believed it would, it should prove injurious, the noble lord would then have the opportunity, as he had no doubt he would have the inclination, to relieve the country from its operation.

The Attorney General defended the law officers of the Crown from the charge preferred against them by an hon. and learned gentleman of having neglected their duty by permitting the most atrocious libellers to escape unprosecuted.

Mr. Brougham was explaining, when he was called to order. If the House thought him not entitled to explain, he would make a motion—it was indifferent to him.

Mr. Martin rose to order. If the hon. and learned gentleman intended to frighten the House—

The Speaker observed, that any hon. member in calling another to order, should be careful not to commit disorder himself. It was customary to allow hon. members to explain; but as it was matter of courtesy, the privilege ought to be used moderately.

Lord A. Hamilton supported his hon. friend's motion.

The House then divided: For the clause, 47; Against it, 182: Majority, 135.

The Bill was then passed.

Thursday, December 23.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee on this bill,

Mr. Bernal said, that his feeling of duty upon this subject was too strong to allow the present motion to be carried without entering his earnest protest against a measure which he conceived of the most noxious and dangerous character. This was, indeed, in his view, one of the most odious of the coercive measures which ministers had thought proper to obtrude upon parliament, with a view to reduce the liberties of the people. But there was one clause in this bill which he deemed peculiarly abhorrent to the genuine spirit of the English law, and to the liberal feelings of the English people. He meant that which authorised banishment. For a period of 200 years banishment was unknown to our law, except in ex post facto acts of parliament for the punishment of great state delinquents. Abjuration, which in ancient days was tantamount with banishment, was, with the sanctuary, repealed in the reign of James 1st, both being considered as inconsistent with the principle of the general code. By the 39th of Elizabeth it was enacted, that certain rogues and vagabonds who infested the country in the garb of sailors and soldiers should be sent out of the country, and this enactment was said to suggest the idea of the law of transportation which was passed in the reign of Charles 2nd. But neither of those laws were ever meant to apply to such persons as the present bill had in view. There was what was called a civil as well as a natural death. The former was conceived to take place when a man was ousted from his country and its civil rights. Now, he would put it to the Crown lawyers, whether it was meant that such should be the consequences of banishment under this bill; or whether, as allegiance was only a condition for protection, a man banished, and consequently deprived of protection, owed any allegiance to the British government? He would also ask, could the children of a man so banished, and born abroad, be entitled to claim as British subjects? Was it intended that forfeiture of property should follow from such banishment? But how was the expense attending the banishment of a man to be defrayed? If wealthy, he could of course pay that expense himself, but if poor, who was to pay? Again, if all the world should be at war, as was the case some time ago, where was the banished man to be sent? These were among the questions to which this measure naturally gave birth; but as to the difficulties which he had stated with regard to the legal consequences of such a proceeding, he called upon the Crown lawyers to solve these problems, in order that the House might thoroughly understand upon what it was about to legislate.

Mr. Denman felt it to be perfectly impossible that he should allow the Speaker to quit the chair, without taking the opportunity of warmly protesting against the enactments of this bill. He should cautiously abstain from looking at it, in any observations he might offer to the House, except upon those general principles by which it was connected with the other bills. The grounds, then, upon which he objected to it were virtually the same as those upon which he had proceeded on a former night, with respect to measures affecting the press; and they were resolved into this one, namely—that the necessity of altering the existing laws, so far from being confirmed, was completely disproved by the papers upon the table. It did not appear to him necessary to impute, nor did he himself impute, to his hon. and learned friends opposite, that they had, in the exercise of the important duties confided to them, exceeded the measure of those duties. On the contrary, he heard from one of them, with great pleasure, the assertion that the attorney-general had exercised the large and extensive power intrusted to him, with singular caution, humanity, and moderation [a laugh.] But this was not a question as to the conduct of the law officers of the Crown; it was a question whether this bill was likely to have the smallest effect, beyond the existing laws, in putting down those offences which were so loudly and justly complained of? Connected, however, as it was with those other bills which had been so lately before them, and looking to the general intentions of them all, he could not join in the approbation which had been extended by those hon. and learned gentlemen to the principle of these measures. If the hon. and learned gentleman intended to abstain from prosecuting those who were now under ex officio informations, because Mr. Hone had been acquitted, they acted as unjustly as they did in prosecuting that individual, after he had been tried twice before. He conceived that this course of proceeding was not at all justifiable. But this question merged in the really important one which he had suggested. Were the laws, as they existed, sufficient for the purpose which these bills proposed to effect? He could only, in answer, refer the House to the committals which had taken place under them, and to the severe and destructive punishments which followed those committals. He confessed it was a most laborious task to instil into the breasts of hon. gentlemen any new interest on this subject, after the anxious rapidity and restless impatience with which these measures had been hurried upon their attention. It was indeed an exhausted subject, after the observations which it had elicited from several hon. members, but most especially after the luminous and enlightened speech of his hon. and learned friend (sir J. Mackintosh), whose transcendent eloquence had been so happily exerted last night. It appeared to him, however, that it was the duty of every man who loved the independence of his country, and who respected the constitution as it was settled after the glorious revolution, if he could not excite a feeling in that House for the danger to which it was now exposed, at least to endeavour to return to that healthful state of political existence which was so essentially identified with the support of a free press. While he should consider himself guilty of the grossest vulgarity, if he was to indulge in complaints of the views with which his hon. and learned friends had framed these measures, or performed the duties imposed upon them, he did venture to assure them of this—that if three years ago he had been told, that under the present, or under any other ministers, those two hon. and learned gentlemen would be made to introduce, that they would have the bringing into the House of two such bills as those, he declared to God he should have been almost tempted to insult the man who so predicted, as throwing upon them a most unfounded imputation. He should have then said so, not as believing them to be actuated by Whig principles, or by Whig associations, but as having the same opinion of them which every intelligent man in the country had; he should have said so, under the idea that the rights of the press had become a principal and prominent part of our warm, and constitutional, and every day feelings. He could assure the hon. and learned gentlemen, that he should have warmly vindicated them from such an imputation. He should have done so out of respect to them as enlightened men, acting upon those principles which, before these measures had been propounded, he had thought every intelligent man in the kingdom possessed, with regard to the liberty of the press. It had notwithstanding been said, that these bills, so far from restricting or trespassing upon the liberty of the press, tended, in fact, to preserve it; that they only went to regulate it better by knocking off its abuses; and that the direct object of the bill before them, was, not to impose any shackles upon its operation, nor upon the efforts of wisdom or of genius, but to secure those liberties which had never been rightly understood, until the House had happened to light upon their just meaning during the present alarms. If that was really the result of the present alarms, it was certainly a very fortunate thing [Hear, and a laugh]. And it was most extraordinary, that in all the debates which had occurred upon this subject in that House, nobody had ever before manifested the same sort of intelligence. From reign to reign, from day to day, the history of this country recorded, that the liberty of the press had received new confirmations, and new concessions: but now, at the close of the year 1819, they were to be told that these provisions, by which those who were to conduct the press in this literary country were to be liable for an offence of which they might be guilty, were a compliment to the honour and fidelity and loyalty of those persons, when the whole of the bill went to impugn them. Though he was not at all disposed to enter upon the discussion of the general question as to the freedom and rights of the press, he could not help observing, that it had most certainly been the known, the declared, the recognized, the taken-for-granted opinion of several most eminent Englishmen who had written upon the subject, that they were constitutional rights, and jealously to be guarded. Whatever had been urged against their testimony, upon the ground of altered circumstances and obsolete reasonings, those writers were no unimportant authorities; they were men of extensive erudition and profound thinking—the sages of the law—the expounders of its enactments; persons who had devoted their labours and their lives to assert and to preserve the constitution. When he heard therefore, one honourable member asserting that we were not the same people now that we were fifty years ago, he would ask if that circumstance changed the nature of things? The circumstances to which the hon. gentleman referred were accidental and temporary; but these rights were founded upon the nature of man, and could not be refused or restricted, except perhaps during a time of rebellion, when it might be necessary to close up every mouth, stifle every complaint, and restrain every right, till danger had subsided. But if the principle of these rights was true generally, why was it not so now? Was the principle of these rights just or unjust? If it was just, it must be applicable to all times and to all circumstances; but if it was unjust, a discovery had been made to-day, which put all former knowledge and opinions on the subject entirely to flight. This particular bill did introduce into our law, not merely that very great and important change to which his hon. and learned friend had just alluded—that of imposing the penalty of banishment upon a man who might be ignorant of the crime for which he was banished, or who might commit a technical crime, in fact, of which his mind, however, might be ignorant, as in the case of a book being published which he had previously directed should not be published. And here he had to complain of his hon. and learned friends on the opposite side, that when rights were to be dealt with, the ancient inheritance of Englishmen; when questions were suggested upon points of the utmost importance, and affecting the very existence of those rights: no answers were given to remove the difficulties out of which they had arisen; and no alteration was made in the committee by way of amending the bills which had excited so much reprobation from some hon. gentlemen on his side. But, besides the important change effected by the bill before them, there were other subjects in it for animadversion. They had been told in the committee, that there was no term limited to that banishment; that it might be made commensurate with the life even of the party, if the court so pleased. Now, he knew that it was not likely that courts of justice would award so immoderate a term; but he would ask, what sort of jurisdiction the House would impose upon them by that bill? He would ask, whether the judges who were called upon to pronounce sentence; whether the juries who would be called upon for their verdicts; would not feel that by finding for the second offence they would bring the character of the individual fatally to issue? They had heard, in other cases, of many similar instances which had already occurred; and it was impossible not to suppose that the same sort of interest would be excited here for the criminal party. But let them mark the dangerous power with which they would invest the judges of these offences, by referring to cases in which the same sort of power had proved to be productive of singular injustice. Would any man say that this was not true in the case of Mr. Johnson, an eminent and well known bookseller; and of Mr. Cuthell, a bookseller also, of Middle-row, Holborn; who were both imprisoned; Mr. Johnson being confined for nine months, for publishing Gilbert Wakefield's Answer to the Bishop of Llandaff, and Mr. Cuthell being punished in the same way for selling it, which he did, thinking it a classical book, and having always sold Mr. Wakefield's other works. Yet these two persons, as respectable as any of the hon. gentlemen who heard him, were sent to prison at the greatest risk of their healths, and with the utmost inconvenience to their families; and had they been tried under the present bill, in any court and before any judge, they would have been liable to banishment for life. It was no answer to be told that this was not likely to happen; such penalties ought not to be tolerated in any court in England; and, for his own part, he was sure the judges would reject with indignation so enormous a punishment for this offence as banishment. Banishment, he believed, notwithstanding, to be a most inefficient remedy for the evils which the bill intended to protect them against; because, from the knowledge of the cheapness of paper, and the facilities of printing abroad, it would be found much easier and safer to send the libels over here. One, indeed, came into his mind at that moment, which was written, he believed, by a noble lord, and respected the transactions which had lately occurred at Athens. It was printed in Paris, by Galignani, and was now circulating in this country. No person, however, he could assure the House, would have ventured to publish it here. But they might be told, that abroad they had strong allies, that they had friends and fellow constables, as it were, who would kindly look after our interests, and would take care to watch the excesses of the press; that they had a holy alliance, or a holy brotherhood rather, who would join in fraternal and affectionate amity to put down a free press! And, indeed, upon consideration, he did not know where that free press would find a refuge, when she should be driven out of England, her native and accustomed home: nor could he tell where the unfortunate exile, who might be expatriated by this new law, could venture to repose his wandering feet [Hear, hear!]. There was a clause which had not as yet been noticed, he believed, but which appeared to him to be of a very important and objectionable character: it was that which authorized the search of private houses for the discovery of libels which might be concealed there. While he did not mean to contend that if such libels had been concealed, they should authorize the seizure of the publications, it did not follow, that because such a thing were to be wished, they were therefore to carry it into effect, and by an act of parliament to give the most enormous and unheard-of powers for that purpose. It seemed to him that this provision also would be extremely inefficient, and at the same time most unjust and reprehensible. Any concessions as to the term of transportation were not to be weighed against the objections to the bill; because it was to be remembered that those concessions had been obtained only after interviews and conferences with the noble lords. He should, therefore, look at it with severe and narrow criticism. In this feeling he must observe (he did not know whether the circumstance had struck hon. gentlemen) that this bill went to make those liable to the penalties who printed, published, or "composed" seditious libels—composed or wrote them. So that, if any one thought proper in his own closet, like Algernon Sydney, to write a tract upon the government which might be considered a libellous writing, that circumstance might give the parties acting under this bill a right to search over his private desk, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any libels could be found in it. He appealed to hon. gentlemen, whether clauses like this, which exposed a man's private house to the liability of search, were proper to be enacted? He would not now, however, enter into a detailed discussion of them; because, after the great fatigue which the House had already gone through, and of which he had had his share, he knew the difficulty which he should experience in fixing the attention of honourable gentlemen to particular positions. Of this they had had the best example in the instance of the hon. member for Dublin, who, last night, after hearing one of the most luminous and eloquent speeches from his hon. and learned friend (sir J. Mackintosh) ever delivered within the walls of that House, instead of offering any refutation to the arguments which had been advanced upon contested parts of the bill, had proceeded to discuss one or two other positions upon which all sides of the House were previously agreed. In the first clause of this bill it was enacted, that "in every case in which judgment by default shall be had against any person for composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel, it shall be lawful for the judge or court to make an order for the seizure and carrying away, and detaining in safe custody, all copies of the libel which shall be in the possession of the persons against whom such judgment shall have been had, or in the possession of any other person named in the order for his use." All this, then, must be made out to the satisfaction of the court in some way; as the order, founded upon the affidavits, was to give any person named in it the right of searching the house of a third person, without giving him the opportunity of rebutting that affidavit. The House would not fail to observe the hardship of this case. An affidavit was to be made behind a man's back upon which the court was bound to grant an order. If it were made upon these grounds were all to be equally liable to this sort of search? But supposing, on the other hand, that this provision were altered, and notice were directed to be given to the party, the libels would be diligently removed before the order could be served. So that either authors and publishers were to be reduced to the cruel risk of being betrayed by a servant, who might wish to ruin them, or an informer who might wish to curry favour with the government, or else the whole bill was ineffectual.—His next objection was, that whereas the court was to issue the order, a justice of the peace was, for some reason or other, to execute it. Now, if the court had authority to issue the order, unquestionably it was competent to the court's own officer to serve it. But if not, he could not see for what purpose the magistrate was to be made responsible for its execution. He would contend, that the punishment of banishment was totally unknown to the law of England; for as to the act of 1795, it was passed under circumstances of great, and perhaps of reasonable alarm; but of quite a contrary character to those under which the present measure was framed. In all that had been said by the solicitor-general about these securities, as connected with the freedom of the press, being only analogous to the ancient frankpledge, he confessed he was at a loss to discover the analogy or the resemblance: and as to the other analogy (suggested by the attorney-general) between a pot-house and a free press, he could not perceive that that was established, unless it was meant that a licence was to be taken out by both in future. The enactment of the 36th of the king, to which he had alluded, was in this form: "Any one who should maliciously or advisedly," not by composing, but by speech, or any other means of exciting acts of immediate riot and disturbance, do so and so. Now, when they were told of that bill, reference to the present, let it be remembered, that it at least gave a reasonable penalty, for three years were thought enough by that assembly of parliament. In a measure so important and unparalleled as the present, this difference should be well observed.—There was one observation which he still considered himself bound to make regarding the principle of the bill, and that was, that it would act like an ex post facto law. It said, that on any second conviction, after the passing of this act, the offence of libel would be punished with banishment, at the discretion of the judge. Now, the offence might have been committed a year ago, and be only brought to trial after the passing of this act. If conviction was obtained, the offender might afterwards, on a second conviction, be liable to the penalties of the bill, and that for an offence committed before its existence. Thus any man who addressed his countrymen through the medium of the press—any member of the House for writing or publishing his thoughts or opinions, might become guilty of an offence subjecting him to banishment, without contemplating the possibility of that punishment when the offence was committed. His great objection, after all, to the measure was, the total absence of all necessity for entertaining it. He did not mean the absence of libels to be suppressed; for these had been numerous, and had disgusted every body; but the absence of any deficiency in the law to suppress them. This was a period of alarm. But the liberty of the press was not to be looked upon as fit only for seasons of calmness, as a fair-weather friend to be discarded in a storm. He might say of it what was said of literature in general, that it adorned prosperity, secundis ornatur; and that it was our security in times of danger, in rebus adversis perfugium et solatium præbet. He had said on a former night that the restrictive measures now adopted would drive the people to desperation, unless more attention were shown to their feelings. In defending their liberties, he, for one, would never consent to lower that proud tone which was held in the best times, fearing, as he did, that if the shackles at present intended for them were imposed, the effect of lowering that tone would be to perpetuate them [Hear!].

Mr. R. Martin supported the bill. He would admit, as a general principle, that too great severity of punishment was not desirable. But the question naturally occurred, was the punishment beyond the guilt?—He did not think it was. Was the country to be left exposed to an inundation of blasphemous production, without taking any steps to oppose its course. No guilt could be much higher in degree, than that of the person who deliberately sent forth to the world publications calculated to corrupt the heart, to destroy every principle of religion, every source of happiness here, and of hope hereafter. This bill did not go to trench upon the just and true liberty of the press. After it passed into a law, it would be found that the press was just as unshackled as before. The freedom of the press consisted in the power of writing and publishing what it was fit and proper to write and publish, not in sending forth libels to sow disaffection, and preach up impiety. The peace of society, as well as of every individual, required that the press should be under the restraints of justice, good sense, and propriety. If there was no restraint upon the press, how easy would it be to ruin people in their fortune and reputation! A man would have nothing to do but get three or four dozen hand bills, and stick them about upon the walls. He knew a banker in Ireland that was treated in this manner. He was perfectly solvent, if he got time; but a report was circulated that he could not pay his notes. There was a run upon the bank; and the man was broke. Suppose for example sake, that any person was maliciously disposed against alderman Birch, who made such excellent patties, and hand bills were sent about saying, that they were made of young children, dug out of the grave, and minced up—would any person buy the patties? not one, even if the flesh were as white as a chicken. No one would go near the shop, and the man would be ruined in his business. The devil a patty would he sell.

Mr. Bankes believed that abuses of the press existed to such a degree as required the interference of parliament. He defended the clause of the bill, which authorized a search for, and seizure of publications, adjudged to be libellous. This right of search existed to a greater extent, by the act of Charles the 2nd, and during the first six years of the reign of William the 3rd. He contended, that the right of search was properly applied by the present bill, as all admitted that works adjudged to be libels should be suppressed, which they could not be by the existing law. It had been said by the opponents of these measures, that the country was dissatisfied with what parliament was now doing. He believed the contrary. He believed that if the nation was polled, the majority would be found to declare, that parliament was acting wisely. It had been urged by one hon. gentleman, that he in expressing a doubt regarding the policy of extending education on the plan at present pursued, had opposed the spread of morality and religion. No man, he was convinced, could suspect him of such a design, and he thought it beneath him to answer such an insinuation. He had never declared education an evil. He had merely expressed a doubt as to the policy and expediency in the present condition of society, of carrying the system of educating the poor to the extent recommended by some of his friends. His reasoning was the following:—We put the people in a new situation by this general diffusion of education; and we are not perhaps aware of the effects to which this change may lead. This new condition which is created may lead to evils which additional restrictions on the press may be required to correct; as with the capacity of reading facilities are afforded for spreading mischievous as well as moral and religious principles. If he was asked generally, whether education was a good, he should be a savage to deny it; but if interrogated further, whether he thought it should be spread so extensively and so rapidly as was the wish of many benovolent persons whom he highly valued, he would beg leave to express a doubt; but because he did so, he ought not to be accused of opposing the diffusion of morality and religion. The hon. gentleman adverted to what fell from sir J. Mackintosh last night, regarding the articles of the Bill of Rights, in opposition to some remarks of his on a previous evening. The hon. gentleman maintained his former position with regard to the sense which the powers of the Bill of Rights entertained of the freedom of the press. In that heroic age of Whiggism the same notions were not entertained of the press as now. But did he wish the re-enactment of the statute of Charles 2nd, continued a short time after the Revolution? By no means.

He thought that every man should be allowed to publish his opinions without a previous censorship, and only liable to punishment for the abuse of his freedom; but this was contrary to the act of Charles 2nd, and to the opinions of the Whig ministers of William 3rd who wished to re-enact it. The bill did not alter the existing law with regard to the punishment for a first offence; and a man who subjected himself to a second punishment, by committing a second offence, could not justly complain that he was banished from the country, whose religion he had vilified or whose tranquillity he had endeavoured to disturb.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, he never supposed that the hon. member would oppose the spread of religion and morality.—He always thought the hon. member was a consistent supporter of the present measure, as he entertained doubts regarding the policy of extending that education, which he said put the country in a new situation, and thus rendered restrictions on the press necessary. The noble lord opposite had, on the contrary, denied that the bill was intended to meet a new condition of the country, arising from the diffusion of knowledge. For his own part, from all the experience he possessed of the state of a part of the country where education was most generally spread, and all the reasoning he was capable of, he came to the conclusion, that education was an unequivocal blessing. Education might be productive of some evils, but its advantages incalculably predominated; for, the more the minds of the people were opened, the greater the extent of their information, the more likely they were to be moral, orderly, and religious; the better the peace of the country would be secured, and the greater would be the chance of stability to the government.—It had been the opinion of all parties, Whigs and Tories, that the liberty of the press was a blessing, till the introduction of these measures. He must say that the House was left in a singular situation in two respects; first, it was going into a committee on a measure, in support of which not one reason had been given by those who had introduced it; secondly, in being called upon to enact a new punishment, without having heard the consequences of it explained by the Attorney and Solicitor-general, who were bound to defend it. The consequences of banishment for life had not been explained;

as the punishment was new to the laws of England. Bills of pains and penalties had been passed against individuals, which inferred forfeiture of property and civil death. A case had occurred when the wife of the exile claimed her jointure, as if her husband was dead. Would the banishment, which was inserted as the penalty in this bill, infer forfeiture of property and civil death, and was the House about to enact a punishment so understood? It had been said, that the infliction of this punishment was left to the discretion of the judge. To this discretion he objected. Blackstone described it as one of the excellencies of the English law, that it permitted a discretion in the extent, but not in the nature of the punishment; for a particular crime. Yet, according to the bill under consideration, the judges had the power of inflicting, at their discretion, fine, or imprisonment, or banishment for life. He contended that the country was at the present moment in a state unfit for permanent legislation. He would willingly accede to the measure, if it were made temporary; but he could not consent to legislate permanently under the existing state of exaggerated alarm. In Scotland especially, the alarm was such as to un hinge society. The troops which had hitherto garrisoned Edinburgh had been marched to Glasgow, and the castle of Edinburgh was under the command of the lord president of the court of session; who, before he went into court in the morning, marched a guard of volunteers into the castle, and marched it back in the evening. If we were invaded by a foreign enemy, he should think such conduct most meritorious. As it was, he did not find fault with it; but it showed the extravagant and ungrounded alarm which existed. To the same cause were the numerous reports of the danger of insurrection attributable. Among others, it had been rumoured that pikes had been found; the value of these pikes was estimated at five shillings. Now, he should like to know how it was possible that a weaver, who did not get more than five shillings for his day's work could be able to afford five shillings for a pike; and, having procured it, how he could be able to devote the greater part of every night to learn its use? He allowed that proper precautions were necessary; but he deprecated the embodying of those precautions in a permanent form. As to the measure before the House, not only was there no necessity for it, but even if the existing law were deficient, the proposed measure would be inefficient for all good purposes, but very efficient for bad ones. It would not prevent such publications as it was desirable to prevent; but it would ruin many publications of the most respectable character.

Lord Binning, in answer to what had fallen from the hon. member, referred the House to the statements which had been made by men of the most respectable authority, relative to the disturbed state of the western part of Scotland. He referred the House also to what had been said on the same subject by the hon. members for Renfrew and Lanarkshire. It was admitted generally, that great disaffection existed in that country. It was true, that the disaffected had availed themselves of the distress which existed, in order to work upon the minds of the people. So far had these evil minded persons succeeded, that a day was fixed for their rising. Was this, then, not sufficient to alarm the public mind? It was found necessary to take every precaution for the preservation of the public safety. The citizens of Edinburgh, therefore found themselves obliged to take arms in defence of their properties, their families, and all that was dear to them.

Mr. Birch, in order to show the system of exaggeration which was practised in order to create alarm, mentioned some observations which were made in a Nottingham ministerial paper. It was there stated that himself and his colleague (lord Rancliffe) must be either grossly ignorant of the training which was practised at Nottingham, or that they wilfully withheld that information from the House. The magistrates, feeling anxious on this subject, directed the town clerk to write to the editor, calling upon him to come forward and make known the information of which he stated himself to be possessed. The editor waited upon the clerk, and stated that he possessed no information of the kind, and that he was ready to retract all he had said in his next publication.

The motion having been put and carried, that the Speaker do leave the chair,

Sir James Mackintosh said, the present was the proper time for him to state the amendments of which he had given notice on the preceding evening—amendments intended to define, as accurately as possible, the description of offences which ought to come within the operation of this bill. He had agreed to postpone these amendments until the third reading of the bill, but, out of deference to the wish of others, considering the great importance of the question, as there might not be a sufficient attendance of members, on the third reading to-morrow, he deemed it proper to make his propositions in the present stage. The first amendment was of so small a kind, and appeared to him to be so obviously reasonable and necessary, that he did not think it could give rise to any discussion. He would propose, in that part of the clause which set forth “that from and after the passing of this act, in every case in which any verdict or judgment by default shall be had against any person for composing, printing, or publishing,” that the words, “maliciously and advisedly” should be introduced before the word “composing.” The words which he wished to insert formed part of the act of the 36th of the king, which in all the other parts of the present bill, was exactly and minutely followed. He would not dwell on this part of the amendment, because those words having been originally part of an act of the same description, ought clearly to find a place here. He did not wish to enter into any discussion on this division of the subject, but would merely ask whether gentlemen opposite had any objection to the insertion of those words? (The attorney-general said across the table that there was an objection.) Then he was to understand that to this part of his proposition there was an objection. The principal amendment however, which he would propose to the committee, and which appeared to him of the most essential importance, related to that part of the clause which immediately followed the passage to which he had adverted. Whether it was a definition, a description, or an enumeration of offence, he knew not. It was impossible to say whether the passage was meant to point out the whole class of offences which would be punishable by this bill, or to define the precise writings that ought to be ranged under the words “seditious libel.” The passage was this:—“for composing, printing, or publishing, any blasphemous libel, or any seditious libel, tending to bring into hatred or contempt the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the regent, or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or to excite his majesty's subjects to attempt the alteration of any matter in church or state, as by law established, otherwise than by lawful means," &c. Now he was at a loss to say whether this was a definition of a seditious libel in general, or an enumeration of the offences, to which, as seditious libels, the punishment provided by this bill was to be applied. The passage seemed to him to be of so vague, confused, and unsatisfactory a nature, as to leave the understanding quite at a loss to decide whether it was, in fact, a definition of a seditious libel, or an enumeration of certain sorts of libel against which the provisions of this bill were to be specifically directed. If it was a definition, it was a very faulty one—absurd in language, since it at once gave you the thing described, and the description; just as if an individual were to say, that a triangle was a thing having three sides, and including three angles; which would be a mere absurdity, a waste of language. On the other hand if it were an enumeration of some sorts of seditious libel to which this bill was to apply, excluding others from its operation, then he wanted to know what the non-enumerated libels were?—what the libels were, thus left to the correction of the ordinary statute-law of the kingdom, and removed from the operation of this bill. He found, in all the words he had quoted, no satisfaction to the understanding with respect to this point. The amendment which he meant to propose, and to which he begged the serious attention of the committee, if not on his account, at least on the ground of the importance of the subject, was to leave out all those words, "tending to bring into hatred or contempt the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the regent, or the government and constitution, as by law established, or either Houses of Parliament, or to excite his majesty's subjects to attempt the alteration of any matter in church or state, as by law established, otherwise than by lawful means;" and to insert these words in their room, "or any seditious libel, tending to excite his majesty's subjects to do any act which, if done, would, by the existing law, be treason or felony; or any libel in which it shall be affirmed or maintained, that his majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in parliament assembled, has not, or ought not to have full power and authority to make laws binding on his majesty's subjects in all cases whatsoever." The clause, if adopted, as he now read it, was perfect with respect both to omission and insertion. He should now proceed to state the grounds on which he made this proposition to the committee. He hoped any gentleman who heard him read the clause, had marked what he proposed to leave out, and what he wished to insert, in order that they might understand the principle on which he proceeded, and the difference between the clause as it at present stood, and as it would appear if altered. It had been said by all those who had taken a part in supporting this measure, that there was nothing which they more anxiously desired, than to distinguish the infamous and flagitious press, which was the disgrace of the nation and of the age, which no man held in greater abhorrence than he did, against which no man was more ready to declare the most determined hostility, from the honourable, well-conducted, and well-deserving press. To make a clear distinction between these two branches of the press—to do away the atrocities of the one, without encroaching on the just liberty, or lowering the fair character of the other—this was the sentiment which had been stated by all those gentlemen who had taken a part in these discussions favourable to the present bill. It was a feeling so natural and so proper, that he should have been disposed to give them credit for it, even if they had not expressed it. One object he had in bringing forward this amendment was, to put to the test the sincerity of those declarations—to afford to the committee an opportunity of making the necessary distinction between those two parts of the press, which gentlemen must see, the bill under consideration had not made, but which, on the contrary, it had the tendency to confound more than they had ever been confounded before. Here it was proper to consider what the evil was which had been complained of. He would take that evil on the statement of his hon. and learned friends opposite, and he would confidently appeal to them, whether it consisted in the general prevalence of common political libel. He would contend, that it did not. If they separated political libel into two classes, they would see the necessity of making the distinction he wished to introduce. One of those classes was the consequence of that violence, that excess of feeling, that ebullition of spirit, which was always occasioned by the collision of parties in this kingdom. There never was a period, when this species of libel was less frequent, and certainly none, in his opinion, when it was less virulent when it did appear. The English periodical press had never, on the whole, been so pure, so blameless, so meritorious, as of late years. On the other hand, there never was a period when another description of libels of a political nature indeed, but leading to every thing base and infamous—inculcating the doctrines, not merely of rebellion, but of murder were more frequent. He would not quote any of the passages taken from works of this vile description which were last night referred to by an hon. and learned friend of his. It was enough to say, that they encourage rapine, murder, and irreligion; rebellion was perhaps the lightest crime they inculcated. In general, the offences, as he took it, committed by the better part of the press, were neither numerous nor of dangerous consequence. Those of which the other branch of the press was guilty, were not, in his mind, justly entitled to the dignity of political offence. They echoed the common cry of the outcasts of the human race, who, excited by bad passions, or acting under the influence of want and necessity, defended murder and robbery, recommended the proscription of men by classes and great bodies—whose writings, in short, tended to the perpetration of atrocities never known in this country before, and scarcely even heard of in the time of Marat, in the worst period of the reign of terror in France. The press as he had already observed, was divided into two parts. He was almost ashamed to mention them by the same name. The one was the regular press, which was marked by greater purity, greater moderation, greater talent, and more commendable conduct, than at any former period; the other a contaminated engine, sending forth almost clandestinely, amongst the lower classes of society, a few publications, carrying atrocity and criminality to a degree almost unparalleled in the annals of mankind.—The new evil, then, was the character of those latter libels. No evil could be traced from the increase of ordinary political libels, which had in fact decreased in number, and abated in violence. The evil, therefore, must be ascribed to the operation of this new species of libel, in which atrocious crimes were defended. His object then was, to confine the operation of the new law to that which was the new mischief. He wished to propose to the committee, that the old law of libel should be left to cope with the old character of libel, as in former times, and that the new law should be confined, as it ought to be, to the new mischief, and not extended to the ordinary indiscretions of a free press, the warm ebullitions of an ardent spirit—faults which called for no change whatever in the law. The whole of that part of the bill which he wished omitted was a good or bad definition of a seditious libel. He thought it was not a good one. He believed that the offence of seditious libel was undefinable. It was a futile labour to attempt the definition of an offence which depended on circumstances: since words which at one time might be considered innocent, might at another time, and a few miles off, be condemned as wicked and improper. The whole of the definition manifested a great inexperience in legislation—a great want of knowledge of human nature—a great unskilfulness in adapting laws to the particular situation of men. But positive instigation to the commission of crime was easily defined. It was, at least, easy to describe it in such terms, that a jury of common honesty might at once see, whether a person brought before them as the instigator to crime, was innocent of such charge or not. But it was very remarkable, that at the same moment when the framers of this definition had thrown various sorts of libel into it, in a sort of cumbrous and confused parenthesis, they had not only included what did not call, but had excluded what really did call, for the interposition of the legislature. They had excluded much of what might proceed from the most degraded part of the press, which did call for regulation, and they had included the respectable part of it, which did not. Would his hon. and learned friend show him any clause in this bill, by which the penalty of banishment would apply to a man whose writings recommended assassination? There was not a word of the kind. Suppose that a man proposed an extended system of forgery, to destroy all confidence in commercial dealings, and to ruin the credit and character of the country. Under the bill as it now stood, he could not be punished—he came not within its provisions; but if his amendment were agreed to, such a man might be prosecuted with effect, because he would have instigated to that which is felony by the law of the country. The preamble contained what it ought not to contain, and omitted that which ought to have formed a part of it. So it appeared to him the substance of the argument which he had taken the liberty of stating to the committee was this, the possibility and the expediency of distinguishing instigation to crime from political libel. Every thing that tended to bring the king and the Houses of Parliament into contempt was certainly a seditious libel. This, he conceived, comprehended all instigation and incitement to rebellion; but it did not comprise crimes not actually instigating to rebellion, though having a tendency to that end, but which still were ordinary crimes against the state of society. He thought the cases might be distinguished one from the other. This would perhaps take some cases of a very culpable nature out of the operation of this bill; but the question the committee had to consider was, whether the efficacy of the law on the one hand, and the security it would give to the respectable part of the press on the other would not promote the ends of justice better than if it were left as it now stood, although some political libels of an aggravated sort, were to happen to be exempted from the new inflictions of this bill? Now he would maintain, that the classing persons whose writings were instigations to commit murder, instigations to rebellion, instigations to commit any atrocious crime, along with those who had only written an ordinary political libel, was a gross error. It was an error which would have the most pernicious effect, a doubly pernicious effect; since sometimes it would occasion the escape of those who deserved to suffer, and at others the severe punishment of men who ought to have been more mildly treated. Libels, in some cases, might be of a most atrocious kind, but they might be the fruits of qualities which were not the object of hatred or contempt among mankind. This law would apply to cases where the excellence and genius displayed in a libel would rather be considered than its criminality. What, then, would be the effect of this bill in those cases? Its severity would tend to abate the natural horror which men would otherwise feel against those who thus abused their liberties. It would tend to counteract the moral feelings and judgments of mankind, and would produce a certain degree of sympathy for those who would otherwise be the object of abhorrence. But this, which was favourable to the flagitious writer, was decidedly against the interest of the fair and honest writer, whose error was an error of judgment. When a new law passed against both—when the same punishment was awarded against both—when the person who proposed assassination and thus placed a stigma on the press, and the individual who wrote a mere political libel, were viewed as equally criminal, the whole became confounded in one mass; and the wickedness of the one, and the respectability of the other, were merged together; in short, there then appeared to be but one press. But what would be the ultimate consequence in many instances? The liability to a severe punishment would save the ruffian; while the man who acted from honest views must suffer in his character although acquitted, by having been classed with such a person. This evil was, in some degree alleviated by the discriminating justice of the law of England, with respect to the different parties engaged in composing, printing, and publishing a libel; but the effect of the bill would be to comprehend under one common degree of guilt every person concerned, from the tradesman, in whose shop, without his knowledge, and perhaps against his injunction, a libel was sold, to the wretch who for years had dispersed amongst his fellow citizens publications inciting them to the worst of crimes. He spoke not as a visionary speculator in criminal law; but every man must see, that one branch of the criminal code would be most seriously altered, he would say injured, by this bill. Instead of strengthening the moral feelings of mankind, a measure proceeding on such a principle of confusion, by which crimes of various degrees were punished alike, tended to weaken them. It was injurious to those who were almost innocent, and advantageous to those who were in the highest degree guilty. He knew it would be said that this was the fault of the law as it at present existed. He could not deny that. But he would put it to the good sense of the committee, whether, when they were called on to frame a new law on this subject, they ought not to render it as clear and perspicuous as possible? It was no defence of the obscurity of a new measure to say, that errors, and inconsistencies, and confusion, formerly existed. Formerly they might have excused themselves, upon the plea that they were only acting in conformity with custom; but on this occasion that plea would be totally unavailing. Adherence to the old institutions of a well-regulated commonwealth was certainly a quality which deserved applause, and never could be regretted, except when it degenerated into a species of bigotry, which could see nothing to condemn, even in the most inveterate abuses. But this adherence to old institutions could not be urged as a plea for sanctioning old abuses, when the House was engaged in passing a law so novel and extraordinary as the present, a law which declared that a woman or a child residing 500 miles from London, and possessing an annuity dependent upon the existence and success of a newspaper, was to be classed under the same description of offenders, was to receive the same name, and was to await the same judgment as those wretches who were daily exhorting the people to the commission of the most criminal and atrocious actions. If the committee would take this circumstance for a moment into their consideration, they would soon be convinced that it imperatively demanded their most serious attention, as, if not altered, its tendency was, to destroy the whole effect of the bill. For undoubtedly its effect, if it were confined solely to those whose actions and writings formed the best justification of it, and those who by their malignant exertions had forfeited the respect and excited the abhorrence of every good man, would be to attract the wishes of all the community to the due execution of the law upon those who offended against it.—He meant no reflection upon the manner in which the magistracy throughout the country exercised their functions; but still he could not help remarking, that if it were confined as he would confine it, no law would be more cordially carried into execution. There would, however, be a very different result if it were extended to all who, either technically or substantially were guilty of a libel. That very extension of it to all cases would be productive of consequences which its framers had never contemplated; it would prevent prosecutors from coming forward, and witnesses from giving testimony, in that candid manner which ought always to be seen in a court of justice. And what would be the result of such a state of things? Why, that only few convictions would follow prosecution; so that in point of fact, more satisfaction would be gained to justice by subtracting a few cases from the operation of this law, than would be obtained by including all cases under it. He should, therefore, most strongly recommend the committee to make it apply solely to the criminals for whom they intended it, and not to allow any part of it to extend to the sound and respectable portion of the press. Indeed, he could wish to know what object could be effected by retaining the clause as it at present stood. There was not a printer in the country who was not afraid of it: there was not a respectable bookseller who did not object to it: those of London and the vicinity had already presented petitions against it, and similar petitions would shortly be presented from those of Edinburgh and Glasgow. Every proprietor, every editor of a newspaper, as well in the country as in the metropolis, was alarmed, lest this bill should pass into law, merely on account of the very words to which he objected. Was it right, then, to include the reputable and disreputable parts of the press under the same regulation? Where was the newspaper which published any instigation to crimes, any incentive to assassination?—The gentleman who conducted the daily newspapers of the metropolis were as incapable of advocating such atrocious doctrines as any member of the assembly which he was then addressing, and held them in too great abhorrence to say even a word in their palliation. Therefore, though a few cases of libel, arising out of the hurry of composition, might be withdrawn from the operation of this bill, by the amendment which he proposed, more would be gained by the wide distinction which it endeavoured to create. He must apologize to the committee for the length at which he was explaining his amendment, but he could assure them, that he had only proposed it, in order to render the bill more efficacious than it otherwise would be. The committee would, perhaps, be of opinion, that his amendment would not produce that effect which he contemplated; he, however, felt that he should not be discharging his duty, if he did not endeavour to fix upon their minds the impression which was made upon his own. The operation of this law must materially affect the newspapers, in which the whole force of political discussion had of late years been concentrated. The prodigious number of persons, of every rank and description, who now took an interest in public affairs, the care and anxiety with which every passing event was perused when recorded in these vehicles of information, and the discrimination and talent which were displayed in the daily comments which they contained, had given them a circulation which had at once increased the emoluments and the respectability of those who were connected with them. Indeed within his own recollection their importance had increased to a degree which to many would appear incredible. A new interest had risen in the state, which had imperceptibly acquired to itself consideration and power. Now that this consideration and this power had become apparent to the most inattentive observer, honourable gentlemen came forward with a general maxim, and said, "Try, if you can, to subdue this new interest; if you cannot, keep it down as much as possible." This was, however, most wretched policy, and never could be the advice of a wise statesman. The true policy to be adopted in such a case, was to conciliate and attach every new interest, to make it coalesce with the old institutions of the state, to render it the ally of the law and the government, and not to place it under unnecessary regulations and restrictions. Mr. Burke, when contrasting the effects of conciliation and of coercion in his speech in favour of conciliation with our American colonies, had made an admirable observation, namely, that a government might first conciliate, and if conciliation failed might then coerce; but that the reverse order was not so easy, because a government which began by coercion could not afterwards attempt to conciliate, without bringing itself into contempt and derision. This observation he could wish to have applied to the present case. The number of readers had rendered the property of newspapers valuable: this had attracted to them men of talent and respectability, and by them great influence had been obtained over the public mind. So long as emolument and respectability accrued to those who thus employed their faculties, it would be impossible to detach from the public journals, men of talent and education.—

The House might irritate the press—they might deprive themselves of the assistance of that powerful instrument—but no measures which it was possible to adopt could have the effect of preventing its continuing to be a source of emolument, or preventing that emolument from continuing to attract men of talents to it. It was within the power of the House to conciliate those individuals, but it was not in its power to destroy them. It was within the power of the House to make them friendly, but it was not within the power of the House to make them feeble. It depended upon the spirit of conciliation which they exhibited towards the press, whether they were to rank those connected with it among their allies and auxiliaries, or among their enemies and opponents. The very circumstances which had attracted those individuals to the press had also been productive of great advantage in the manner of conducting it. During the last thirty years, he had watched with the most earnest attention the behaviour of the public journals, and had observed, that however the various journals might differ on points of general policy, they had been continually improving in decency, and in respect for the laws and constitution of the country—a circumstance which he attributed to the improvement in talent and respectability, which, as he had before-mentioned, had taken place among those who supported them. He knew a gentleman who had been engaged during the whole of the last 40 years as the conductor of one of the most popular newspapers; and to his situation and his conduct as they had come very much within his own knowledge, he would wish to call the particular attention of the House. Writing as that gentleman generally did, in haste; writing too, under the impulse of generous feelings of party; easily excited when the liberty of his country or the rights of humanity were invaded, acting as an invisible, unaccountable, and unassailable being, exercising a power almost despotic over the minds of his readers; and yet with all these temptations to abuse—(and here he would suppose him secured always from greater temptations by his well-known integrity, and the incorruptibility of his character—he would suppose it impossible that he could be ever charged with venality, indecency, or improper motives of any description)—yet notwithstanding all these considerations, he had never been even subject to an accusation for private slander, and had never been convicted for a public libel. The House might suppose that the individual in question had been favoured by the ruling power; but so far from this being the case, he had seen the men whom he had always supported only three years in office. Still he had always adhered to the principles on which he had commenced his public life, in spite of the allurements of office and the frowns of power. He would ask whether, during the same period, any man in Europe had acquitted himself with more credit in a public situation than the individual to whom he alluded, he meant the gentleman who was the conductor of the principal opposition print—Mr. Perry, the editor and proprietor of the Morning Chronicle. He had not described any person who was a supporter of the government, because that would not have been so much to his purpose, but to an individual who, during thirty-seven years, had been one of its principal and most effective opponents. He had quoted him as an instance of high honour, unimpeachable integrity, and undeviating principles, in order to show that these qualifications were carefully cherished among those who were connected with the press, and in order to impress upon the committee the necessity of conciliating those who conducted that mighty and irresistible engine. They had been most efficient supporters of the nation's interest during the late common contest in which all of us had been engaged; for could any one who recollected the manner in which the press of London conducted itself during that war, fail to recognize the services which it had rendered during its continuance?—Had the common cause of the country ever been maintained with greater splendor of talent (and indeed the splendor of talent was such as would do honour to the best writers in the best age of our literature) than it had recently been maintained by these very men against the individuals whose efforts this bill was more particularly intended to put down? Notwithstanding the manner in which they differed upon some subordinate points, and notwithstanding the want of prudence which some of them had exhibited on a recent occasion in the discussion of certain local questions, the constitution had never possessed more constant and more zealous supporters than those individuals whom the committee was now going to place among their opponents. With what conscience could the committee place these, the defenders of social order, on the same level with those who were its greatest enemies, and were daily exhorting their deluded followers to the commission of crime and villainy? And yet, extraordinary as it might appear, they were placing men of talents and character on a level with men who were assassins in their hearts—men who had not courage to take on themselves the responsibility of crime, but who did not hesitate to instigate others to its commission—they were endeavouring to degrade their most powerful and efficient allies by classing them with their common enemies, and subjecting them to the same punishment as these common enemies; they were treating them as participators in the mischief which called for the security of additional laws; they were, after no fault of theirs—after the signal merit to the praise of which they were entitled—after their rendering more assistance to the cause of society than could be rendered by all the restrictions parliament could impose—about to confound them with those vile miscreants, and to punish them for the evil which they themselves had been the first to encounter. He did not ask the committee to make any sacrifices—to propitiate—he merely asked them not wantonly to irritate those on whose conduct more would depend than on the laws they were now enacting. The press had a power in the present state of society of which it was foolish to complain. This state of things depended on causes beyond the control of parliament. They could no more control the order of things in society, then they could control the planets in their courses. The order of the moral world was no more dependent on them than the order of the physical. The course of human affairs was beyond the control of any legislator—beyond the power of any statesman. The course of affairs had given a power to the conductors of the press which could not be wrested from them. This power they might exasperate or they might conciliate but not annihilate. They might alienate the press, but he repeated they could not divest it of the power which the circumstances of society had thrown into their hands. He would not on this occasion appeal either to the mercy or to the justice of the House: he would appeal to its prudence, and would ask them whether it was expedient to irritate the feelings of those respectable men against the institutions of their country. There was another point which he wished to press upon the attention of the committee. In another bill which had been recently before the House, a provision was made for taking recognizances from printers and publishers.—The object of that provision was said to be to place the control of the press in no other hands than those of men of property. The present bill, however, which classed men of property along with the most desperate and abandoned individuals, was calculated to prevent any respectable tradesman from interfering with newspaper property. The emoluments derived from a successful newspaper attracted men of capital to engage in them. The possession of capital was in general a guarantee for the possession of respectability. Men of property had generally a regard to their character, and to the peace of society in which they had so deep an interest. They could not obtain a better security than was derived from this circumstance, but they might throw it away for that which would afford them no adequate security. A high sense of honour, a strong feeling of personal independence, and a reliance on an unimpeached and unimpeachable character, were the best securities which could be taken from the editor or the proprietor of a newspaper. If these were once broken down by any restrictions of the legislature, the public journals would be thrown into the hands of men either of desperate poverty, or of desperate fanaticism, or of desperate ambition, who would willingly brave all the penal statutes which could be enacted against them. From results of so dangerous a nature as those contemplated by the present bill, respectability, and property, and talent would shrink with timidity; and the consequence would be, that this engine, so beneficial when well-directed, so pernicious when ill-directed, would fall into the power of desperate poverty, of desperate ambition, or, what was worse than all, of desperate fanaticism. He therefore implored the committee to reject the clause as it now stood; for he could assure them, that if they had purposely contrived means for rendering the press infamous and hostile to the present institutions of the country, they could not invent a better method for effecting that object than by agreeing to it. He was sensible that he had already intruded too long on the attention of the House; he should therefore sit down, after first moving that the words "maliciously and advisedly" be inserted before the words "composing, printing, or publishing."

Mr. Canning could assure his hon. and learned friend, that as far as it applied to him, there had not been the slightest occasion for the apology which he had just offered to the committee. He never thought, and he was convinced the House never thought, his speeches too long. There was no man to whom he listened with greater pleasure than he always did to his hon. and learned friend, because, even when he could not come to the same conclusion, he always heard much to delight and much to inform him. However much in general he concurred with him in matter of principle, and much as he in general approved of what fell from his hon. and learned friend—if there was any regret felt by him on this occasion, it was, that with that power of eloquence he so eminently possessed, he had taken a basis much too wide for the motion with which he concluded. And he could assure his hon. and learned friend, that he would have come to the discussion with very different feelings, if he had not overlaid the motion by the earlier part of his speech, but had proposed the amendment without the general argument, which had added much to the amusement of his speech, and much to his delight, but nothing to his conviction, and much he owed to his alarm [Hear, hear!]. The amendment proposed might or might not be harmless. But, in calling upon those who proposed the present bills to state their reasons for them, in the alarming tone which his hon. and learned friend had used, he had imposed a task of awful magnitude upon those who differed from him in their political views. The alternative which his hon. and learned friend had proposed to their acceptance was this—either that they should surrender their liberties to some unknown, undefined, and irresistible power, or else that they should acknowledge the supremacy of the daily press. To the latter, he, for one, could never assent: in spite of the obloquy which might attend the declaration he was now going to make, he was determined conscientiously to discharge his duty; and if the choice was, whether he was to st-

crifice himself and save the institutions of his country, or save himself and sacrifice those institutions, his mind was made up, his resolution was taken, and the sacrifice of himself should be willingly offered to the good of the nation. Whatever he might yield to the arguments of his hon. and learned friend, he would yield nothing to his threats. Before he entered into a consideration of the definition of libel, which had just been offered to the committee, it would be well for them to consider of what nature the power was with which they were called upon to contend; they had heard that it resided amid clouds and darkness; and that from the midst of those clouds and that darkness it hurled its vengeance with such unerring aim as never to fail in striking down its victim: they had heard this dreadful denunciation, and therefore it became them to consider whether the freedom of parliament was to yield to the freedom of the press, and whether the freedom of the press ought not rather to be denominated its despotism? Despotism was not merely of one kind or description; it existed in various shapes, and arose in various ways; but to no despotism however created, or however formed, would he ever yield himself up a willing victim. He abhorred the despotism of one man, because it was calculated to destroy all the enjoyments of life, and to render existence scarcely worth supporting. He objected to the despotism of many, whether it appeared in the shape of aristocracy or democracy; to the former he objected, because it destroyed the spirit of competition, and checked the aspirations of ambition and hope; and to the latter, because it led by an ascertained course to military despotism. The despotism of the press, however, appeared to him to be more insupportable than all the rest; indeed, if they might credit the description which they had just heard of it, the imagination could conceive nothing more terrible. There was not only a power in it which it seemed it was impossible for any human ingenuity to resist, but there was also a power which acted with all the secrecy of a Venetian tribunal, and at the same time struck with all the certainty of the Holy Inquisition. This power, it was allowed, had grown up under the fostering care and attention of parliament, and parliament was now advised to win it over to its side, in order that it might not turn round and destroy the parent from which it sprung. To such a degradation he would never submit. To such an argument he would not yield a single inch; no, not even though his hon. and learned friend advised him to do so. His hon. and learned friend, in giving that advice, had endeavoured to tempt the House into a discussion into which he should not follow him. He had given a character of the daily press on which, for the most part, he did not differ from him. With respect to the individual to whom his hon. and learned friend had more particularly alluded, he would say that from some circumstances he happened to be acquainted with, in his own mind he was convinced he deserved the character which had been given of him by his hon. and learned friend. He would say this of that individual, that he believed him incapable of availing himself of the power in his hands to gratify any private soreness or private hostility. But while he admitted this, and trusted that the concession would qualify the severity of any farther remarks that he might make on the subject, he could not allow that the daily press was wholly free from blame in some of the particulars to which his hon. and learned friend had alluded. At no very distant day he had seen in some part of the daily political press, an extract from a pamphlet, recommending assassination as a means of obtaining political freedom. That extract was quoted, without being accompanied or followed by any observation, except that the assassination recommended was only conditional. Such a passage he had read, but he would never have thought of mentioning it but for the challenge thrown out by his hon. and learned friend, that it was impossible that this part of the press could be guilty of any possible aberration from rectitude or propriety—and he only adduced the circumstance as a qualification of his hon. and learned friend's general commendation the danger of even a possible aberration. Yet, though he could not concur with his hon. and learned friend's panegyric in every particular, he very readily agreed with him that in the present times there was a tone of decency in the daily press which ought not to subject it to any participation in the blame to which the other part of the press was entitled. But in an act of solemn legislation they ought to look neither to the right nor to the left. He agreed with his hon. and learned friend that when either in the moral or the physical world any new power made its appearance, it became an object of importance to obtain the aid of that power, and to reduce it to a state of subserviency, instead of opposition to our interests. But as little, when any explosion of nature took place, which seemed to threaten universal desolation, was it the part of sound philosophy to prostrate itself before the formidable phenomenon, instead of raising, at any risk, a dyke to stop the progress of the ruin. But how could this argument as to the danger from the power of the press, be reconciled with some other arguments which they had heard at an earlier period of the debate, and which tended to prove that the freedom of England and the power of its press had fallen off? The fate of our legislation, perhaps of our empire itself, had been said to be fixed, and our decline had been declared to have been already commenced. Parliament had been warned of their degeneracy from their ancestors; public opinion had been said to be stifled; the love of freedom and the spirit of patriotism had been lamented as extinct. The argument used to-night by his hon. and learned friend was a decisive refutation of those desponding statements which the House had heard last night. Public opinion was represented by his hon. and learned friend, and truly represented, as possessing now tenfold force at the present, compared with former times. Not only was public opinion advanced, but its power was accumulated, and conveyed by appropriate organs, and made to bear upon legislation and government, upon the conduct of individuals, and upon the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament. He was not so foolish as to regret—he was not so mad as to attempt to arrest—the course of public opinion. But, he was not so feeble, or so fearful, as to surrender the right of legislation, or to abdicate the functions of parliament, not to public opinion, but in order to conciliate the organs by which public opinion was expressed. He agreed with his hon. and learned friend, that there was much difficulty in definitions of prospective offences, and that too much solicitude about definition was apt to defeat its purpose, and he would rather leave the offence which it was the object of the bill to punish to be defined by circumstances and facts, than attempt to describe it too minutely. But it was one thing, whether a definition should be introduced in the original act of legislation; and quite another thing, whether it should be left out, with the knowledge that there it had once stood. It might be proper, and it would be safe, to refrain from definition in the first instance; but to strike out what had been once inserted, was not to leave the law in the same situation as if it had not been introduced, but to intimate by inference that those things, so left out, were not considered as crimes. He did not deny the superiority in many respects of his hon. and learned friend's definition. In point of length, it certainly was extremely superior. If they measured them by words or by sentences, by weight or tale, his hon. and learned friend's amendment was infinitely more voluminous than the clause which he was disposed to displace. He was not sorry that it was so, nor was he supposing it a fault; but it was rather an awkward remedy for what his hon. and learned friend had considered as too complex and too extended. But, to prove his disposition to conciliate, he was willing to take all that was in the bill; and, together with that, a part of his hon. and learned friend's amendment. The only part which could be added to the bill from the amendment he would adopt, but he would not agree to disgrace what was in the bill by displacing it. What was the expression in the bill proposed to be amended? "Any blasphemous libel, or any seditious libel, tending to bring into hatred or contempt the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the Regent, or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom, as by law established, or either House of Parliament," &c. If he adopted his hon. and learned friend's plan of conciliation—if he yielded to that manichean dread of the power of the press, this definition was to be left out. Though he was sure that the press was supremely attached to the king, and that it had the most affectionate respect for both Houses of Parliament; yet if, in deference to the power of the press, if from some unaccountable spirit of conciliation, they left out this part of the bill, they would leave out the very best part of it. He was persuaded that the conductors of the power of the press would guard those sacred depositaries of constitutional authority with unrivalled zeal; that they would protect their rights with the utmost ability; that they would direct their proceedings with consummate wisdom. But the members of that House had some interest in this duty; they also had "done the state some service;" they were bound by their oaths to protect the powers entrusted to them; and, highly as he valued the power of the press, he could not consent to surrender the share which parliament ought to have in the co-partnership. The legislature performed a part which was not unknown. Their powers were ascertained, their faculties were measured. They were not enveloped in clouds; they wielded not a force whose existence could be perceived only by its fearful effects. Their intentions were perceived; their words were heard; their proceedings were published. In a few hours it would be known from one end of the kingdom to the other, that he now discharged his duty at the hazard of owing the little reputation which belonged to him to the mercy which he would not condescend to supplicate. Yet he would not surrender to the guardianship of the press those principles which parliament was authorized and commanded to take to its peculiar care, and which it could not relinquish without forfeiting its rank and character. He had no objection, however, to include in the bill that part of his hon. and learned friend's amendment which related to instigations to assassination. He was happy that his hon. and learned friend should thus have his share in securing that sober freedom, that temperate ardour of liberty which the bill was calculated to cherish, and which none was more anxious to promote or more capable of teaching others to reverence than his hon. and learned friend.

Lord Folkestone said, that he ventured to address the committee with infinite disadvantage, after the splendid succession of eloquence to which they had just listened. The right hon. gentleman had expressed his acquiescence in the first part of his hon. and learned friend's speech; in the latter part of that speech he must be excused by his hon. and learned friend for saying, that there appeared to be a little too much courting of the conductors of the daily press. He knew that his hon. and learned friend had no such intention. But that was, in any view of it, no argument for the dissent of the right hon. gentleman from the amendment. What was the real argument at issue? The amendment was offered as more applicable than the original passage in the bill to the purposes intended to be effected by the gentlemen on the other side, and as leaving unaffected the daily press, which both his hon. and learned friend and the right hon.

gentleman had agreed in calling an ally, in maintaining sound and rational principles against the noxious part of the press. Intimidation there was not, nor any thing that could be fairly construed into intimidation in his hon. and learned friend's speech. The right hon. gentleman, nevertheless, declared that he was ready to sacrifice himself to maintain the institutions of his country. What could have called for that gratuitous declaration of patriotic immolation he was at a loss to conceive, for he felt fully convinced that nothing had fallen from his right hon. and learned friend (sir J. Mackintosh) to call for the expression of such a determination. No sacrifice was required, or even alluded to; but if a sacrifice, even of life, in defence of their just rights and privileges, were required, every gentleman around him and on the other side would, he doubted not, make it with the same readiness as the right hon. gentleman. But the sacrifice was not called for. With respect to the question before the House, which was, whether the words "maliciously and advisedly" should be inserted, not a syllable had been said by the right hon. gentleman. For his part, he could not help regretting that his hon. and learned friend had lent his hand to amend a bill which was so unconstitutional in its principles, and so grievous in its enactments. By this bill, a power was to be intrusted to the breast of the Court to make an order for seizing and carrying away from any persons, all copies of the libel on which a conviction might have been obtained. This was a most unjust and oppressive power. It might come out before two or three magistrates, before whom a conviction of libel might take place, that a third person, not in court, against whom there was no charge, and who could have had no notice on the subject, had some copies of the libel. The magistrates might instantly sign a warrant, by which constables or officers might go to his house, force their way into it, and rummage all his property. All this might be done to one with whom copies of the libel might have been left designedly for a malicious intent. This bill, with all its novelties and all its cruelties, was left quite unexplained. No explanation had hitherto been offered. Explanation had been demanded by his hon. and learned friend behind him, in a manner that seemed so imperative, that he thought it could not have been refused; and notwithstanding his experience of that

House, he did conceive that it was impossible for them to have proceeded to agree to the bill without farther explanation. He wished to have it now explained, whether the individual who should be banished in terms of this law, was still liable to the obligation of allegiance? The language of the law upon the subject was, that allegiance and protection were mutual and co-extensive. Let them take the case of a banished man, who should become domiciled in a foreign country, with which this country might afterwards be at war. A conscription might then force him into arms against his native country. Found thus fighting against his country, not voluntarily, but by force, would he be liable to be hanged for high treason? But that would be the consequence, if the obligation to allegiance were not cut off by banishment. Explanation was probably refused, because the hon. and learned gentlemen opposite had not traced their own law to all its consequences. The editor of a newspaper was to be subject to this punishment, and liable to be sent to a foreign country. What stronger motive could exist to induce him to curry favour with a foreign power at war with his own country? Would he not act prudently in providing an asylum for himself by publishing statements and arguments favourable to the enemy of his country? There was an infinity of other objections to this ill-digested bill. A man might spend all his means in his defence, and how then could he be carried out of the country? The bill made no provision for conveying the party to any foreign country. Another grievous circumstance attached to that punishment was, the system which they were told, when the Alien bill was passed by that House, prevailed over the continent. It was there, as in England, in the power of the government to remove from the country, at a moment's notice, any foreigner whom they pleased. The good understanding, as it was termed, that existed between England and the continental countries, would operate perhaps in the further punishment of any individual condemned to banishment, who might thus be tossed from pillar to post without the possibility of redress. But a new light had broken in upon us; and the blots and flaws of the constitution were exposed to general observation and censure. The object of this measure, disguise it as they would, was to stop the progress of intelligence. This was preposterous and vain.

Why should they not remove the blots and flaws which could neither be concealed nor defended, rather than manifest their folly by attempting to shut the eyes of the public?

Sir James Mackintosh said, he rose to recall the attention of the committee to the grounds of his amendment, from which they had been quite carried away by the magnificent speech of his right hon. friend, who on this occasion had delighted the committee by the union of all the splendor of eloquence with the specious and dexterous declamation in which he was eminently skilled. His right hon. friend had employed all his powers of imagination and skill, and artifice of representation (he would not add another syllable), to lead the minds of the committee from the argument of the question. His (sir J. Mackintosh's) province admitted not of the same use of ingenuity; and if it did, he could not hope to succeed in such a contest. His part was, not to indulge in the vivacity of invective, but, by a humble and plain defence, to recall the attention of the committee to the question before them. His part was, not to dazzle by the fascinations of eloquence, barren and unentertaining statements, and dry reasoning, being the only commodities he had to offer. His right hon. friend had dressed up an imaginary personage, whom he introduced into the House of Commons for the purpose of intimidation. This imaginary personage, so magnificently presented on the scene of that House, his right hon. friend had indeed most triumphantly destroyed and demolished. The ability with which his right hon. friend had accomplished this achievement, he certainly admired; or if the display produced any thing like regret in his mind, it was, that it should be thrown away in combating with a spectre which must soon have disappeared, and in destroying what from its nature must soon have destroyed itself. A feebler hand and a less vehement effort might have accomplished so unnecessary and so ignoble a task. His right hon. friend had, in one part of his speech, from his stores of panegyric, poured forth praises on the feeble efforts which he (sir J. Mackintosh) had made, while, in another, he had attacked with the force of his invective a part of the arguments which he had adduced to support his proposition. As in no part of his address to the House here had been sufficient merit to de censure, so in no other had there been any cause for the severity with which the remainder had been treated. His right hon. friend had passed over the argumentative part of his speech in silence—a silence the more remarkable, because he had conceded, or seemed to concede, that he was almost disposed to yield to its force. This part he had passed over in silence, and he had recourse solely to the splendid force of declamatory invective, which he (sir J. Mackintosh) had listened to with a mind as unruffled as any in that House, and with as much personal unconcern as if he had not been alluded to. He now returned to his amendment, which rested not upon the strength of eloquence, but upon justice and truth. The first part of his argument was, that the evil to be remedied was confined to the delinquency of one class of writers. To this his right hon. friend agreed. Another part of his argument was, that another class of writers was exempt from any imputation of having any share in this delinquency. His right hon. friend here again agreed with him. When he had said, that one class of writers were thus free from any share in the delinquency, his right hon. friend could not suppose him to mean, that they were free from the imperfections of human nature, or from the errors into which the hurry of conducting a daily press must lead. The evil of the one class was to be remedied; the errors of the other were to be censured. Here again they were agreed. The inference then was, that while the first class required coercion by new laws, the other class required none. Two conclusions arose from this argument. The first conclusion was, that this clause was unjust, as it destroyed the salutary distinction between the innocent and the guilty, and confounded respectable persons with ruffians. The second conclusion was, that this clause was unnecessary, and extended to objects not within the scope of the law. This argument still remained unanswered. He thought it really unanswerable. Certain it was, that his right hon. friend had not answered it. But it had been said, that he surrendered the duties and the powers of that House—that he was for dispensing with the authority of parliament. Why was this charge brought against him? Was it because he thought it unjust and uncalled for to pass a law which should confound and mix together, in common reproach and dishonour, most respectable and most mischievous men?

(5 G)

Such charges would not alter his conviction, till strong arguments were opposed to his statements; and in this respect he was still unanswered. He was charged with threatening the House with he knew not what unknown power. He was charged with possessing lukewarm feelings towards the House. He was charged with flattering the public press, courting the favour of he knew not what conductors of public papers. He must, in justice to his own character, repel such insinuations. To rouse the pride of a popular assembly, to excite their indignation against imaginary encroachments, was an easy task, and a sure mode of obtaining sympathy and applause. To kindle the highest sentiments of pride and indignation in a popular assembly, jealous of its privileges, and tenacious of its rights, required but the slightest breath of air. It required but little talent and little address in managing such topics, to gain ready access to the sympathy and the feelings of a popular assembly like that House. Sympathy in guarding the constitution, zeal for privileges necessary for the due exercise of legislation, were, even in their worst state, so blended and mixed up with the best feelings, that they ought not to be wantonly excited or directed where they were not called for. He was the last man who would wish the House of Commons to become insensible to their privileges—to what he considered as an essential part of the bulwark of our liberties; and he had on all occasions exerted his humble powers in defence of those privileges. On that subject he had agreed with gentlemen from whom he differed on other subjects. In defence of the necessary and salutary privileges of the House of Commons, he was always ready to encounter the most violent insinuations or reproaches, and to expose himself to attack and danger, if danger should occur, in the defence of them. He viewed them as intimately connected with the best part of our constitution; and in the humble but honest effort he made to prevent an act of injustice and wanton insult, he had not apprehended that he laid himself open to any charge of indifference to their preservation. He thought that he had consulted every feeling of authority and of pride which belonged to the House. If it should be his lot to see their privileges really in danger, if he should have the misfortune to see a sacrifice really required in their defence; if he was destined to see them fall, he could say—

*Illi cineres, et flamma extrema meorum;
Testor, in occasu vestro, nec tela, nec ulla
Vitasse vices Danaum; et, si fata fuissent
Ut euderem, meruisse manu.*

His right hon. friend ought at least to have refuted the arguments opposed to him, after he had by means of incidental declamation secured partiality in his favour. If he had done so to his satisfaction, he would have agreed with him that conciliation would be cowardice and timidity. Where, he begged the committee to reflect, where the cowardice or timidity was to be found on the present occasion. He recollected, indeed he could never forget, an expression used in that House by his right hon. friend, sir William Grant; whose sentiments indeed he always recollected and referred to with peculiar pleasure. Sir William Grant had said, when false or pretended timidity was pleaded in that House—"I am an enemy to all sorts of fear; but of all fears, the most foolish is the fear of being thought afraid." To that most foolish of all fears he ascribed the baseless fabric of his right hon. friend's; for, splendid and magnificent as it was, it was without a base. He (sir J. Mackintosh), had urged as a reason for his amendment, the confusion of guilt and innocence, of meritorious respectability and flagitious crime, which this law would introduce. No reply had been made to this by his right hon. friend. All this he had quitted in his impatience to reach the splendor of declamation. This was the precept of the most celebrated poet and critic of antiquity—a precept which his right hon. friend had incorporated in his mind, as he had done all the wisdom and elegance of ancient literature—

"Desperat tractata nitescere posse, relinquit."

All his (sir James Mackintosh's) arguments his right hon. friend had forgotten, in his impatience to triumph in the opportunity of crushing an ideal antagonist. He now came to the last topic of his right hon. friend's declamation; it was, that he had courted the daily press, and threatened the House with the power and hostility of the press. He was sorry to be thought by his noble friend to have in some measure merited the imputation. He was sorry that his noble friend, who was such a model of independence—who was equally hostile against unfair influence from without, and undue power exercised within those walls—who felt equal zeal against dangerous combinations of the people and degrading claims of power on the part of the Crown; he was sorry that such a model of independence should have blamed him. But his noble friend must naturally take alarm at the shadow of such a fault. Yet such a fault he was not conscious of having committed. He entreated the committee to recall to their recollection the argument which he had urged. The justification of the daily press was part of his argument. What he had stated respecting it, was not so much in the shape of eulogium as of fact. His argument would have been incomplete without such a fact. Having made out that this measure was uncalled for on the part of the daily press; having made out that its extension to them would be a confusion of the respectable with the atrocious, he had contended that, in addition to justice and humanity, motives of sound policy recommended the separation of the respectable from the dangerous. This was the whole of his argument—this the sole object of his speech. To say that he had held out a threat of the power of the press, was to misunderstand, or to misrepresent his language. He had indeed said, that its power had increased: he had represented this as the necessary result of the progress of improvement in society; he had represented it as naturally arising from the increase of knowledge and intelligence. Moral feeling had corresponded in progress and improvement to the progress and improvement of intellect. The moral and intellectual qualities exhibited in the conduct of the press had acquired a power, and had become arrayed in a character which rendered the press infinitely more mighty and more beneficial than it had been in former times. This was not declamatory praise; it was the sober statement of historical fact. Upon what grounds could his right hon. friend found his objections to the conciliation of this power? It was friendly, it was respectable. There existed no reason why it should be feared or persecuted. When conciliation towards the disturbed districts of the country had been mentioned, the indignant retort was, "Are you afraid of them? They are in the hands of the enemy. They are to be subdued, not conciliated." Whatever might be the propriety of this style of reasoning, he begged leave to ask the committee, whether it was no light objection to an enactment that it tended to alienate the friendly and well-disposed? It was the part of a wise statesman to take a far prospective view of the dangers that might reasonably be apprehended, and to make judicious and provident arrangements for the well-being of society. It was his part to consult every distinct interest that might by possibility interrupt the harmony or endanger the safety of the community. This was the moral dignity and intellectual qualification of a wise and enlightened statesman. It was not from fear that conciliation was now recommended. Fear was a base and detestable motive. He would not disclaim its influence, for the man was degraded who even descended to disavow it. But prudence in avoiding insult, irritation, and injustice, was altogether distinct from fear. Respect for a respectable body in society was justice, as well as prudence. He could not, therefore, be convicted of the charges brought against him; he felt acquitted in his own consciousness; he felt assured that he was acquitted in the judgment of the committee. Neither could he be convinced of the incorrectness of his arguments, for he had received no answer. He had simply made an appeal to those maxims of wisdom under which governments prospered and empires became great; and he must once more repel the imputation of having addressed to the House of Commons any other than the fairest and most incontrovertible principles of legislation.

Mr. Canning said, that he would detain the committee but for a few moments. If ever he had risen with caution and apprehension, both as to the topic and as to the persons, whose arguments he had to combat, it was on the last occasion when he addressed them. He had been called on to do so by the nature of the speech which had been delivered by his hon. and learned friend. There were many members then in the House who, perhaps, had not been present when he last addressed the committee; but to those who were, he would appeal whether he had not correctly followed the statements of his hon. and learned friend. If he had not followed his hon. and learned friend throughout, he had, following his example in referring to the models of antiquity, commented upon his strong points, and upon those which had made most impression. If he had dwelt upon particular subjects, it was his hon. and learned friend who had set him the example. His hon. and learned friend had described a despot, and he (Mr. Canning) had naturally, therefore, abstracted the quality from the person, and alluded to despotism. His hon. and learned friend had introduced the topic of the power of the public press, its diffusion from one extremity of the universe to the other, the sacred and mystic manner in which its doctrines were propounded, and the overwhelming influence which it possessed, in a way that justified his (Mr. Canning's) impression, that his hon. and learned friend's object was, to create the impression which he had attributed to him. His hon. and learned friend had portrayed an individual who had for 40 years exercised a kind of despotic power over his fellow men,—who had, as it were, seated between the urns of Jove, dictated his oracles without control. If on this occasion he (Mr. Canning) should allude to the classics, his hon. and learned friend had set him the example, he might then say:

—Arcades ipsum

Credunt se vidisse Jovem; cum sæpe nigrantem

Ægida concuteret dextra, nimbosque ciceret.

He was justified in the whole of the quotation, for his hon. friend had spoken of the clouds too in which this mighty being was enveloped: "Quis Deus, incertum est." But to proceed to the argument of his hon. and learned friend, he conceived that it was his wish to expunge a description of crime which the law ought to visit. Now, if this were agreed to, the bill might be abandoned altogether. It had been admitted by this, and decided by the other House, that such an enactment was necessary, and he could not admit the opinions of his hon. friend, without giving up the whole principle of the bill. In the course of the observations he had made, his argument was, that crime, and not persons, should be attacked; and he would attack the crime wherever it was to be met with. The description of individuals connected with the press, to whom his hon. and learned friend had alluded, were, like other men, liable to err, but when they did so to the violation of a law, they must take the consequences. Would it be wise in legislating upon a question of importance, embracing several descriptions of persons as objects, that some of them should be excluded, because they, less frequently, would become infractors of the law?—For himself, he saw no insuperable objection to the introduction of the words desired by his hon. and learned friend; but at a time when the fruitful growth of improper publications proved the magnitude of the dangers to be dreaded, why was a part of the press which none would deny could be converted into an engine of destruction, to be exempted from a law passed for the special purpose of restraining evils which were allowed to have derived their existence from the same machine? He would not object to the definition of the crime made by his hon. and learned friend if it could be introduced consistently with the enactments of the bill. At the same time let it not be understood, that he conceded for a moment that there ever were times in which the monarchy was in more danger, or the parliament in greater difficulty than the present. In conclusion he could not admit, that there ought to be any exception in the bill in favour of particular individuals. His hon. and learned friend had spoken of various kinds of fear. There was, according to his hon. and learned friend, a provident and salutary fear under which the legislature ought to enact its measures and to provide for futurity. But there was also another description of fear, which he (Mr. Canning) hoped the committee would avoid—he meant the fear excited by that fascination which hurried the victim into the jaws of its devourer.

Mr. Brougham admitted the difficulty of taking the definition of his hon. and learned friend as to libel without the amendment, for one was inconsistent with the other. He would rather take the whole, or leave the bill as it now stood. His hon. and learned friend and the right hon. gentleman had certainly displayed very great eloquence; a considerable portion of which, however, had been expended in a kind of complimentary contest. In their episode, respecting each other they, to a by-stander, somewhat resembled two lovers who, after a quarrel agreed to meet and accommodate their differences. He certainly rather agreed with the observation of his noble friend that there was no necessity, as applied to the general argument, for the introduction of part of what had fallen from his hon. and learned friend. Still however the argument of his hon. and learned friend was not (as he conceived it) that two classes of men should be distinguished by the bill—for he had not maintained that all the daily writers were to be classed alike—but it was that this bill should not confound the innocent with the guilty. His hon. and learned friend had been misunderstood, if he were supposed to have said any one sentence in favour of intimidation of the House. He (Mr. Brougham) had been on all occasions, and would ever continue to be, a most strenuous advocate of the dignity and privileges of that House. He would be the first, if not the strongest against any attack upon either; but he had never understood his hon. and learned friend to make any such allusion, and if he had even supposed that he had so heard his hon. and learned friend, he should be strongly inclined to distrust the evidence of his own senses. Reverting to the amendment proposed, he would say, that it was extremely difficult to define the nature of such a crime as was contemplated by this bill. But he would ask why should we not content ourselves with what our ancestors had done with respect to seditious and blasphemous libels? Why not, as was done in the act of the 39th of the king, and in Mr. Fox's bill, go by the vox signatum. But here, by a particular definition, many cases were left out which ought to come under the operation of this act. Without going further into this part of the subject, he had a strong objection to the present bill, from the extraordinary power which it gave to the ministers of the Crown. In discussing a proposed law, if he could show that it conveyed a discretionary power dangerous to the subject, he had a right to assume that it might be abused. Whatever the motive of those who proposed the bill might be, it was not too much to assume the possibility that they might have successors disposed to oppress or persecute their enemies. What was the power which, under this bill, a secretary of state possessed? He would not suppose that the noble lord would wilfully abuse the power with which he was invested; but he could not make the same admission for those who might succeed him in his office of secretary of state for foreign affairs. This bill gave the power of banishment; but did the committee consider what might be the effect of that punishment? The sovereigns of Europe were at this moment united by a sort of fraternal compact, the nature of which was, in most instances, only known to their subjects by the strictness with which it was enforced. Could it be supposed that any one of those sovereigns would suffer the subject of the other to remain in his dominions without a regular passport from his own country, or remain at all if he was known to have been an outcast from that country? Suppose another minister acting in the place of the noble lord wished to send a man banished by this bill to a particular place. Suppose he were to say "I will not indulge you by letting you reside in France, or gratify you by allowing you to pass to Italy," was there in such case any thing in the present bill to prevent him? The bill did not provide the party so banished with his expenses in leaving the kingdom. Would not its operation, then, be considered by many as worse than, or at least as bad as, transportation? The only place to which the convicted party might be sent, where perhaps he would be allowed to remain, would be Siberia; and there was nothing in this bill which would prevent his being sent thither. Under the name of banishment, that much severer punishment might be inflicted. But who were they who were most likely to come within the scope of this bill? Not the affluent man, who might—having written, and being convicted of one libel—say, "I will take warning; I will write no more:" no, but those who had no option; those who for their livelihood must continue to write and run the risk of a second conviction; for it was well known, that many of those who were liable to fall under the operation of the measure were rather in humble than in affluent circumstances. They were men who gained a livelihood by writing, and who could not give it over, even with all its terrors and responsibilities. To such a person the boon of the noble lord in substituting banishment for transportation would appear rather of an equivocal nature; for he might not be able to convey himself from the country, and even if he could do that, he might not be able to subsist in another. This was one strong objection which he had to the bill; but there was another which he begged to press upon the notice of the committee. The effect of it would be to send out of the country those political writers, who had so far transgressed the law as to come under the severities which it enacted: but let the committee consider what might be the consequence of such a line of policy. We should be sending them amongst our enemies! He did not mean to say that would be the case in the present pacific state of Europe. The nations of the continent were not now our enemies (and he hoped they would long continue on friendly terms with us), but they might not always continue so; and what would be the effect of sending amongst them such men, who to their peculiar habits, to strong, perhaps violent and criminal prejudices against the government, would then have added the desire of revenge for a supposed injustice done to them; would it not be natural to suppose that they would assist those nations, whether our rivals in peace, or our antagonists in war? This was not an imaginary case. Look to what had occurred in America. Who were those who had proved themselves, the most active, and efficient, as opposed to the interests of England? They were the Irish emigrants, who had been banished from their country at the period of the unfortunate rebellion. Let us look to France: who were those who had supported that country in its most determined efforts against us, who had conducted its newspapers, assisted in its wars, who were colonels of brigades, who had headed troops of spies, to ascertain our most secret movements, and as he had said (and perhaps that was the worst thing which they had effected against this country) who had edited newspapers, inflaming the public minds of other nations against us? Who were these men? They were those whom measures of extreme severity, called for perhaps by some circumstances and in some cases, had banished from their country. Such were the description of men whom this bill would be most likely to affect; and should we not take into consideration, the power and the disposition which, after being so banished, they would have to injure us? The experience of the past, justified him in saying that this was no visionary danger. On the subject of the general licentiousness of the press, which had been held up as a main ground for the present measure, he lamented the absence of the hon. member for Galway, who in general edified and entertained the House so much on all subjects, whether grave or gay. The hon. member had told them to look at the horrid nature of the libels that issued from the press—that of a banker, for instance, it might be told that 400,000*l.* of paper was out against him, and that a pastry cook might be reported to have made patties of the flesh of disintombed infants, to the ruin of the poor banker, and to the irretrievable disgrace of the unhappy pastry cook. But what would the hon. member say to this bill, which left society still exposed to their infliction? So that on the morrow of the passing of the bill, the banker might, in the natural progress of exaggeration, be accused of having four millions of paper outstanding, and the wicked libeller might assert that the pastry cook made his patties of something worse than the flesh of infants. The bill had no additional security in it for the prevention of libels of this nature. The general licentiousness of the press was not, therefore, an argument in favour of this measure. He seriously felt, that in a bill which professed to purify and correct the press, they altogether omitted the consideration of, if not the blackest, at least not the lightest of its faults. In no period of the history of this country had a more foul and intolerable system of spoliation against private character been carried on than during the last 10 or 12 years. There seemed to be in the public a morbid appetite for those base cates, and there were never wanting those who pandered to the most unnatural propensities. He did not so much blame many of the conductors of some of those publications (though he thought they were without excuse), as he did those by whom they were patronised. This bill would not, however, affect such slanderers as those he had described. Two publications of this nature he had heard of; one of them was named the Satirist, and the other the Scourge; the one of high Tory principles, and the other, not indeed supporting the Whigs, but being in systematic and violent opposition to all the measures of government. The latter of these publications he had never read a line of, but the other (The Satirist) he had been obliged, in the discharge of his professional duty, to look over. He thought it as disgraceful and disgusting an exhibition of low and scurrilous malignity as had ever fallen under his notice. It not only attacked the public principles of those who were of different political sentiments from those which it seemed to espouse, but went into the private history of the most private characters. On one occasion it had entered into the bed-room of a most amiable individual, the ornament of the peerage, and attacked his character with the foulest slanders, which were conveyed to those who were unable to read them by a coloured caricature. Yet, because the editor of that base publication had lent a violent, though injurious support to the measures of government, he was sent out (not banished) but sent out to represent the government, as a consul in New England too, a place where purity of character was esteemed as much as in any part of the world! In the noble lord who had the immediate appointment to those offices, this was no doubt an act of indiscretion or inadvertency, but it was one which he much deplored and marvelled at. An hon. member had on a recent occasion expressed a distaste at the progress of education in this country, as if it were inconsistent with peace and liberty. Although, in answer to what had been impliedly said by the right hon. member for the university of Oxford as to the alternative of our manufactures or the constitution, he would reply—"The constitution beyond all doubt:" yet if it were put to him, whether we should give up the constitution, or that education from which he conceived all moral improvement was derived, he would say, "Perish the constitution, if it can be preserved only at the expense of all that ennobles or improves the human mind." If the progress of that education, which raised man from a rude, savage, and debased state (for they were all the same) to the present happy condition of a civilized being, were inconsistent with a constitutional monarchy, he would rather live under a government less constitutional, than see the mass of the people again brutalized and degraded. He would prefer education and its effects, even without liberty, to the enjoyment of liberty in the darkness of savage barbarism; but God forbid that such an alternative should ever be proposed. He differed toto cœlo from the hon. gentleman, and conceived that liberty and peaceful habits, were not only not inconsistent with knowledge, but that they were intimately and closely allied with each other. And as the freedom of the country had been the parent of civilization and of every mental improvement, so it would be monstrous and unnatural to suppose, that it was only by the destruction of that parent that the offspring could be preserved. Education, while it was the friend of every liberal sentiment, was in his opinion the truest security for the attachment of the people to the laws and constitution.

Lord Castlereagh regretted with the

hon. and learned gentleman that the press should be made the vehicle of attacks on private character, but he thought the allusion to this point had no reference to the question before the committee. The hon. and learned gentleman had charged him with an indiscreet use of his patronage in the appointment of Mr. Manners to the situation which he now held, but he was surprised the hon. and learned gentleman should be ignorant of the circumstances of the case; for in answer to a question put by him on a former occasion, he had stated, that at the time Mr. Manners was so appointed, he (lord C.) did not know that he had been connected with a publication of such a nature. The individual mentioned was recommended to him by a friend, as a proper person to fill the situation to which he had been appointed.

Mr. Brougham said, it was not to the appointment he had objected, but to the principle of continuing him after the fact of his connexion with the work in question was known.

Lord Castlereagh said, that that fact was not known until after the appointment appeared in the Gazette, and he did not conceive that any grounds had been adduced on which he ought to have advised his royal highness to remove him.

Mr. Scarlett observed, that the ground of the introduction of the present bill was to put down the blasphemy and sedition which issued from a portion of the press. But it went not to that alone, for it confounded the innocent with the guilty, and equally condemned that portion which was respectable, with the vilest and most disreputable part. It classed the innocent man, who by accident was led to the commission of crime, with the deliberate and malignant libeller. The amendment of his learned friend would make this just and necessary distinction. The bill comprised every mode of publication. But the law of libel, as it already existed, not only went to punish the writer of an offensive article, but even all those who were, in a particular way, connected with the work. But as this did not apply alone to the diurnal press, but to almost every species of publication, he would ask, why not define what the libel was? It was said to be "any thing tending to bring his majesty's government into contempt." Now, as the acts of the government were ascribed to, and looked upon as the acts of ministers, the libel would not of course extend to members enjoying the full freedom of speech, and speaking in that House; but this would not be an excuse in a court of law, for there a man might be charged for similar expression of opinion which had only occurred in that boldness of discussion which, he admitted, existed in the present day: he might have no intention to bring his majesty's government into contempt, and yet become liable to all the penalties of the present bill. The publisher, too, however innocent, would be subject to the like penalty. But not only did the act extend to every thing tending to bring his majesty's government, but also "either House of Parliament," into contempt. So that, if a man hazarded an opinion as to the construction of the House, or if he said a word against the propriety of a small place with few inhabitants returning members to parliament, as not being consistent with a popular representation, he might be construed to intend to bring the House of Commons into contempt. He remembered the case of the Walcheren expedition, which he knew was condemned by almost every one who spoke of it. He had not the honour of a seat in parliament at that time, but he was as capable of knowing what was the public opinion on the subject as the hon. member for Corfe-Castle could possibly be from that portion of the public which he represented. But would it be maintained, that the man who should state what he thought on that subject, and who should condemn the policy of that measure, though sanctioned by both Houses of Parliament, meant to bring those Houses into contempt? He contended that if such a principle were adopted, it would destroy every thing like free discussion. The learned gentleman next adverted to the penalty of banishment, and condemned the bill as leaving it to the discretion of the judges whether it should be permanent or not. At the present day, when the judges were vested with discretionary power in many cases, they found it difficult so to apportion the punishment as not to appear to lean too much to the side of lenity or of severity.

Sir J. Mackintosh expressed his surprise that the words "maliciously and advisedly" should be omitted in this bill, since they were inserted in the act of the 36th of the king.

The Attorney General observed, that this bill did not propose to create any new offence, but merely to inflict an accumulated punishment upon an offence already known to our law. He therefore objected to the introduction of the word "malicious" in the clause, as unnecessary.

The amendment was negatived.

The Attorney General said, that the clause enacting the penalty of banishment on the commission of a second offence, as it now stood, was capable of being construed retrospectively; to obviate which, he should propose to introduce the words, "after the passing of this act."—The amendment was agreed to; after which he proposed, in order to avoid the consequences which the law attached to banishment for life, that the judge should be authorized to banish the delinquent for such term of years as to him might seem fit.

Mr. Brougham suggested that the discretion of the judge should not exceed seven years.

Sir J. Mackintosh observed, that if his hon. friend's suggestion were not attended to, it must be meant to do that indirectly which it was not thought expedient to do directly—banishing a man for a period of years more than equal to his probable life; and such a mode of proceeding could not be too strongly deprecated, as inconsistent with the openness and dignity of the English law.

The Attorney General avowed that it was not intended to abandon the principle of banishment for life in cases of aggravated guilt.

Lord Castlereagh submitted in the case of Mr. Carlile, who, in the face of the courts of the country, thought proper, after conviction, to persevere in selling the libels to which that conviction applied, whether on the second conviction of such a person it would be seemly or right to allow him to remain in the country?

Mr. G. Lamb begged those who defended this clause, on the ground that former statutes had authorized banishment, to reflect on the circumstances under which those statutes had been enacted. The 39th Eliz. had certainly introduced the punishment of banishment; but it had substituted that punishment for others of the most degrading kind. The class of offenders to whom that statute applied were, before its enactment, liable to be placed in the stocks, to have their ears cut off, to be branded on the forehead with the letter C, and to be made slaves for two years. These ignominious punishments were found insufficient to check the crimes of the persons who were subjected to them, and therefore they were abolished, and the severer penalty of banishment was resorted to. This showed what opinion the legislators of Elizabeth's time entertained of the punishment which the ministers of the present day thought so mild.

The amendment was agreed to. On the question "That the clause so amended stand part of the bill," the committee divided: Ayes 109. Noes 30. Majority 79.

Mr. Alderman Heygate said, that he approved of the measure because he believed it to be necessary; but as the causes which required it were, in his opinion, of a temporary nature, the remedy applied to the evil should not be permanent. This measure might be tried for three years, and at the end of that period it might be renewed, if circumstances should then require its continuance. But he begged the House to recollect, that if they passed this as a permanent measure, it could not be repealed without the concurrence of the other House of Parliament. He therefore moved for leave to bring up a clause for limiting the duration of the bill for three years.

The motion was seconded by Mr. Denman, opposed by lord Castlereagh, and negatived.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, December 24.

BLASPHEMOUS LIBEL BILL.] On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

Sir R. Wilson could not suffer this opportunity to pass without once more entering his protest against the measure. He thought it was one which was calculated to enslave the country. Whether ministers would abuse the power which it gave them, he would not say; but whether they did so or not, he objected to the bill as a measure, which, under the pretence of putting down seditious libels, went to cramp every thing like free discussion upon political subjects. In the name therefore of the free people of England—not the people without the government of King, Lords, and Commons, but the people with the sovereign at their head—he protested against this measure, as one which would alter their excellent constitution. He condemned it the more as being part of a series of severe enactments against public liberty, without being accompanied with even an attempt to inquire into the condition of the people, or the cause of their distresses.

Sir H. Parnell begged to remind the noble lord of the situation in which the bill would place Ireland. It would, in her situation, be much more severely felt than in England, for she had already restrictions on the press which were not known here. He alluded to the power which was exercised of withholding stamps from the proprietor of a newspaper after his conviction for a libel a second time. There were also several regulations with respect to stamp duties on the smallest papers, even hand-bills, which were not known here. He trusted, therefore, the noble lord would take this matter into consideration, and introduce some measure upon the subject.

The bill was then passed.

PETITION OF THE MERCHANTS OF LONDON RESPECTING COMMERCIAL DISTRESS.] Mr. Irving said, a petition had been put into his hands, signed by a number of respectable persons, merchants and traders of London, whose object was to call the attention of the House to the commercial distress of the country. These persons approached the House with no factious views. They did not desire to interfere with or interrupt the course which parliament might desire to take on other questions, and they were the rather convinced that ministers would not be inattentive to their requests, because they had made efforts lately to meet the wishes expressed in the petition of another respectable trading body. They thought they had a right to expect that parliament and the ministers would examine into the causes from which the distress had arisen. He had no instruction to state by what measure the petitioners imagined that relief would be found. On his own part he suggested, that in the course of an inquiry, the attention of the House would be probably called to that system of restriction and restraint, which, though it might have been advisable in time of war, was hardly desirable to be continued in a time of peace. He thought too, they might look for some benefit to the commerce of the country by an extension of the trade in the Eastern world, and that even under the article of the East India Company's charter, some arrangements might be made in favour of our shipping interest. He alluded to the trade between China and the continent of Europe, in which the India company took no interest, and which was now entirely carried on under the American flag. He believed it would be found, too, that the change in the currency of the country was one of the chief causes of the evils that were felt among all classes of the community. But he entirely agreed on this subject with the House, that it was not now wise to retrace the steps that had been taken. A fit object of inquiry, however, was, whether the several stages of the return to cash payments could be modified? He alluded particularly to the bullion payments, and to the question which had been started, whether the price fixed for bullion in the first payment should not continue during the whole time of the preparatory transaction? It should be inquired also whether payments in silver might not answer all purposes as well as gold? He had no fear, however, that gold or silver would be applied for. There was nothing in our foreign relations that induced him to apprehend it. But fears on these subjects out-run facts. The prudent, the cautious, or the timid, were afraid that the system might burst on them, and their efforts to escape apprehended evils was one great cause of the real distress of the country. He did not think a committee of inquiry would find much ground for expecting relief from the proposals of his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington. An inquiry into the corn laws on the principle recommended by his hon. friend would only, in his opinion, bring the agricultural into the state of the commercial interests. Neither did he expect much from inquiries into the poor laws or taxation ; still less from the proposal for paying off the national debt. These, however, were merely suggestions on his part, without communication with the petitioners. He hoped, in the course of the adjournment, the ministers, and particularly a right hon. gentleman in his eye would inquire into the subject of the petition.

The petition was brought up and read. It sat forth " That the Petitioner, being deeply impressed with a sense of the present distressed state of the commercial and manufacturing interests, of the general want of confidence, and of the extensive and increasing evils which are the natural consequence of this state of things, and therefore of the pressing necessity that legislative measures should as soon as possible be adopted for the relief of those interests ; and the Petitioners, being apprehensive that the House is about to adjourn without having adopted any measures tending to an inquiry into the causes of those evils, and being at the same time satisfied that if such inquiry were to be instituted the result would be extensively beneficial, by laying open those causes, and bringing under the view of the House the means by which the Petitioners confidently believe that the existing evils may be alleviated and eventually removed ; the Petitioners most earnestly entreat, That the House will be pleased to take this important subject into their most serious consideration, and that such inquiry may be instituted as shall put the House into full possession of the various causes which have operated with such lamentable effects, and thus enable the House to form a correct judgment of the measures which it may be expedient to adopt for the remedy thereof."

Mr. Grenfell said, he could not see any practical end that was openly proposed by the petitioners, but he had reason to complain that they, having, as they seemed to think, a remedy in view for the distress of the country, allowed the House to sit for a month, and afterwards to determine on an adjournment, without coming forward. When he heard last night that a petition, purporting to come from the merchants and traders of London, had been put into the hands of an hon. member, he was very much surprised, as he had passed the greatest part of

Wednesday and Thursday in the city in company of merchants and bankers, without once hearing of it. However he had made it his business to go into the city specially to inquire respecting the petition this day, and he had inquired of a great many merchants and bankers, but except two or three who had signed, and one who had been applied to to sign, no one had heard a word of it. He should begin with the person who had been applied to. This was a Russia merchant of the first eminence, and he had been applied to by a friend who begged him to go to a certain tavern, where this petition was lying, to sign it. He asked what was the object? " Oh," said the applicant, " it comes from the other end of the town—from lord Castlereagh. The hon. member for Shrewsbury had made (he said) a motion partly political and partly on the distress of the country, and lord Castlereagh had objected to it, but said that if an inquiry had been proposed merely into the distress of the country, it should have his support. The object was to present a petition solely directed to the latter purpose." His friend said, that if the petition came from lord Castlereagh, or any minister, he should have nothing to do with it—and he was right. He then applied to a gentleman who had signed it, a member of one of the greatest commercial houses in this country, or in Europe. He had asked this gentleman what was the object of the petition, and why he signed it? He said he signed it to oblige a person who dealt with him, and because, though it was a milk-and-water thing, and though he knew not to what it tended, he did not see it could do any harm. From another person to whom he applied, and who had signed it, he received an answer saying, that he signed it at the request of a gentleman, who begged him to sign it at one or two o'clock, and told him that after three it would be too late; that he confessed it seemed to him ridiculous, but he also thought it harmless; but on farther consideration of what might be the object of it, he was sorry that he had signed it, and wished he could withdraw his name, particularly if it was founded on any reference to the circulating medium. He was aware that a petition was only to be taken as the petition of those who signed it; but this would go forth, in some measure, as the petition of the merchants and traders of London. If the hon. gentleman who brought forward the petition had confined himself to the question of the China trade, he should be disposed to agree with him; but at the end of the hon. gentleman's catalogue the "murder was out;" the currency! the currency! was the source of all the evils of the country! He believed this petition proceeded from a party, who had been cramped in their speculations in the funds, or in their over-trading, which was a species of gambling, by the measures for restoring the currency to a sound state. They had also been aware that they had lost in public confidence by the opinions of other men having been adopted by the general opinion of the country, and they were now endeavouring to excite an alarm, and to induce parliament to return to a system that had half ruined the country.

Mr. Irving said, he had had no intercourse with the petitioners, but had been only requested by them to present the petition to the House. But he saw names affixed to it as respectable as that of the hon. member himself. The majority was composed of the most respectable names in the commercial world—and if small in number it contained a body of wealth and consideration which demanded attention from that House. They called for no specific enactments, and he, in mentioning some considerations that occurred to himself, had expressly stated that he was not instructed to state them, but that they were entirely suggestions of his own. As to the resumption of cash payments, he confessed, that however much he had differed from others, not as to the result, but as to the means to be taken to insure it, he should now be most unwilling to disturb the existing enactments; because, chiefly, the country had already suffered a great part of the inconveniencies which could result from that measure. By the advocates of the law that end was to be reached by privation, which he had conceived might be attained by a course of prosperity. He would say, it was his most deliberate conviction, that a great part of the evils which afflicted all classes in the country, had been owing to the measures taken respecting the currency; and though the subject had not been the study of his life, he would, if the question came again to be discussed, not be afraid to meet either the hon. gentleman, or any of his disciples in argument; and he felt, that in opposing the hon. gentleman, he should be supported by the opinion of the country. With respect to the private letter and personal communications with some who had signed, and with others who had declined to sign this petition, to which the hon. member had thought proper to refer, with a view to cast reflections upon the character of the petition, he must say, that some reproof was due to those from whom such letters and communications came. He had, he felt, said quite enough to prevent any undue impression from being made upon the House by the representations of the hon. member, or by that ridicule or levity which he had thought proper to introduce upon this subject. But he could not help adding, that the hon. member's levity was extremely misplaced on this occasion. A question indeed, involving the consideration of the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the country, was of too grave and important a nature to be mixed with any thing like levity. But there were many observations addressed to the House, by the hon. member, upon this occasion, which, however much he differed from him, and especially upon the bullion question, he by no means expected from him. With respect to the object of the petition, he trusted that ministers would feel the propriety of taking that object into their consideration, and founding some measure upon it; but if not, he hoped that House itself would, immediately after the recess, institute a thorough investigation upon the points to which the petitioners sought to draw its attention.

Mr. J. Smith regretted that the hon. gentleman had not withheld the reflections in which he had indulged on the petition. The gentleman with whom the petition originated, was a merchant of the first eminence and respectability, both for wealth, talents, and personal character: from the nature of his mercantile connexions, he could not enter into plans of speculation; but, at the same time, were he disposed to speculate, none had better means of doing so, on the score of wealth and credit. He could assure the House, that the petition had no connection whatever with the noble lord (Castlereagh), any more than with a person in another world; and he had reason to believe that the noble lord had not even heard of it till last night. This gentleman had called on him (Mr. S.) to ask his opinion on the propriety of such a petition; and he confessed that he had approved of it. In the conversation which took place, that gentleman did not say any thing that could warrant the remarks which had been read by the hon. gentleman. The bullion question, in particular, had not been mentioned at all. They had talked of the great distress of the manufacturing classes, of the two motions for inquiry into that subject, and of the grounds upon which ministers had opposed those motions. The motion of the hon. member for Shrewsbury had been opposed, because it blended the consideration of other political questions with the inquiry: and that of the hon. member for Southampton was opposed, chiefly because it was founded on the plan of a gentleman (Mr. Owen) who held opinions on certain subjects different from those of other persons, although, perhaps, it would have been well, if that gentleman's opinions on some subjects, particularly on education, had been attended to. It was, therefore, inferred, that if a proposition for inquiry, free from the grounds of objection which had been urged against both the former motions, were submitted to parliament, ministers it was likely would accede to it. But as to the gentleman with whom the petition originated, he had no connexion whatever with ministers; but, on the contrary, entertained, he believed, political opinions of an opposite nature; and so far from his having any view to the bullion question, he knew him to be the firmest friend to the plan for the resumption of cash-payments. The gentleman of whom he was speaking, did accordingly draw up the excellent and moderate petition which had been read to the House. As far as concerned his hon. friend who had spoken last, and who had spoken so well, he could vouch for the fact, that he knew nothing of the petition till he was requested to present it. He had himself been applied to on the subject of presenting it, and had thought that his hon. friend, the member for Taunton, would be the most proper person, but it was ascertained that he was not in town. He had then suggested his hon. friend on his right (Mr. Ellice) but he had declined it. It then appeared to him that his hon. friend would be the fittest person, he being one of the most eminent merchants in the kingdom, and one whose opinions were likely to have the greatest weight. If the hon. gentleman had known the time allowed for obtaining signatures, instead of remarking on the smallness of the number, he would have been inclined to express his surprise, that so many names should have been affixed to it in so short a time. He hoped the House would receive the petition, and take the subject into consideration at as early a period as possible after the recess. If the prayer of this petition were attended to, it would at least give a ray of hope to the suffering part of the community.

Mr. Ricardo was happy to hear it stated by all the hon. gentlemen who had spoken, that the laws enacted last year concerning the currency of the country, ought not to be disturbed. The country was, unquestionably, in a state of great distress, but he differed in opinion from his hon. friend who presented the petition as to the cause of that distress. His hon. friend thought that this country was in a state of forced currency, and that the evils both at home and abroad arose from the regulations which that House had made relative to the currency. That cause, however, he was convinced, was totally inadequate to produce such an effect, and therefore the evil must be traced to other sources. He might here remark, that his hon. friend had brought an unexpected accusation against him, namely, that he had proposed a plan for the regulation of the currency, but that he had not the merit of originality. Now, he did not think that he had ever claimed that merit, for he was aware that many persons before his time had taken a similar view of the subject, and he hoped that whatever might be the merit of the application which he had made of principles known to others, he had stated his opinions with becoming modesty. He conceived that the distress was chiefly to be ascribed to the inadequacy of the capital of the nation to carry on the operations of trade, manufacture, and commerce. But why was the capital more inadequate now than formerly? If the profits on capital were higher, and labour more productive in other countries, it could not be doubted that capital would be transferred to those countries: no proposition in Euclid was clearer than this. Now, he thought they had greatly aggravated this evil by bad legislation, and he had formerly mentioned instances. He had referred to the corn-laws as one example; and however unpopular the doctrine might be with some gentlemen, he would state his opinion freely, that he believed the corn-laws to have materially increased the evil.

These laws had tended to raise the price of sustenance, and that had raised the price of labour, which of course diminished the profit on capital. But of all this evil, the national debt, and the consequent amount of taxation, was the great cause. Hence the main object of the legislature should be to provide for the payment of that debt, and that provision should commence its operation as soon as possible. For as this debt was chargeable upon all the capital of the country, it was obvious that any capital which went out of the country was exonerated from that charge, while the capital which remained was of course compelled to pay a greater proportion of debt and taxes. To guard against this evil, which was productive at once of individual injustice and national injury, the whole capital of the country ought to be assessed for the discharge of the public debt, so that no more capital should be allowed to go out of the country without paying its fair proportion of that debt. The execution of this plan might be attended with difficulty, but then the importance of the object was worthy of an experiment to overcome every possible difficulty. The whole of the plan through which he proposed the payment of the public debt, might in his view be carried into effect within four or five years. For the discharge of the public debt, he proposed that checks should be issued upon the government to each purchaser, which checks should be kept distinct from the ordinary circulating medium of the country, but should be received by the government in payment of taxes. Thus the debt might be gradually liquidated while the government continued gradually receiving the assessments upon capital to provide for that liquidation. He would not, however, dwell farther upon this chimerical project, as he understood it was considered by every one except himself, but proceed to the consideration of the petition, his hon. friend proposed, as particularly worthy of attention, that a committee of that House should inquire into certain restrictions upon commerce, with a view to their removal. But his hon. friend should reflect, that no immediate effect could be reasonably expected from the labour of such a committee for such a purpose, as the restrictions alluded to, however burthensome, could not be suddenly removed. This removal must, indeed, take place by slow degrees, entwined as they were with the general system of the trade of the country. But still great good might be expected from the investigations of such a committee, who would, he hoped, enter particularly into the consideration of the corn laws. His hon. friend had suggested that a certain modification should take place in the arrangements made towards the removal of the restrictions upon the Bank, namely, that the Bank should not be called upon to pay in bullion until the period arrived for such payment at the lowest rate. Now he, on the contrary, thought that it would be much more for the advantage of the Bank itself, to make the payments in the order already settled; because such payments being made gradually would serve to break the fall, and prepare the Bank for the complete resumption of metallic payments. The only modification, indeed, which he deemed desirable on this subject was, that the Bank should be called upon permanently to pay its notes in bullion, instead of coin; for he could not conceive the policy of incurring the expense of coining gold merely for the purpose of the currency, which could be answered as well, if not more conveniently, by paper. The only object to be provided for in this case was, that the real value of the paper should be equal to its denominative value, according to a settled and universal standard of value, or according to its nominal amount in coin. His hon. friend had recommended the establishment of two standards of value, namely, silver and gold; but this was a project, in his opinion, peculiarly objectionable, because, if there were two standards, there would be greater chance of variation, and the establishment of the least variable standard of value was the object to be desired, with a view to maintain the character of our currency.

Mr. Finlay was an advocate for the object which the petition had in view, although he could not help thinking the question proposed for inquiry extremely complicated. It would perhaps be better to take one branch of this great question at a time than to enter into the whole of it at once. The freedom of trade was, no doubt, a sound principle in theory, but gentlemen were not generally aware of the difficulties which presented themselves, when an attempt was made to carry that principle into practice. The distress of the country, at present, he attributed to over speculation, over importation, and over manufacture. He differed, therefore, from the hon. member for Portarlington, who considered that distress as the fruit of excessive taxation, the corn laws, and high wages, which, according to that hon. member, disqualified this country from selling our manufactures as cheap as other countries, where the taxation and wages were comparatively less. But how did the fact stand? Why, that in the cotton trade, the manufacturers of which were the most distressed at present, we were enabled to undersell all the foreign manufacturers in their own market. What, then, became of the hon. gentlemen's theory as to taxation and low wages, and their effects? The people engaged in manufactures were no doubt suffering hardships, which every good man must deplore. But while they suffered from low wages, and especially in Scotland, it was to be recollected, that their wages were better than the same class of manufacturers received in Germany and America; for the distress of trade was universal, and this formed the aggravation of our distress. The hon. member expressed his persuasion that ministers were disposed to do every thing in their power for the alleviation of the public calamity.

Mr. W. Douglas thought inquiry most imperiously called for; for unless the grievances of the people were considered, and their distress relieved, no hope could be entertained of permanent tranquillity. When the people were in distress, and discontented in 1812, coercive measures were adopted, but no steps were taken to relieve distress or remove the cause of discontent. Upon the recurrence of distress and disaffection in 1816 and 1817, coercive measures alone were again resorted to; and now, in 1819, the same course was to be followed. But after such recent experience, was it wise to persevere in such a system?

Mr. Brougham regretted the harsh expressions towards the petitioners which had fallen from his hon. friend the member for Marlow. Was it no disrespect to eighty of the most considerable merchants of London to say that they belonged to the anti-bullion party, and were influenced by such feelings alone in their application to that House? Had his hon. friend, before he gave vent to such observations, allowed himself to have perused the names appended to that petition, he would have checked himself, and not charged some of the greatest capitalists in the metropolis with being of a description of persons who had overtraded without the possession of any capital. It was plain indeed that his hon. friend's extraordinary zeal on bullion and Bank questions had, on the present, as on other occasions, led him too far. Had he, without even reading the petition, looked only to the signatures, he would have found in them a sufficient guarantee of their respectability—he would have found amongst them also some of the most respectable supporters of the bullion principle as any members in that House. He could mention the name of one, Mr. M'Caulay, who though not in general disposed to the views of Opposition, had, from the commencement, entertained the soundest views on that question. There were others of the petitioners who were formerly members of that House, who had been members of the very bullion committee. It would appear also, that the House of Commons was not the only House in which divisions existed, for he believed, that the hon. member for Marlow, if he had read the names, would have found that of his own brother affixed to it [hear, and no!]; if not his own brother, at least a very near connexion. But it was said, why delay the presentation of the petition to this day, when the House was so near to the adjournment? There was this good reason, this natural solution of the delay—that the petitioners waited under the hope that parliament would have done something to meet existing difficulties, without their intervention. He agreed with them that the attention of parliament ought to be speedily directed to the question, and having said so, he took the present opportunity of stating in answer to applications made to him as well by hon. members of that House, as by other gentlemen out of it, to know whether it was his intention to submit any motion on the commercial distresses, that he had no such intention. He was induced to that decision from the result of his exertions three years ago, when his proposition was met by a motion to read the other orders of the day. Besides, it was his conviction, that any proposition for such a change in the commercial interests of the country, as was suited to the altered state of our political relations with other nations, could be attended with no beneficial effect, if undertaken by any person not connected with the administration. It required the government to bend its whole attention to the subject. They had better means than any individual member could have of acquiring the fullest information on the subject. They ought to undertake it, on their constitutional responsibility. To carry to its accomplishment such an investigation—to decide amidst the conflicting interests which beset it in every stage of its progress, demanded a strong and efficient government. He agreed with his hon. friend (Mr. Ricardo), that nothing would be more fatal than any interference with the system adopted last session relative to cash payments. Any thing calculated to favour any cry against that arrangement, would inevitably increase the mischief. It was to be recollected, that those persons who most urgently pressed its adoption, had never shut their eyes to the fact, that some embarrassment must attend the change from the one system to the other. He agreed with him also, in the conviction, that the desired alteration in our commercial relations could not be the work of a day, from the nature of the interests opposed to each other; it was necessary, then, that the change should operate over a space of time. There was however one point on which he had wished so great an oracle, as he must ever consider him on such subjects, had not pronounced the decided opinion he had. He alluded to the possibility, or, if possible, the advisableness of paying off the national debt. The proposition was not a new one—it had been years ago suggested by Mr. Hutchinson, indeed, he believed every chancellor of the exchequer had a similar proposition made to him every year. It had in more recent times been brought before the public by Dr. Watson, bishop of Landaff, and, with the highest respect for the talents of that meritorious individual, he could not consider that production as the most favourable specimen. The effect of such a measure would be to place the property for five years at the mercy of all the solicitors, conveyancers, and money-hunters, in the country.

Lord Castlereagh agreed in every thing that had been said relative to the respectability of the petitioners, but he could not allow that House to separate under an impression, that the commercial interests of the country were overlooked or forgotten by the ministers of the Crown. With them it was an object of great solicitude. If any practical view opened on the minds, either of the petitioners or of the hon. gentleman who presented it, his right hon. friend at the head of the board of trade would, he had no doubt, be most anxious to receive the communication. With respect to the reference made to the great question which employed the attention of parliament last session, he, who had during that discussion been fully aware of the pressure of the remedy, agreed with the learned member, that every principle of practical wisdom and state policy required that not a doubt should be suffered to exist as to the arrangement being carried into effect.

Mr. Ellice heard with regret from the noble lord, that in place of the government on its own responsibility taking up the inquiry into the public distress, for the purpose of providing that relief, which must be applied, and quickly, the noble lord had left it to the proposition of individual members of that House. As to what had been stated by the hon. member who denied the effect of taxation on the manufacturing distresses, he differed from him most decidedly. If some arrangement was not effected before the period for the bullion payments arrived, under such a system of taxation, he feared an alarming crisis was near.

Mr. Alderman Heygate said, he imputed the distresses to the great diminution of the currency, which had been for a long time gradually going on. When nine millions had been withdrawn from the circulation, great mischief and distress must have been the result. He believed much of the confusion had already taken place, and from what he heard from various parts, confidence was reviving. Let government but state the extent to which the diminution of the circulation should go, and the distress, the effect of uncertainty and want of confidence, would quickly disappear.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, December 27.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.]

Lord Sidmouth, on moving the second reading of the bill, congratulated their lordships on the progress that had been made in effecting the purpose for which they had been called together, this being the last of the bills which it had been thought necessary to propose. Their lordships and the other House of Parliament had met the difficulties and dangers of the crisis in a manner the best calculated to stem them; and the measures that had received the assent of the Crown had already had a beneficial effect in correcting a part of the evils against which they were directed. It was deeply to be regretted that the evils to be provided against should arise out of the abuse of what were undoubtedly the privileges and the rights of the people—the freedom of meeting to discuss grievances, and the freedom of the press. With regard to the first, every care had been taken not to interfere with the legitimate right of meeting; and the fact was, that every meeting that could be made available for the purposes of actual free discussion, was not only left untouched by that act, but by the regulations of the act they were rendered more available to the lawful purposes for which they were intended. To regulate the public press was certainly a matter of greater difficulty, so as to steer clear of trenching upon its freedom. But to the objections in certain quarters, that it was better to do nothing, he could not agree. The present bill proceeded upon the unhappily notorious fact, that blasphemous and seditious publications had been circulated to a great extent; and when it was said that these publications would find their antidote, and that it was unnecessary to restrain them by law, he would refer their lordships to a great statesman, who had observed how dangerous it was for a man to try how much poison his constitution would bear. That the poison circulated by the publications which this bill was intended to restrain, must produce an effect greatly to be deplored, could scarcely be doubted, when it was considered that in every cottage in some districts of the kingdom (he thanked God not in all) were these poisonous publications disseminated. His lordship described briefly the provisions of the bill. The great obstacle had been, the difficulty in finding out the actual printer or publisher of these blasphemous and seditious works, he generally contriving to issue his works only to those upon whom he could depend. Thus five informations had been filed against Carlile, as the vender of a seditious publication, because Sherwin, the printer, could not be found. The regulations in the bill, upon this and other points, would, he trusted, have the effect of checking the circulation of those poisonous publications, and he trusted also that their lordships would not hesitate to pass it, seeing, as they must, that blasphemy and sedition had entered into a conspiracy against the religion and the constitution of the country, which could only be effectually put down by the strong arm of the law.

The Earl of Donoughmore said:—Ministers have, then, at last wound up, to a happy and appropriate conclusion, by this attack upon the freedom of the press, those measures of indiscriminate coercion, that system of pains and penalties which they had devised against a suffering and a prostrate people, and which have been carried into complete and unrelenting execution by overwhelming majorities in both Houses of Parliament—those ready instruments in the hands of the servants of the Prince Regent, to keep his majesty's subjects down—that best of all possible arguments, in the opinion at least of the noble knight of the Thistle on the cross bench, in favour of their own practice, whatever that practice may happen to be. Such are the true characteristics of these fearful measures.—But what is the light in which we are called upon to view them by their authors and abettors on the other side of the House? Instead of a successful attack upon the liberties of all the people, the noble earl in the blue ribbon has not hesitated to take credit for these enactments, as a mild system of remedial measures—measures of peculiar grace and mercy towards the whole community, necessarily called for, for the protection of the faithful subjects of the state, against the inroad of certain impending dangers, which, however, have come into existence—have been born and bred, and have arrived at full maturity, during the very short period which has intervened since the last prorogation of parliament. If ministers had been aware of the impending storm, is it possible that they could so far have neglected their duty as to have sent the members of both Houses home, without giving them some authentic intimation of the dangers with which the country was encompassed? And is it not making too great a demand upon our credulity, for ministers to call upon us to believe, that in four short months this mushroom rebellion has sprung up, and has already assumed so formidable an appearance? What, then, is the result of all this? My lords, I do not feel myself entitled to believe that disaffection has extended itself widely. I am not bound to give implicit credit to the representations which ministers think fit to make in their places in parliament; and that garbled statement which they have presented to both Houses with so much form and solemnity I think it my duty to reject; because it is offered as conclusive evidence against the people of these countries, for whom evidence was offered to be produced at the bar of both Houses of Parliament. But ministers refused to hear a word in their defence, and are now prepared to complete this the last act of outlawry against them, on the mere uncorroborated statement of their inveterate prosecutors, the ministers of the Prince Regent, and without a tittle of such evidence as would, or ought to be received, in any court of justice. My first and main objection then to these measures is, because a sufficient parliamentary ground has not been laid to authorize so serious a proceeding as the stripping the subject of any part of his constitutional privileges. I have another objection against the conduct of ministers, in urging the enacting of these heavy penalties as general measures, because, upon the showing of the ministers themselves, they were devised as the cure for insubordination and turbulence in a very few districts only, and those very particularly circumstanced—and because ministers have, notwithstanding, prevailed upon the parliament to pass a general sweeping system of coercion against the whole community. I have a farther ground of objection, because Ireland has been included in the wide-spreading proscription—whereas her acknowledged tranquillity and peaceable demeanor ought to have made her a very unfitting object for any new measures of severity, and inasmuch as the present measures cannot by any possibility affect her present situation, or even bear upon her former habits, when she deserved less well of the general community than she does at present; and because there has been nothing to justify suspicion against her in the remotest degree, or to prepare her for this cruel infliction, except, perhaps, her having been recently honoured by the panegyric of the ministers. The very principle on which these measures are founded, strikes my mind as in the highest degree objectionable, inasmuch as they draw a wide line of demarcation between the different orders in society, between the many and the few, the rich and the poor, the task-masters and the effective part of the population, teaching to the people this worst of all possible lessons, that in the eye of the parliament at least, their interests, and those of the higher orders, are inconsistent with each other—and again, because in these their lines of demarcation, ministers have overlooked that most appropriate of all distinctions, the separation of the innocent from the guilty.—My lords, I object to the whole of the machinery with which ministers have preceded and accompanied these extraordinary measures. They have taken the head of the state from that dignified retirement in which he is placed in the sanctuary of the constitution—from which he is produced to the view of his people in his own proper person, only for the purpose of exercising the high function of giving or refusing his sanction to the enactments of both Houses of Parliament, or the higher function still, of dispensing the heavenly prerogative of mercy. But ministers have broken into the sanctuary. They have brought the illustrious person to give a precipitate approval of the massacre of his father's subjects, and to influence thereby, as has been too fatally proved, the conduct of magistrates, and, as I fear, of juries too; thus closing the door of justice against the unfortunate victims in the tragedy which was exhibited at Manchester, on the 16th of August last. And lastly, I object to those measures, because some of their most eloquent advocates have thought it indispensable for them, in arguing their necessity, to vilify and to degrade that important part of the constituency, the people, even below the humble rank which they are acknowledged to hold in the community of the state. This may, perhaps, have been a popular topic for the moment, according to the extra-aristocratic feeling of the present day. But this argument, if it deserves the name, could surely have been intended for no other purpose but to exhibit the happy dexterity of the elegant artist in the most vivid colours, whilst he left the case just where he found it. But, according to my view of the subject, the just composition of the state assigns to that reprobated thing, the people, no inconsiderable place. The people form the great body of the social community. It is from them that it receives its form and consistency. They are the sinews of the nation's strength in war; and in peace, the humble instruments of its commercial prosperity. It was that reprobated thing, the people, which fought us through the long and arduous contest which has crowned with glory the British and the Irish name; and has borne the triumphal car of Waterloo's distinguished chief to conquest and to immortality.

The Duke of Athol said, he had most conscientiously voted for these measures, being thoroughly satisfied that they were imperiously required by the state of the country. He was satisfied they would prove highly satisfactory to the great majority of the country.

The Earl of Harrowby observed, that no one could have anticipated the occurrences which took place during the recess, and that ministers, by waiting until now, only showed a disposition to trust to the existing laws, as long as they could do so with safety. Besides, the refusal of the noble lords on the other side to assent to them even now, was a proof of the difficulties that must have attended their proposal at any former period. With the exception of London, Westminster and Southwark, no petition or remonstrance had been presented against them. The silence of the people could not be disputed; and if ever there was an occasion to which the hackneyed quotation dum tacent clamant might be applied, it was the occasion of which he was speaking. From this disposition he augured favourably of the future tranquillity of the country, and thought that government, by looking the danger in the face, had pursued the only practicable measure of conciliation, that of providing for the safety of the well-disposed subjects of the Crown.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had voted for the present measures, because he conceived that their necessary tendency was, to secure the peace of the country, and to promote the happiness of the people. This was the end and aim of all just government; but he must deny to those who were endeavouring to disturb society the character of being the people. Upon that understanding he would say, that the bills in question were calculated to add to the happiness, and to defend all the constitutional rights and interests of the subject. The meeting of parliament ought, indeed, in the present state of the country, to be regarded as a blessing, independently of these measures. How often had it been asserted and resolved in public places, that a certain meeting had been a legal meeting? Yet, was there one man in either House of Parliament who had dared to avow such an opinion? Other meetings, however, had been held in such numbers as to produce terror, and thereby alone to be rendered illegal. At some of them banners were carried bearing the inscription of "Liberty or death," and the old song "Give us death or liberty," was sung in full chorus. So he said too; he joined in the sentiment; he hoped an Englishman always would be found to prefer death to the loss of liberty. But what sort of liberty was intended, or what could be fairly represented by bloody flags, and black flags, by inscriptions of "Vengeance," and "Let him who has not a sword sell his garment and buy one?" He must confess, that before parliament had assembled, his alarm was great; but the majorities which had supported these measures, and the quiet produced already, showing the confidence which was reposed in parliament, had put an end to his alarm. He would now shortly advert to these proceedings, one of which was, to prevent men from assembling together, as they had done, in numbers from 30,000 to 50,000. This the noble earl called coercion. He could not understand how such a term could apply to such a law. Was it possible that these multitudes could carry on any thing like debate, that they could calmly discuss their grievances, or make any rational progress towards their removal? The bill authorized men still to meet—to meet with those whom they knew, in a manner calculated to answer the purposes of debate, and to enable them to come to a right conclusion. Then again with regard to drilling and training, were not these practices which ought to be put down? Though the subject had certainly a right to keep arms for his own defence, he had no right to keep arms for any other purpose. By the express language of the Bill of Rights, which confirmed the general principles to the subject's right, the right also of the legislature to interfere was asserted. With respect to the traverse bill, it had undoubtedly in its progress received improvements, which reflected great credit on a noble lord (Holland). It had been observed in another place, that the noble lord was a Whig of the first distinction, but that he (lord Eldon) was no Whig at all. In the modern acceptance of the term, he was certainly not a Whig; but he nevertheless hoped he had always followed in the path marked out to him by the example of lord Somers, and those truly great men who brought about the Revolution. Not one inch would they ever go beyond the strict necessity of the case, and by the same rule would he always govern his public conduct. Referring now to the bill for regulating the press, he was ready to admit that the liberties of Englishmen had not only been sustained and supported, but in some degree obtained by the freedom with which it exercised its powers. For the same reason, it was important to take care that it should not be destroyed by the same means. Blame had been cast on a learned person who had filled an office which he himself once had the honour to hold, for not having prosecuted libels more effectually. For his own part, he did not know how that learned person could have acted with more effect. The late publications were quite a novelty in this country. When he was in office, he never heard of waggons filled with seditious papers, in order to be distributed through every village, to be scattered over the highways, to be introduced into cottages. Such things were formerly unknown; but there was now scarcely a village in the kingdom that had not its little shop in which nothing was sold but blasphemy and sedition. He understood that some persons wished a distinction to have been drawn between blasphemy and sedition; but the fact was, that one was now resorted to for the sake of the other. The publications he was adverting to were made up of seditious blasphemy, and blasphemous sedition. By no other means could a people who for fifty years had shown themselves to be the most moral and religious in the world, be seduced into a conspiracy for overthrowing the constitution of their country. It was necessary that their religion and their morals should first be undermined. He wished that they could be separated, but he feared it was impossible.

The bill was then read a second time.

NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.]
On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

Lord Erskine said, he could not suffer the bill to pass without declaring his opinion in a very few words, and putting it on the Journals by his protest. He felt as much as those who were the authors of the measure, the necessity of supporting the authority and of maintaining the dignity of parliament, but he was confident that a law so unnecessary and so inconsistent with the principles of public freedom, would produce a quite contrary effect. From the beginning of his life, he had uniformly exerted himself for the liberty of the press, having always considered the people as degraded whilst the government was contemptible and insecure, in proportion as it had been fettered; but the bill before them went beyond any attack upon it, which he ever expected to witness. What, for instance, could be said for the clause requiring recognizances, which seemed to consider every printer as a suspected and dangerous person? Could any thing but discontent and disaffection be expected to follow from such an unprecedented violation of the constitution? And after all the impolicy and injustice of this unaccountable innovation, it would be of no manner of use, as the restraints, in many ways quite obvious, might and would be invaded, as the periods of the proscribed publications, and the number of sheets in them might be altered. Lord E. concluded by saying, that he was the more earnest that such a law should be rejected by the House of Lords, as it had been hitherto respected even by those who unfortunately distrusted and libelled the other House of Parliament. To have the confidence and affection of an enlightened people was the only possible way of securing their obedience.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the bill would only affect publications sold for sixpence or less. Those, therefore, that were of a higher price, were wholly exempt from its operation. As to the objection taken by the learned lord, that sureties had only hitherto been called upon to give security against a specific act, he would beg leave to observe, that with regard to a numerous and important class of persons, he meant the publicans, the principle of calling for security for their good behaviour had been long recognized and acted upon. Nor could he discover any objection to the measure of securities required under the present bill, considering the circumstances which had rendered it necessary. It was not directed against the respectable body of booksellers and printers, but against those persons who had intruded themselves into that class, and who, having neither property, respectability, nor responsibility, it became essentially necessary to prevent the mischievous consequences, that were daily increasing, of the publications sent forth by them, to call upon them imperatively for security for their good conduct.

Lord Ellenborough agreed as to the necessity that existed for passing the present bill; a necessity arising from those mischievous publications which had been sent forth at a cheap rate to delude and deceive the lowest classes of the people. It was not against the respectable press that this bill was directed, but against a pauper press, which, administering to the prejudices and the passions of a mob, was converted to the basest purposes, which was an utter stranger to truth, and only sent forth a continual stream of falsehood and malignity, its virulence and its mischief heightening as it proceeded. If he was asked whether he would deprive the lowest classes of society of all political information? he would say, that he saw no possible good to be derived to the country from having statesmen at the loom and politicians at the spinning jenny. He differed from his learned friend in his view of this bill, considering it as imperatively called for by that mischievous abuse of the public press, those cheap publications, which were comparatively of modern date, and which had for a time derived impunity and increased in virulence and malignity, in consequence of the acquittal of Hone. The mischief arising from them in the deception and delusion practised upon the lowest classes, by means of the grossest and most malignant falsehoods, was such, that it threatened the most material injury to the best interests of the country, unless some means were devised of stemming its torrent. Conceiving that the regulations contained in this measure would have the effect of extinguishing this gross and flagrant abuse of the press, that he felt it his duty to support the bill.

The bill was passed.

PROTEST AGAINST THE NEWSPAPER STAMP DUTIES BILL.] The following protest against the passing of the bill was entered on the Journals:

“Dissentient,

“1. Because, by the stamps imposed by this bill, and by its further directing recognizances to be entered into by the printers and publishers of the pamphlets and papers therein mentioned, and in sums so large and disproportionate to the probable credit of such persons, or the profits of such small publications, it is manifest (and has, indeed, been not very indistinctly admitted), that a discouragement, amounting to almost a prohibition, is thus suddenly aimed at a very large and often useful branch of trade.

“2. Because this tacit interdict has not been justified, nor even attempted to be supported, in such a manner as the House of Lords, invested with the only certain means of arriving at truth, was, in my opinion, imperiously bound to have resorted to, before it consented to a law abridging, in any manner whatsoever, the freedom of the press.

“3. Because the great mass of British subjects have no surer means of being informed of what passes in parliament, and in the courts of justice, or of the general transactions of the world, than through cheap publications, within their means of purchase; and I desire to express my dissent from that principle and opinion, that the safety of the state, and the happiness of the multitude in the laborious conditions of life, may be best secured by their being kept in ignorance of political controversies and opinions; as I hold, on the contrary, that the government of this country can only continue to be secure whilst it conducts itself with fidelity and justice, and as all its acts shall, as heretofore, be thoroughly known and understood by all classes of the people.

“4. Because this obstruction to the sale and circulation of small periodical publications is not confined to those of a political character, but most unaccountably extends to all such as shall contain any public news, intelligence or occurrence, or any remark or observation thereon; a description which most obviously comprehends and involves all the transactions of human life upon which reasonable beings (putting national freedom wholly out of the question) can seek or desire to communicate with one another.

“5. Because it might be admitted, in perfect consistency with these objections to this bill, that considerable numbers of the publications in question may have been mischievous; but no evidence, which I can accept as satisfactory, has been laid before the House of the extent of such abuses, nor that the laws had been duly put in force to suppress them, had been found to be ineffectual or insufficient, but on the contrary, that not one information or indictment had been filed by the attorney-general throughout the whole of the year 1818, against any printer or publisher of a libel of any description whatsoever, and that in the present year following it, no person, except Richard Carlile, has been brought to trial and convicted.

" 6. Because, most earnestly as I desire to see the government of this country in all its branches, looked up to with reverence and affection, and all libellers, who maliciously asperse it, brought to speedy constitutional punishments, I am compelled, by long experience in the courts of justice, to question the expediency of any other remedies for such abuses, but a vigorous execution of the ordinary laws; since before the passing of the Libel act, when the province of juries over libels had been annihilated by judicial usurpation, the licentiousness of the press increased beyond the example of former times, until libellers lost their popularity and safety when the people were restored to the privilege of judging them, and of protecting those who were innocent.

" 7. Lastly, Because I am of opinion that the remedies enacted by this bill to repress the publications in question, will be found to be as inefficacious as they are inconsistent with the principles of the constitution; since, when the smaller printers and publishers are on a sudden thrown out of bread, by the impossibility of finding sureties for such large sums, to be levied by the alarming process of extent, and not upon any facts which such sureties can anticipate, but upon uncertain opinions regarding undefined offences, their principals may have recourse to methods of delivering themselves from the operation of the law. They may enter into larger partnerships or combinations for continuing their periodical works, by small advancements of price and changes in the periods of publication, which will probably be more eagerly sought for after the disappointed interdict, and parliament, if it pursues its object, may be driven to carry on a most unpopular siege against the press, increasing at every step the difficulties to be encountered, and conferring popularity upon a few mischievous writers, who would otherwise sink into obscurity or contempt.

(Signed) ERSKINE."

Both Houses adjourned to Tuesday the 15th of February.

DEMISE OF HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE III.] On Sunday, January 30, 1820, in pursuance of the statutes 7 and 8 William 3rd, c. 15, and 6 Anne, c. 7, which enact, that if the parliament be, at the time of the king's death, separated by adjournment or prorogation, it shall, notwithstanding, assemble immediately, both Houses met, pro formâ, and adjourned. On the following day, they again met. The oaths were administered to the Lords by Mr. Cowper, the chief clerk. The Lord High Steward attended in the long gallery, and administered the oaths of allegiance to such members of the House of Commons as were in attendance. After this, the Speaker took the chair of the House, and immediately proceeded to take the customary oaths; after which, those members who had previously taken the oaths of allegiance before the high steward, came to the table, and were re-sworn. The swearing-in of members continued until the 2nd of February, when both Houses adjourned to the 17th.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, February 17.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING.] The Earl of Liverpool presented a Message from his Majesty [See the proceedings of the Commons]. He said, that it being most desirable that the House should be unanimous in agreeing to an address to his majesty of condolence for the loss of the king, his father, and of congratulation on his present majesty's accession, which it was his intention to move immediately, he was anxious to avoid any question that might tend to produce a difference of opinion, and he should therefore move that that part of the message which related to the calling of a new parliament, and the measures to be adopted in consequence, be taken into consideration to-morrow. —This being ordered, the noble earl proceeded to move an address to his majesty. He said, he was so convinced that the feelings of all who heard him were upon this subject completely in unison with his own, that he thought it would be needlessly trespassing upon their lordships' patience to dilate upon topics which must suggest themselves to every person in the House, and the effect of which, by dwelling upon them, could only be weakened. He was most anxious, that upon such a subject the House should be unanimous, and the address had with that view been drawn up so as to afford no ground whatever for any difference of opinion, although in so doing he had not in any manner sacrificed his feelings, either public or private. He was satisfied, however, that he only echoed the sentiments of their lordships when he spoke of their late sovereign as one whose reign, for the lengthened period of 60 years, had afforded a continued bright example of all the virtues that ought to adorn a throne, and whose conduct and character during that long reign, would for ever impress upon the people of this country a grateful remembrance of his amiable qualities, whilst the glories of his reign would form a splendid portion of our history. He was satisfied that they would be equally ready to proceed to the foot of the throne to declare their attachment to his present majesty, during the sovereignty of whose illustrious house the country had derived so many advantages. Under these impressions, and satisfied as he was, that any thing he could say would only tend to weaken the effect of what all their lordships must feel, he should at once conclude by moving the address. His lordship then moved an address similar to that moved in the House of Commons.

The Marquis of Lansdowne was convinced, that there must be a most anxious desire in their lordships to proceed in the manner which the noble earl had pointed out. The deep sense which the House entertained of the great virtues of his late majesty left no doubt of their concurrence in the expressions of condolence contained in the address. It was his hope that that good understanding which it was most desirable should subsist between the Crown and the parliament would always continue; and therefore their lordships might be expected to join in the confidence expressed by the noble earl. For his part, he readily concurred in the address, because it went no farther than the occasion required, and pledged the House to nothing but that to which all must be prepared to agree.

The Marquis of Buckingham was sensible, that if all the noble lords who were anxious to manifest their concurrence in the address should rise to express that disposition, it could only be voted when all had delivered their sentiments. If, however, he made any claim to their indulgence while he expressed sentiments in which all their lordships participated, he must confess that that claim was one of a selfish nature; for those with whom he was connected had been honoured with great marks of royal favour by their late lamented sovereign. He hoped, therefore, that he should be excused, if he took that opportunity of giving vent to the feelings of gratitude with which he was impressed. It had often been said, that the favours conferred by sovereigns were soon overlooked. This, however, had not been the case in the present instance. Our late gracious sovereign, notwithstanding the estrangement from his people, caused by the inscrutable act of Providence, continued to live in the hearts of his subjects, remembering, as they did, all those virtues by the exercise of which he had so adorned his throne. It was in this manner that our late gracious monarch had forestalled the applauses of posterity; for in the long interval that had elapsed whilst the veil was interposed between him and his people, his virtues had become the theme of their veneration, and had received the final seal of their admiration and respect.

The Earl of Darnley said, it was the farthest from his wish to interrupt that unanimity which he had no doubt would prevail upon this occasion; but there appeared to him to be an omission, which, if he was irregular in noticing, he should, no doubt, be told so. He alluded to the circumstance of there being no condolence included in the address, with regard to the death of the duke of Kent.

The Earl of Liverpool said, it was undoubtedly his intention to move an address of condolence to his majesty on the lamented death of the duke of Kent, and also to the duchess of Kent; but he thought it better that the address he had already moved should stand as the single proceeding of this night.

The address was then agreed to am. diss., and was ordered to be presented to his majesty by the Lords with white staves. The earl of Liverpool observed, that his majesty's state of health not allowing him to receive the whole House, was the reason for adopting the above mode of presenting the address.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, February 17.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING.] Lord Castlereagh presented the following Message from the King:

“GEORGE R.

“The King is persuaded that the House of Commons deeply participates in the grief and affliction of his Majesty for the loss which his Majesty and the nation have sustained by the lamented death of the late King his father.

“ This melancholy event imposing upon his Majesty the necessity of summoning, within a limited period, a new Parliament, the King has taken into consideration the present state of public business, and is of opinion, that it will be in all respects most conducive to the public interests and convenience to call the new Parliament without delay.

“ The King, therefore, recommends to the House of Commons to adopt such measures as may be found indispensably necessary to provide for the exigencies of the public service during the interval which must elapse between the termination of the present session and the opening of a new Parliament. G. R.”

Lord Castlereagh said, he should move that it be taken into consideration tomorrow. He thought it necessary that members should have a day to consider one part of it, but he hoped the House would feel that there ought to be no delay in replying to another part—he meant that which referred to the death of his late majesty. In rising to propose an address of condolence to his majesty, the House would feel that it was not necessary or desirable for him to go into lengthened details; and he hoped that, from the few observations which he had to make nothing would arise to prevent their coming to an unanimous decision on the present melancholy occasion. They would, he was persuaded, all join in the same sentiments of affliction and reverence for the loss of their late beloved monarch. Whatever might be the opinions respecting the events of the late reign, and of the administration of government under his present majesty, there could, he was certain, be no difference as to this point—that under the illustrious House of Brunswick this country had enjoyed a greater share of happiness and glory than had fallen to the lot of any other nation on the face of the globe. The House, he was sure, were anxious to testify their deep affliction at the loss of a monarch, who, in the course of a long reign, during periods of great trial, had, by his mild and amiable qualities, secured the love and esteem of the nation. Indeed, the veneration in which our late beloved monarch was held, and the general attachment to him by all ranks and classes, were visible at every period of his glorious reign, but more particularly on those melancholy occasions when he was prevented from superintending in person the interests of his people. In the unusually long period of his reign, this country had grown up to rank, power, and commercial splendor, unequalled among the nations of the earth. With these feelings as to the character of the late reign, there would not, he was certain, be any differences as to the address of condolence which he meant to propose. There was another subject to which he should also call the attention of the House, it was the accession of his present majesty. To his reign he looked forward with the most sanguine hopes for the prosperity of the nation; and when he looked to the past, he had the best guarantee to hope from the future. Indeed, after the declaration made by his majesty on his accession, that he would make the example of his royal father the basis of his conduct, the country had to hope for a prosperous reign. In conclusion, his lordship trusted, that his majesty's reign would be long, and happy for himself and the country; and that though he might not have to achieve any additional glories in war, he would add the only remaining laurel to his brow, by looking, in peace, to policy, justice, and moderation in the administration of his government. His lordship then moved, “ That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to convey to his majesty the expression of the deep affliction in which we have been involved by the death of the late king; a monarch, whose virtues had so long afforded the brightest example, and who had so long reigned in the hearts of his faithful people: To assure his majesty we shall never cease to cherish in our memories the recollection of the many blessings which we have enjoyed under the mild and paternal government of his royal father; during whose long and eventful reign the country has made so great advances in arts and industry, in commercial opulence and national power, and has derived so large an accession of glory from the splendid achievements of his majesty's fleets and armies: To add to these expressions of regret and condolence, on this common calamity, our most sincere congratulations upon his majesty's accession to the throne of his ancestors: To convey to his majesty the dutiful assurance of our loyal and affectionate attachment to his sacred person, and to entreat him to believe that we derive from the experience of the past, as well as from our confidence in his majesty's character and virtues, the firm conviction that his reign will be marked by a constant endeavour to promote the general prosperity and happiness of his people."

Mr. Tierney said, that no man could be more sensible than himself of the virtues of their late revered and lamented sovereign—virtues too numerous to be then detailed. Nor could any man be more sincere than himself in congratulating his present majesty on his accession. No man could feel a greater personal respect for his majesty than himself. No man could be more earnest in his hopes that his majesty's reign might be long and prosperous. No man could exceed him in zealous wishes that that reign might be productive of equal honour and advantage to his majesty and to the country. Undoubtedly there was one expression in the address which he thought had better have been omitted. He adverted to that passage which spoke of "the experience of the past." On all the past he wished to turn his back. He wished to bury it in oblivion. A new reign was commencing, and he most anxiously hoped that his majesty would adopt such measures—that his ministers would advise such measures, as would conduce to his majesty's own character, honour, and dignity, and to the general benefit of the country.

The address was agreed to, nem. con. and it was ordered, that in consideration of his majesty's indisposition, the said address be presented by such members of the House as were of the privy council. It was then resolved, nem. con. 1. "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to condole with his majesty on the loss which his majesty has sustained by the calamitous and untimely death of his royal brother the late duke of Kent. 2. That this House do condole with her royal highness the duchess of Kent, on the calamitous and untimely death of his late royal highness the duke of Kent."—Similar addresses were, on the following day, agreed to in the House of Lords.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, February 18.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the order of the day for taking into consideration his majesty's message. The message having been read,

The Earl of Liverpool said, if he had had any doubt on the preceding day as to the propriety of separating the question as to the calling a new parliament without delay, from the subject of addressing the king in condolence on the death of the late sovereign, that doubt would have been entirely removed by the remark made by the noble marquis, that such an intimation was entirely unprecedented. It was undoubtedly true that it was unprecedented, but it should be recollected that the situation in which they were placed was also unprecedented. It was not the case of the transfer of the Crown and all the administration of the government at once to a successor, but here the illustrious individual on the throne had administered the government for a considerable time, and was now called upon to do that in his own name and behalf, which he had hitherto done in the name and on the behalf of the late king. With regard to the question of dissolving the parliament, according to the common law of the land, the parliament ceased its functions on the demise of the Crown, and the act which passed for enabling the parliament to sit for six months afterwards, might be called an exception to that law. With regard to the motive for passing that act, it appeared to have been intended to provide against a disputed succession. But undoubtedly the act did not fetter the monarch, in the exercise of his prerogative, who might at once, if he pleased, exercise that prerogative by dissolving the parliament; it was merely a question as to the public interest or convenience. It was true, that with regard to the civil list, it had been usual for the parliament sitting at the demise of the Crown, to pass a measure for arranging the civil list; but this, which was a proper compliment to the Crown, there was no necessity to bring forward, when the Crown itself, as in the present instance, waived the immediate consideration of it. This, therefore, being put aside for the present, at the instance of the Crown, it must be obvious to every one, that there were circumstances connected with the knowledge that a new parliament must be called within a certain period, that rendered it inconvenient to proceed to any public business that was not absolutely necessary. These circumstances were matter of notoriety; and it was evident that it would be more for the public interest and convenience that the measures necessary to be brought forward should be presented to a parliament uninfluenced by such circumstances, and with their attention not distracted by considerations arising out of the contemplation of the near approach of the summoning a new parliament, and the preparations and arrangements necessarily consequent upon it. His lordship concluded by moving an address to his majesty, which was an echo of the message.

The Marquis of Lansdowne expressed his surprise that the noble earl had not afforded any explanation as to the reasons or the motives for the sudden dissolution of the parliament. He believed it to be contrary to all precedent for the Crown to put to the consideration of parliament the question as to its own dissolution. It was undoubtedly true, that the king, in the exercise of his prerogative, might dissolve the parliament at the moment of its meeting on his accession; but when the question of a dissolution was put to parliament itself, they might, with perfect propriety, consider what had been the practice upon similar occasions; and when it was urged as a reason for now dissolving the parliament, that it would be for the public interest and convenience, it might be fairly answered, and this too on the authority of the noble earl himself, that the present was the most convenient period for entering upon the consideration of public business. When, however, this plea of convenience was urged, it would be found, upon looking back to the periods of the accession of our sovereigns, since the reign of William 3rd, when the act was passed, authorizing the parliament to continue sitting six months after the demise of the Crown, that at periods much more inconvenient than the present, parliament had continued sitting, and had, before their separation, uniformly passed the civil list bill. Thus, on the accession of queen Anne, in March, on that of George 1st, in August, of George 2nd, in June, and the late king in October, the parliament in each case continued sitting, and passed the civil list bill within a short period of the meeting. Why these precedents were to be departed from, the noble earl had not explained. Neither had he explained how the public service was to be provided for in the interval, or how the dignity of the Crown was to be provided for, the civil list bill having now expired. There was another consideration also of great importance; he alluded to the increase of the military force of the country, to the amount of 10,000 men. Agreeing, as he did, in the necessity for this addition to our military force, he considered it of the greatest importance, in a constitutional point of view, that the parliament should have an opportunity of taking into consideration such increase. Was it intended that only a short mutiny bill should be brought in, which would not afford any opportunity of considering the amount of the force? As he had been unable to discover any reason why the precedent in former cases should be in this instance departed from, he could not give his vote for the address.

The Earl of Harrowby observed, that it must be, in his opinion, obvious, that with all the preparations and arrangements that were making, with a view to a dissolution of parliament, which it was known must take place within a certain period, it was impossible for the members of the other House to pay that attention which was requisite to the measures to be proposed to them. As to any difficulty in providing for the public service in the interim, the course to be pursued was intended to be the same as in 1807 and in 1784, when a dissolution took place about the same period; and with regard to providing for the dignity of the Crown, though there might perhaps be some slight difficulty, yet it might readily be done by a vote of credit out of the remaining hereditary revenues of the Crown.

Earl Grosvenor contended, that there was time enough to complete any measures that might be necessary, without dissolving the parliament, and objected strongly to the continuance of so large a standing army in time of peace. Was it for a purpose which ministers could not avow—was it to support themselves in administration, that this extraordinary burthen was to be continued in the present distressed condition of the country?

The Earl of Lauderdale thought that great inconvenience would be found to attend the immediate dissolution of parliament. With respect to the consideration of the civil list, he thought it would be better that it should be arranged by parliament, instead of being submitted to the public—as it was, in effect, by being postponed until the general election had taken place. The House would recollect, that there were such things as instructions from constituents to their representatives, and that he thought should have suggested itself to the noble lords as one of the inconveniences attendant upon the course which they recommended. It had been said, that the civil list was to be provided for out of the hereditary revenues. But they would find, by the consolidated fund act, that the hereditary revenues were appropriated to make up the deficiencies of that fund, in the event of the king's demise.

The Earl of Caernarvon said, his noble friend had shown, that if it was convenient at any time to continue the sitting of parliament, it was convenient now. But then it was objected, that members of parliament would have so much of their own business to attend to, they would neglect the business of their constituents. For his own part, he should have drawn a contrary conclusion. If there was any period when members of parliament attended more particularly to the business of their constituents than another, it was when they were about to be dissolved. In the present condition of the country, a strong ground should be made out to justify an immediate dissolution; and he had no hesitation in saying, that those who could give such advice without such a ground, had not done their duty either to the king or to the country.

Earl Bathurst observed, that the whole business of the session was yet to be done, and contended that it would be impossible to get through it in time to prepare for a dissolution at the end of six months. With regard to the precedents alluded to, he would have their lordships to consider in what state the public business was on those different occasions. In those cases, there was no necessity for adopting the course which, under the present circumstances, appeared expedient. Besides, since the death of his late majesty, there had been more excitation throughout the country, on the prospect of the new elections, than probably existed at any former period. Perhaps there was not an instance known before, in which the same paper that communicated the death of the king contained an advertisement from a candidate for the representation of a county.

Lord King said, that the immediate dissolution would bring them to May before the new parliament could meet, and he would leave it to the House to consider to what time the session must extend in that case. It was true that they had a balance of convenience and inconvenience to decide upon, but then there was uniform practice on one side, and that practice was, that after the demise of the king, parliament should proceed, with a little delay as possible, to the arrangement of the civil list. By dissolving now, they would leave the Crown without a civil list.

The Lord Chancellor said, that according to the law of parliament in former times, on the demise of the Crown, the parliament was ipso facto dissolved. He did not mean to say that it was not right for parliament to have extended its own existence for six months after the demise of the king, as was done by the act of William 3rd. His notion was, that the enactment was properly made, with a view to the public interest; but by that act it was not determined that the parliament should necessarily exist for six months after the demise—it was still left open to consideration: how far the public convenience required that it should continue so to exist or not. If, on the other hand, they thwarted the purpose of dissolving parliament, by going on with business when the public convenience did not require it, they were the persons who took upon themselves to say that the Crown should not dissolve the parliament. If they threw obstacles in the way of the dissolution, they took upon themselves the authority of deciding the question; and therefore he would vote with his noble friends, not with a view to break in upon the prerogative of the Crown, but to prevent the prerogative from being interfered with.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, February 18.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING.] The order of the day for taking into consideration his Majesty's Message having been read,

Lord Castlereagh observed, that in rising to move an Address to his Majesty, it might be for the convenience of the House to state, what course it was the intention of ministers to propose. It was well known, that although before the late recess various bills had been agreed to, applicable to the then state of the country, the great mass of the public business of the session had not been entered upon. Under those circumstances, it became indispensable for his majesty's ministers to consider what course it would be most expedient to advise. There were only two courses which could be pursued—either to endeavour to go through the whole of the business, by extending the present session to the utmost length which the law would allow, or to call a new parliament. The House would see that many inconveniences would attend the former of those courses. It would, in all probability be scarcely practicable to complete all the parliamentary business within the prescribed period, and to select those topics to which the especial attention of parliament should be directed, would be a difficult and an invidious task. Any measure not completed by the natural close of the session, would not stand so advantageously with reference to a new parliament, as if absolutely commenced in that parliament. The House would also, he was persuaded, go along with ministers in their conviction, that nothing could be less desirable, with reference to the public morals, and he would even add, to the public tranquillity, than to leave the country for many months subject to all the excitation and passions which the approach of a general election tended to generate. Weighing the alternative presented to them, ministers had decided in favour of a new parliament. It appeared to them, therefore, that the only sound proceeding was, to endeavour to confine the measures to be proposed in the present parliament as much as possible to those which were indispensable to the public service. He was perfectly aware, that it had been the usage on similar occasions, on the first meeting of parliament after the demise of the Crown, to make provision for a great proportion of the civil establishment of the country. It certainly was the wish of his majesty's government that this subject should be satisfactorily arranged. But, on the other hand, it would require much time to prepare the proposition which it was their intention to submit to parliament on the subject; and it was also extremely desirable that that proposition should be adequately considered by the House, with calm minds and a full attendance; all which it was hopeless to expect during the existence of the present parliament. On all these grounds, therefore, ministers had decided on advising the Crown to call a new parliament with as little delay as possible. He would now state to the House the particular business which ministers meant to propose for the consideration of the present parliament. With respect to private business, the House was aware of the course that had been pursued on former dissolutions—namely, to make such an arrangement as would place private business in the new parliament in the same situation as that in which it had been left in the old. As to public business, it was the wish of government that the new parliament should be placed in a situation the most calculated to be advantageous to the public service. It was not proposed to vote any additional sum for army services during the present session. Enough had already been granted to cover the expenditure in the interval that would elapse before the meeting of the new parliament. It was intended to propose the continuance of the Mutiny bill to the 25th of June, as well as of several other bills that would otherwise expire. It was probable that the House would arrive at the close of its labours by the end of the present month. If so, the new parliament might assemble by the 25th of April, when the business of the year would be immediately entered into. The noble lord concluded by moving an Address to his majesty, which was an echo of the Message.

Mr. Tierney declared, that the whole of the proceeding was the most extraordinary he had ever heard of. He did not believe that there had ever been an accession to the Crown without some communication to parliament of a nature very different from that which had been made in the present instance. It had always been usual to say something of the feelings of the new monarch, and of the course of policy which it was his intention to pursue. In the present case, the House had only been drily told, that his majesty's government found it convenient to send them about their business as soon as possible. It was true, it might be said, that on former occasions of the demise of the Crown, parliament was in a state of prorogation; and that there was, therefore, greater scope for observations of the nature to which he alluded, in the speech from the Throne, on its assembling. But on such an occasion as the present, there would have been no irregularity in summoning the House of Commons to attend in the other House of Parliament, for the purpose of hearing the royal sentiments.

He must observe, without meaning to say any thing offensive, that the omission of all such communication was very indecorous. In all former cases, on the accession of a new monarch to the throne, he expressed to the House his confidence that they would make good the hereditary revenues of the Crown. This operated in two ways. It recognized the power of parliament to vote those revenues or not. It was highly important that it should not be taken for granted, that those revenues were not under the control of parliament. It was true that some of them were so. But what were generally called the hereditary revenues of the Crown, expired on the demise of the Crown, and could not be legally collected without a new act of parliament. Could any man doubt that there was something at the bottom of all this extraordinary proceeding, not hitherto explained? What it was he knew not; but he was sure that no administration would wantonly, and without cause, depart from that which was the ordinary course on such occasions. He was sure that there was some reason why the civil list was not voted at once, as was usual. The noble lord, indeed, talked of the time which the proposed arrangements would require. That appeared very extraordinary, when it was recollected, that the subject had been settled within the last four or five years. At that period a very able and voluminous report was presented with reference to it; it was arranged on the suggestion of ministers themselves; and now the House were told of the time requisite to make the future arrangements on the subject. He was utterly at a loss to discover where would be the difficulty of bringing a bill at once to state the proposed amount of the civil list. Nor could he comprehend the object of immediately dissolving parliament. All that the noble lord had said was, that it would be inconvenient not to dissolve parliament immediately. The noble lord's notion of the convenient period for the laborious business of the year was, that it should commence in May—a season not very long preceding that at which most hon. gentlemen were in the habit of going into the country, and thereby rendering the proceedings of parliament a dead letter. Formerly it had been thought, that the heavy business should not be deferred until after Easter; now it turned out, that it was convenient that it should not begin until long after that period! The occurrence of the assizes was another circumstance, which must render a dissolution at the present moment extremely inconvenient. With respect to the dissolution, he was as desirous as any man to get, as speedily as possible, through all the difficulties and annoyances which an election occasioned. But he had duties to perform in that House, which he was bound not to neglect; and he could not, therefore, concur in the Address proposed. From what had fallen from the noble lord, it did not appear that it was intended to ask the present parliament for any farther grant. [The chancellor of the exchequer said, that he intended to propose a grant for the payment of the civil list up to the 5th April, at the present rate.] According to the statement made by the noble lord, the new parliament would not be assembled by the 5th of April. It was certain, therefore, that there would be a period during which the Crown would have no maintenance whatever, that the House knew of. All this appeared to him to be wholly unnecessary. Why not at once vote a specific sum for the civil list of George 4th? Why depart from the established usage? It was unaccountable; something or other was at the bottom of the business, hitherto unexplained. He knew, however, that it was in vain for him to urge this argument; the heads of the members, he knew, were more in the country than in town. They were thinking of cockades, and hustings, and returning officers. As to the measures proposed by the noble lord, if the propriety of an immediate dissolution were once acquiesced in, to those particular measures he could have no objection. He must make one exception. In an early part of the session, in consequence of the disturbed state of the country, parliament voted an additional military force of 11,000 men. All alarm, he apprehended, was now dissipated. Why, therefore, keep up this additional military force of 11,000 men to the 25th of June?

Lord Castlereagh assured the right hon. gentleman, that he had no other purpose in the propositions which he had submitted to the House, than that which he had distinctly avowed. It did not appear to his majesty's government, that the various topics to which he had alluded, could be so conveniently discussed by the present as by a new parliament. It must quiet any constitutional jealousy on the subject to observe, that the vote which his right hon. friend intended to propose was, merely to prevent any arrear in the interval between the dissolution of the present and the meeting of the next parliament. As to the hereditary revenues of the Crown, those which were strictly hereditary were so inconsiderable, that no rational difficulty could be contemplated in making a parliamentary arrangement with respect to them. There could not be the smallest doubt that the House would be disposed to act with respect to those revenues as formerly. He could assure the right hon. gentleman, that he did ministers great injustice, if he supposed that they entertained any distrust of the present parliament on that subject. For himself, he never knew a parliament to whom he was persuaded might be more safely confided the duty of making such an arrangement with respect to the revenue of the Crown, as should evince at once a becoming economy, and a disposition to prevent placing the Crown in such a situation as would endanger the incurring of debt. At the same time, his majesty's government claimed the opportunity of a full deliberation on the subject, before they submitted it in its details to the judgment of parliament; and it was therefore that it was proposed to postpone it until the meeting of the new parliament.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed, that the Crown was at this moment without any other revenue than that portion of the hereditary revenue which belonged to the civil list, amounting to between 500,000*l.* and 600,000*l.* He would on Monday move that one quarter's revenue of the civil list, at its present rate, which would become due on the 5th of April, should be paid; this would carry on the royal establishment up to the 5th of July, before which time, the necessary steps would be taken by the new parliament. By this means all inconvenience would be avoided. In the arrangements to be adopted, a considerable saving would be made.

Mr. Hume said, that by the 54th Geo. 3rd, chap. 16, a sum of 35,000*l.* was settled upon the late Princess of Wales, now our Queen. On the demise of his late majesty this grant ceased; he asked, therefore, whether this provision was to be continued, or whether any and what other was to be substituted in its stead?

Lord Castlereagh said, that every pains would be taken to prevent any inconvenience arising in the quarter alluded to, from the dissolution of parliament.

Mr. Brougham could not help expressing his surprise at the extraordinary nature of the proceedings adopted by ministers. With respect to the subject alluded to by the hon. member who had just sat down, it was not then his intention to offer a word upon it. This was the first message which so precisely and so specifically pointed out the dissolution of parliament. Whenever parliament interfered with the prerogative of the Crown, they were told by ministers that they were not competent to entertain the subject of the termination of their existence as a body—that the Crown alone was to decide upon it. Without meaning to deny the right of the people to control ministers in the advice which they gave the Crown as to the exercise of its prerogative, he could not help noticing the strange position in which parliament was placed. They were called upon to give an opinion whether the proposed dissolution was a well advised measure or not. Thus called upon, it was no wonder that they should enter upon the discussion. For himself he was as little averse to an immediate dissolution of parliament as the noble lord, or any of his colleagues could be. He had, however, one remark to make upon this advice given to the Crown; he presumed that ministers had maturely weighed the inconvenience to which the country would be put by having the election come on in the middle of the assizes. On the former dissolution of parliament the term was postponed, but it could not be done in the present instance. The next point to which he should refer, was more material. He could not help congratulating the House upon the admission which had been, though slowly, wrung from ministers. Not long since they were told, that so great was the alarm in the public mind—so inherent was vice in the country—so great was the number of discontented and designing persons, who were plotting the subversion of the constitution—that it was found necessary to call upon parliament to pass the most harsh and restrictive measures, in order to put down the turbulence of the country. But now the fact was, that one of these restrictive measures expired with the parliament, and as ministers did not exercise their discretion in proposing its renewal, it showed that the necessity for it had ceased, or else they were about to plunge the country into a situation which not many weeks since was said to be inconsistent with its safety. There was another point to which he wished to advert. Every one who heard the luminous speech of the noble lord—luminous, not because it enabled them to understand the reasons contained in it, but because it was so transparent that every one could see through it—must perceive what was the real motive for postponing the discussion of the civil list at present; it was, because it was thought more handy, to bring it under the consideration of a new parliament, than before a parliament which was on its death-bed—before a parliament that could not sit more than six months, but which might be dissolved the day after it had voted the civil list. This was his decided conviction. For himself he had no objection to the dissolution, as he thought frequent parliaments were beneficial and refreshing to the constitution; yet he felt it his duty to point out the motives by which those who advised the measure were actuated.

Mr. Canning said, he could assure the House, that the civil list would be arranged with every view to economy, and a proper attention to the dignity of the Crown. The hon. and learned member had taken a constitutional objection to the discussion of the dissolution of parliament, observing, that nothing of the kind had been previously done.—That hon. member ought to recollect, that parliament had on a former occasion presented an Address, praying that the Crown might not interfere with its operations by dissolution. What was to prevent the House from now entertaining such a question he was yet to learn. It was argued also, that a prorogation was the old wholesome law of the constitution. But the law was the other way. The old practice was, that parliament died immediately on the demise of the Crown; and it was by recent enactments that a sort of period of grace was extended, and parliament allowed to sit six months after such demise, the power still remaining in the king to dissolve at pleasure. This enactment was made in the reign of king William, and the specific ground for it was, that at that time there was a disputed succession, and it would have been inconvenient that parliament should be instantaneously separated. This act was made permanent in the reign of queen Anne, when a foreign succession was again contemplated. It was an act which was analogous to, and by no means opposed to the spirit of the constitution. In the reign of George 1st, and the two following reigns, the revenues of the Crown were settled before parliament was dissolved; but the gentlemen on the other side themselves acknowledged that those cases were not analogous to the present. Let them look at the state in which parliament was at the period when the late melancholy event took place. They had before them a variety of business which it was hopeless to expect could be dispatched within any reasonable time. The country, from whatever source, were told that a dissolution of parliament was about to take place. If he were to name the individual who had been the first to sound the alarm of dissolution, the House would perceive that the hon. and learned gentleman ought to be the last man to cast an imputation of precipitancy upon ministers. He felt convinced that the House would see that ministers had given that advice which was calculated to advance the best interests of the country.

Mr. Macdonald said, it was singular, that though ministers confessed that there was a series of precedents before them, they should think it necessary to deviate from them without assigning a reason for their conduct. It was admitted that all the kings of England since the Revolution, had felt it necessary to throw themselves upon parliament for a suitable provision to support their dignity, nor was there any instance where the people did not ratify and approve of the conduct of their representatives on such occasions. The present was the first time that the civil list was not noticed in the message from the Crown. Was it that the present parliament, which had gone so far with government, were not to be trusted? or was it that the loyal and generous people of this country would feel displeased at making a suitable provision for the Crown? It was said that economy would be looked to in providing for the civil list; but it was known how little value was to be set upon such statements. The impression upon his mind was, that there was something in agitation, which, if brought forward now, would not bear the test of a general election.

The question was put and carried.

GRAMPOUND, PENRYN AND CAMELFORD.] Lord John Russell said, that in bringing forward his motion with regard to those boroughs in which bribery had been proved to exist, he should not detain the House more than a few minutes. Provision was, he understood, to be made for the civil list, and also for the further continuance of those acts which would otherwise expire with the present parliament; he thought, therefore, it was necessary that parliament should also provide for the preservation of its own dignity and character. They ought to look with a jealous eye at any attempt to invade their privileges. In furtherance of this he intended to propose, that the writs for the boroughs of Grampound, Penryn and Camelford should be postponed to the meeting of the next parliament. For this there was a precedent in 15 Geo. 3, chap. 20. The borough of Shaftesbury having been convicted of bribery and corruption, the writ had been postponed from time to time, and at length it was postponed to the meeting of parliament after a prorogation. He proposed that this principle should extend to the dissolution, which, in his opinion, was analogous to a prorogation. In the case of an impeachment, Mr. Fox was of opinion that a dissolution did not operate otherwise than a prorogation of parliament did; with this difference only, that the former gave men a better opportunity of reviewing their opinions. Viewing the case in this light, he felt that there was no impropriety in bringing the present bill before the House. There was one borough (Barnstaple) which he wished to exclude, as proceedings had already been instituted with respect to it. He should, therefore, move for leave to bring in a bill to prevent the issuing of writs for the boroughs of Grampound, Penryn and Camelford, until the meeting of the next parliament.

Lord Castlereagh agreed in the principle of the bill, but suggested that it was likely, in the event of the bill going to the Lords, they would call for the information upon which the Commons had acted.

Mr. Wynn was of opinion, that Barnstaple ought to be included in this bill. Ample evidence had been given at the bar, of the existence of bribery in that borough, and the other House was proceeding upon a similar inquiry, when their proceedings were put an end to by the prorogation of parliament. No one could deny the plenitude of the authority of parliament, on this as on other subjects. But it would certainly embarrass the proceedings if members were returned for these boroughs at the ensuing elections. It might then be objected, that though they had once fallen into acts of corruption, they had, in this instance, elected members without having been guilty of similar practices, and that therefore it was no more rational for the House to recall the former offences of these boroughs than of any others. However corrupt in principle and practice these boroughs might be, it could not be doubted, that under the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed, they would abstain from open corruption. It would also afford an instance of practical inconsistency, if, while they in a future parliament proceeded to disfranchise these boroughs as radically corrupt, they allowed the individuals who might have been elected for the boroughs to sit to the end of that parliament. He allowed that the case of the borough of Shaftesbury was different in form, but it was equally an interference with the common course of law with the bill which was now proposed. It was as imperative in any case of vacancy during a prorogation, on the Speaker to issue his writ, as on the lord chancellor to issue his writ to the sheriff to direct his precept to the boroughs after a dissolution. If bribery had been practised in these boroughs to the extent to which they had reason to believe it had, it was imperative on the House to take such measures that the dissolution of the present parliament would not prejudice its inquiries, and to refuse to concur in certain bills till they had a reasonable security on a matter so closely affecting its privileges. The noble lord had very properly alluded to the case of impeachment as a parallel case; and as a dissolution was held not to affect a measure of that kind; so it should not affect proceedings of equal constitutional importance. He should therefore give his hearty support to the bill. It was advisable to show by such a measure, that there was a power in the constitution to meet any emergency.

Lord J. Russell said, that he had no objection to include Barnstaple in the bill.

Leave was given.

THE KING'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.] Lord Jocelyn reported the King's Answer to the Address, as follows:

"GEORGE R.

"I receive with the truest satisfaction, the loyal, dutiful, and affectionate Address, which the House of Commons has presented to me on the late heavy loss which I have sustained, and upon my accession to the throne. The House of Commons may rest assured, that the whole object of my reign will be to preserve the liberties, and to promote the happiness of my people.

G. R."

Monday, February 21.

DROITS OF ADMIRALTY, &c.] Mr. Brougham said, that early in the session of 1812, he had moved for a return of the amount and application of the different monies received by the Crown, which were not under the immediate control of parliament. This was at all times a matter of great importance, but it was more particularly so at a period like the present, when new arrangements for the support of the royal dignity were about to be entered into. The funds to which he alluded were important, as they involved a considerable variety of influence and management. When he made the motion to which he had alluded, he was answered, that arrangements having been made by parliament for supporting the civil list, it would be improper to enter into such an inquiry, as it would be a breach of the terms agreed upon. But it was admitted at the same time, that such an inquiry might be made on the demise of the Crown. He had felt the full force of this objection. But now he conceived the period was arrived when such a motion ought to be made. Those funds had arisen to such an amount that they ought to be settled on a permanent and constitutional footing. He should therefore move for, "An account of the total produce of all funds at the disposal of the Crown, and usually deemed not to be under the immediate control of parliament, since the accession of his late majesty, distinguishing the monies arising from droits of Admiralty and droits of the Crown,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent West India duties, Scotch revenue, and those from all other such sources not hereinbefore specified.—Ordered.

Lord Palmerston brought in a bill for continuing the Mutiny Act, from the 24th of April to the 24th of June. After a short conversation, the bill was read a first and second time.

WRITS SUSPENSION BILL.] Lord J.

Russel moved the order of the day for the second reading of the bill for suspending the issuing of writs for Grampound, Penryn, Barnstaple, and Camelford.

Sir C. Burrell thanked lord Castlereagh for his liberal conduct hitherto on this Bill, and hoped that he would endeavour to secure its final success by using his influence with his friends in another place [Order! and Hear!] so that it might not fall to the ground after it had passed that House.

Mr. Calcraft said, he had never heard any thing much more disorderly than the allusion of the hon. baronet; but even if that suggestion were attended to, he thought it quite impossible that the bill could pass into a law. It was because he was in earnest, in support of the measures which this bill professedly furthered, that he did not wish the House to be so misled, as to suppose that any assembly could pass a bill condemning four boroughs, while in the case of one only they had any evidence. It was only in the case of Barnstaple that the House of Lords had any evidence. He wished to see the writs suspended till the circumstances which had appeared to criminate these boroughs could be inquired into, and he therefore wished the House to proceed by address, which was, in his opinion, the true parliamentary course. According to the present mode of proceeding, the House was at the mercy, not only of the Crown, but of the other House of Parliament. He contended, that the issuing and suspending of writs should depend on the House alone, and upon this doctrine the House had hitherto acted.

Mr. Wynn said, that the proceeding by way of address would go to the overthrow of the constitution, by putting the whole elective franchise into the hands of the Crown. The address of the House could not confer on the Crown a power not before possessed; it could only call on the Crown to exercise a power already existing. It would, therefore, recognise that the Crown could, at its own will and pleasure, put an end to the elective rights of any portion of the electors of the kingdom. This proposal was not, indeed, without precedent, for he had heard of a plan of reform, promulgated under the high authority of the Hampden Club, by which the king was to be begged, as the simplest and best plan of reform, to abstain from sending writs to certain boroughs, and to send writs to other places

It was extraordinary, indeed, that this doctrine should have been promulgated under the name of Hampden. Such a power was, indeed, formerly claimed by the Crown, but the matter was taken up by the House of Commons, and it was declared that the writs might be demanded by those boroughs as writs of right. Writs were accordingly sent to some places from which they had been withheld, and for one of these places, Wendover, John Hampden was first returned to parliament. He was ready to go as far as any man in defence of the privileges of parliament, but he thought they were most safe when confined within legal bounds. He should not be willing to disfranchise these boroughs without hearing the fullest evidence; but he conceived the Lords had sufficient evidence to say that the Commons having proved bribery to have existed in those boroughs, and being desirous of taking measures to regulate the elections in future, they would suspend the issuing of writs for this time. To proceed by the authority of the two Houses of Parliament and of the Crown was the only legal course, and he should therefore support the bill.

Mr. Marryat said, the bill required serious consideration. The House had not all the evidence before them on the different cases. Besides, there were in the different cases various shades of criminality. Two of their own members also (Mr. Swann and sir M. Lopez) had been severely visited, as well as several voters of two of the boroughs. Was it likely that these persons, after the warning they had had, would again commit the crime for which they had suffered? Indeed, if he were asked where he should expect to find the greatest purity and independence in the elections throughout the country, he should naturally lay his hand on those boroughs. There was such a difference also in the evidence before the Lords and that before the Commons, respecting Barnstaple, that the difficulty concerning that case was much increased.

Mr. Brougham said, that his doubts as to the expediency of passing the bill were founded on his sense of the great importance of the measure ultimately in view. They were not in those circumstances, or in that period of the session, when they could enter into the consideration of a change in the representation with advantage or effect. The change now proposed was no less than to extinguish the franchises of four boroughs, and to transfer them to other unrepresented places. Though neither of these objects was directly affected by the bill, it would distinctly recognize the principle, that though there was not evidence to disfranchise the boroughs for ever, yet on a prima facie case they might suspend the franchises. It might be proper to legislate on this business hereafter, when they had time to view the question in all its complicated bearings, but it seemed strange to say that they had evidence to deprive a borough of its franchise pro hac vice, and not for ever. The circumstances of the representation of these boroughs being filled up, could not operate as a bar to legislation on the subject; and it would be better indeed, constitutionally, that the question of the disfranchisement of these boroughs should be discussed when their members, who might be supposed to act as their attorneys, were present. As to the proposal of proceeding by address to the Crown, it had been satisfactorily disposed of. If indeed the Crown could disfranchise four, it might disfranchise 44 or 100 boroughs; and he did not see why, if this power were recognized, it might not also extend to counties or universities, so that the very existence of the House of Commons would be at the mercy of the Crown. The only course of proceeding therefore was by bill. He felt unwilling to conclude without stating his feelings, respecting those who were suffering under, perhaps just, but certainly not lenient sentences, for offences committed in these boroughs. When they considered that these offences were not solitary, when every member of the House must necessarily have been acquainted with so many unconvicted offenders of the same description, he felt that the sentence of two years imprisonment, coupled with a very heavy fine, was severe. He did not know the individual so punished even by sight; he had never spoken, or had any communication with him, but he felt in common with many others equally unknown to sir M. Lopez, that the House should show that it would not oppose any impediment to the clemency of the Crown, which would not of course be advised to exercise its right of pardon, in a case in which the House of Commons were concerned, without their concurrence. The prisoner, he believed, was 68 years of age, and though a grave and serious offence against their privileges, against law and morality, the crime he had committed could not be said to be extremely rare. His case would operate as a warning, even if the whole of the sentence were not carried into effect; and similar offences would not be more frequent, but probably more rare, after such a warning.

Mr. Scarlett thought it would be a delicate matter for the House to interfere to induce the Crown to remit a sentence which the court of King's-bench had imposed. The members of that House, too, should be the last to appear disposed to treat with lenity such offences, which they were out of doors but too generally supposed to view with favourable eyes. He was himself not prepared to say that the sentence was too severe. Though offenders of this kind might, in some instances, gain the cross, and in others the crown, the court of King's-bench did well always to show a severe front to such offences. He felt reluctant to make these observations, because he had had to appear as advocate for this individual. After having done his duty on this occasion, however, his connection with him had ceased.

Sir J. Yorke, though he thought the case of sir M. Lopez a hard one, could not but feel for his friend Mr. Swann, who had only been found guilty because he had done an act of kindness.

Lord Castlereagh said, the only object of this bill was to enable the House to apply any punishment it might inflict on these boroughs earlier than they otherwise could. The non-existence of the bill would not form an obstacle to the taking cognizance of these cases in a new parliament. Though he had made up his mind to vote for the bill, he could not disguise the fact that it was a strong measure, and went beyond the precedents which had been adduced. The case of Shaftesbury only applied to the issuing of writs during the existence of a parliament over which the House had a constitutional control. But it was a bolder measure to interfere with the elections for a future parliament, when they were, in some measure, tied up to a specific number of members by the act of Union.

Sir J. Mackintosh maintained, that there was a sufficient prima facie case, with respect to the boroughs alluded to in this bill, to induce the Lords to acquiesce in the measure for suspending the issue of any writs, until the merits of the case should be fully gone into. It was clear from what had appeared in evidence, that such corruption had taken place in each of those boroughs, that it would be inconsistent with the principles of the constitution, and with the character of the House itself, to allow the electors, who had been guilty of such flagrant criminality, to send members to that House. The course pursued on this occasion was fully warranted by the precedent of the Shaftesbury case. For in that case the Lords agreed to the suspension of any new writ upon the same ground as that which was assigned in the preamble of this bill. The only difference, indeed, between the two cases was, that in the Shaftesbury case the bill for suspending the writ was passed on the eve of a prorogation, whereas in the present case the suspension was proposed on the eve of a dissolution. In point of principle the two cases were precisely the same. On the ground of precedent then, as well as upon principles of constitutional justice and sound policy, the present measure ought to be adopted.

Lord Castlereagh thought the Shaftesbury case much stronger than the present, as in that case the Lords had obtained from that House a copy of the evidence taken before a committee upon the subject, in order to examine such evidence before the act was agreed to.

Lord J. Russell, in reply, animadverted upon the observations which had been made with respect to the merit of the bill. It was true, that the Lords had obtained a copy of the evidence upon the Shaftesbury case before the act of the 14th Geo. 3rd was passed, but then their lordships had not much more time, previous to that enactment, to examine such evidence, than they were likely to have at present. But the material objection which offered against the delay of the proposed enactment in this case was, that if new writs were issued to these boroughs, each would continue so to demean itself at a new election, as to raise some argument to defeat the object of this bill, or to palliate the proved delinquency upon which it was founded. To postpone or reject the present bill would serve to raise a doubt in the country as to the sincerity of the promise held out by the House, that in any borough where flagrant corruption was proved, measures would be taken not only for the punishment of the corrupt, but for the prevention of such corrupt practices in future, by the disfranchisement of the borough in which they took place. With respect to Barnstaple, the House had had only one efficient member for that borough since the rejection of sir M. Lopez, and yet no complaint had ever been heard of the inadequacy of its representation. As to the sympathy expressed for the fate of sir M. Lopez, he did not mean to find fault with those who entertained that sympathy, although it must be admitted that such corruption as that of which this baronet was convicted, deserved punishment. But as to the corruption which prevailed in small boroughs, where the voters were comparatively few, poor and ignorant, he much feared that it was idle to calculate upon the prevention of such corruption; and he felt, that whenever it was proved to take place, the only remedy was, to transfer the right of election from boroughs of that description, to large and populous towns. He had no disposition to blame those who felt sympathy for sir M. Lopez. He submitted, however, that much more sympathy or consideration was due to the poor voters who accepted the bribe; because, from their ignorance, they were probably not aware of the magnitude of the crime which they committed. As to the praise pronounced upon Mr. Swann, who was at present suffering imprisonment in consequence of a conviction for bribing an elector, he should only say in the language of the poet—"Rara avis in terra nigroque similima cygno."

The bill was read a second time.

THE QUEEN.] On the motion that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Supply,

Mr. Hume observed, that before the Speaker left the chair, he was anxious to obtain some information upon a point, with regard to which he had on a former evening felt it his duty to put a question to the noble secretary of state, to which question he had received a very unsatisfactory answer. He meant with respect to the situation of the Queen. If there was any subject which more than another interested the feelings of that House and the public, he believed it was the condition of this illustrious personage. For what was that condition? It was clear from recent occurrences, as well as from the language of the noble lord, that the Queen was not only unacknowledged, but that it was determined that she was not to be acknowledged. Every loyal man must witness such a course of proceeding with surprise and regret. He by no means intended to express any doubt of the disposition of his majesty to act with fairness and liberality upon this or any other occasion, but he must say that he was extremely surprised at the course which his ministers seemed inclined to take. Was it proposed that the dissolution should take place without making any distinct provision for the Queen? It was known, that the act by which 35,000*l.* a year were granted to her majesty had expired upon the demise of the king, and was it now intended to leave her unprovided for? In what situation was it meant that the queen of England should stand? Was she to be left as a beggar on the continent, or was she to depend for her subsistence upon the mere bounty of some person or persons in England? He maintained, that as queen she was peculiarly entitled to the attention of that House, and that something definite as to the means of her future provision should be immediately stated. He was quite sorry to see the manner in which the queen was treated. Why was not an address of condolence and congratulation voted to her majesty upon the demise of the king, and upon the accession of her husband to the throne, as was the case with regard to the queen consort of George 2nd? Upon what ground was the queen passed by altogether upon this occasion, or why was her majesty's name omitted in the Liturgy? He did, he must confess, expect a different course from ministers. But her majesty was so completely slighted, that it was quite unknown to the public in what manner she was hereafter to be treated. If the queen were to land at Portsmouth tomorrow, there was no arrangement or understanding how she was to be received, or whether she was to meet the marks of recognition and respect usually evinced towards the members of the royal family, or how the public functionaries were to behave towards her majesty. These were circumstances, with regard to which some explanation should be given to the House and the country, and he called upon the noble lord to give that explanation in definite terms. He asked the noble lord, how the wedded wife of the king was to be treated, or whether as a husband in private life was bound by law to provide for the subsistence of his consort, the queen consort was to have any settled provision?

It was due to the rank which her majesty held in the constitution, as well as to the character of the country and the claims of public justice, that the means of providing for the maintenance of her dignity should be definitively fixed—that she should not be left dependent upon mere bounty, and that, as she lived separate from her husband, some distinct provision should be made for the adequate support of her exalted station.

Lord Castlereagh said, he thought the answer which he had given the hon. gentleman on a former evening would have been deemed quite satisfactory. If the hon. gentleman had waited for the motion which the chancellor of the exchequer proposed to submit, he would have seen that no distinct provision was to be voted for the king, any more than for the high personage to whom he had alluded, but that a sum was to be voted from the consolidated fund, out of which it was intended to make provision for that high personage, as well as for the general purposes of his majesty. He expressed his regret, that any attempt should be made at present to press into discussion the very delicate question adverted to by the hon. gentleman, as such discussion was but too likely to create a ferment in the country, while it was calculated to give pain to the illustrious personages more immediately interested. The hon. gentleman might be fully assured that the high personage to whom he referred was by no means likely to experience any thing like harshness or inattention [Hear, hear!].

Mr. Hume observed, that his wish was to have a distinct provision for the queen, at least equal to that which she enjoyed under the late act of parliament.

Lord Castlereagh stated, that such provision was intended to be granted out of the sum for which his right hon. friend proposed to move.

Mr. Tierney declared his unwillingness to vote any sum for the queen, until some explanation should be given or promised as to the rumours which had gone abroad with respect to her conduct upon the continent. He agreed with the noble lord in thinking this a very delicate question to be discussed in that House. But by whom was it brought into discussion? Why, by ministers themselves, who, although they deprecated this discussion at present, held out the prospect of some such discussion at a future—[here lord Castlereagh intimated his dissent]. “Then,” said Mr.

T. “I mistook the noble lord; and that mistake is an additional reason with me for resisting the proposed grant.” So it seemed that there was to be no discussion at all upon the conduct of the queen, after all the world had heard about that conduct. Yet it would appear that her majesty was not to be recognized. He would ask the noble lord, whether any thing like recognition had taken place, or was meditated? Was the queen yet aware of the death of the king, or of the situation in which she stood in consequence of that event? Had any communication been made to her majesty upon the subject on the part of his majesty’s ministers? How came it that the name of the queen was omitted in the Liturgy? These things required explanation. But from the whole of the circumstances connected with this transaction, as well with regard to his majesty as with regard to his consort, he had no hesitation in stating, that the king had been betrayed or the queen had been insulted [Hear, hear!]. As an honest member of parliament, he felt himself called upon to make this declaration. He was not actuated by any party motive or personal prejudice whatever, but he would repeat, that in this case, either the king was betrayed or the queen was insulted [Hear, hear!]. He had heard of rumours with regard to the behaviour of the queen, which, if true, could leave no doubt that she was totally unworthy to occupy the throne of England; and if so, the king was surely entitled to the same justice that the law granted to the lowest subject in relieving him from a degraded connexion. This was a discussion into which he entered with the utmost reluctance. He was fully aware of its delicacy, and he could not advert to it without pain, but he felt that he must do his duty. He had heard of a commission having been sent to the continent, in order to collect evidence as to the misconduct of the queen; and was it possible that the noble lord, with evidence in his pocket to show that misconduct, could attempt to apply to that House for any grant of public money to an unworthy person? This was really a case of such a nature, as that House was bound to sift to the bottom, and if the rumours in circulation were true, justice should be promptly done to his majesty; while, on the other hand, if these rumours were mere calumnies, no time should be lost in vindicating the character of the queen. One party or the other must have been grossly ill treated. But when, he would ask, were the rumoured discoveries made with regard to the misconduct of the Queen? Upon the death of the queen, about twelve months ago, the liturgy was altered, and on that alteration it was directed that the princess of Wales should be distinctly prayed for. Yet, on the late alteration of the Liturgy, the name of this illustrious personage is left out. The discovery, then, of the alleged misconduct must have been made within the last twelve months, or whence the difference between these two periods? Why was she to be publicly prayed for as princess of Wales, whose name was to be altogether suppressed when she became queen of England? Now the question was brought before the House and the country, it must not be blinked, and he, for one, had no hesitation in saying, that if the queen were really guilty of the rumoured misconduct, no quibbles of law, or quirks in evidence, should prevent justice from being immediately rendered to the king. But, on the other hand, if the queen had been calumniated, he would have her character completely vindicated, and all her rights asserted and maintained. But until her character was re-established, he could not consent to vote her a penny of the public money. While the noble lord called her merely that "high personage," instead of recognizing her as the queen—while all Italy, nay, all Europe, was filled with rumours of her guilt, and of official inquiries about it—while her name was omitted in the Liturgy—while she was not acknowledged, he could not agree to vote her the means of maintaining herself, until the reasons for such extraordinary circumstances as he had recited should be satisfactorily explained. The thick cloud that covered this case must be removed—the deep mystery in which it was involved must be unravelled, before his mind could be satisfied as to the propriety of the proposed grant. He had every disposition to do justice to the queen; and no one would, perhaps, go farther to support her right when her innocence was established. He had no personal knowledge whatever of her majesty. He never received—he never expected any favour from her. His object was to have her case fully explained, from an anxiety for justice, and from a solicitude to maintain the moral dignity and high character of the monarchy of England.

Mr. Brougham observed, that if his right hon. friend felt so peculiarly the delicacy of discussing this question, he hoped the House would, for various reasons, give him credit for feeling that delicacy even more. He could not, indeed, enter into this discussion without pain, but he hoped the House would indulge him with its attention for a few moments, and the more so, as he differed very materially from the views of his right hon. friend upon the subject. He concurred fully with his right hon. friend as to the importance of the question alluded to, but he felt, he apprehended, still more than his right hon. friend, the difficulty and the delicacy which that question involved. There was no difficulty, however, in his view, in that part of the case upon which his right hon. friend had so much dwelt, because it did not appear to him a matter of any importance whether the queen were recognized or not by any of the means recited by his right hon. friend. For whether her name were inserted or omitted in the Liturgy or in any act of council, she was constitutionally and indisputably queen consort. Being indeed the wedded wife of the king, the moment he succeeded to the crown she was eo ipse queen of England. Upon the demise of his father she in fact became as lawfully and rightfully the queen as her husband became the king of this country. Her title, then, did not depend upon any words in the Liturgy, or upon any act of council, or upon any expression which a minister of the Crown thought proper to employ in that House. Such things, indeed, had no effect whatever upon the rights of the queen;—they were "trifles light as air," and could not operate in the slightest degree to impeach the title of her majesty. Nor was it in the power of that House, by any vote it thought proper to pronounce, to impeach that title.—So much as to the title of the queen, and now as to the proposed vote of provision for the maintenance of her dignity. That provision was, it appeared, to be made out of the general sum for which the minister was about to move, and if that sum were sufficient to afford this provision in addition to all the other objects of the grant, that must, he apprehended, serve to answer the purpose of those who were solicitous for the adequate supply of her majesty. Out of the proposed grant, the proportion which would be requisite to make good to the queen the loss of her late revenue of 35,000*l.* a-year, would be furnished, and that arrangement was at present to his mind quite satisfactory, for he could not rest upon mere technical objections. — Then, as to the rumours to which his right hon. friend had alluded, and which were imagined to cast a cloud of suspicion upon the character of the queen, he totally disregarded such rumours. He would, indeed, refuse his ears to every thing like rumour, suspicion, or insinuation, so long as her majesty remained queen consort. He would listen to no tales about inquiry or commission, nor would he allow the rumoured result of any rumoured inquiry to have the slightest effect upon his judgment. But if any thing in the shape of a distinct charge against the queen should be brought before that House, he hoped he should be found to act as became an honest member of parliament, by pronouncing a fair decision, not only between the parties immediately concerned, but with regard to the public interest, which the consideration of such an important question must necessarily involve. He trusted he would be found, in such a case, ready to do equal justice to the queen, to the king, and to the public, with a due regard to all the national and constitutional points naturally belonging to such an investigation. But till some specific charge should be submitted to that House, his lips should be sealed upon the subject; but he must say, that, in justice to the high personage alluded to, he thought that no opinion should be expressed upon her conduct merely on the authority of rumour. If any charge should be preferred, he begged it to be recollected that this illustrious personage was not remarkable for any slowness to meet accusation, nor for any difficulty to prove her innocence. Remembering, then, her alacrity on the subject of former charges, it was but candid to give her credit for equal alacrity to meet any charges that might hereafter be advanced, and for equal facility, too, in confounding her accusers [Hear, hear!]. But the question which his right hon. friend had thought proper to discuss was of such an important character, that he hoped gentlemen would at all times feel the propriety of considering it with calmness and temper—that bound up as that question was with the feelings of all the royal family, he trusted no appeal upon the subject would ever be made to any turbulent passions out of doors [Hear, hear!]. Such an appeal, indeed, upon such a subject could not be too forcibly deprecated at any time, because its only effect would be the radical subversion of the principles of justice. But especially under existing circumstances an appeal of that nature must serve to raise a ferment in the country, and to have the names of illustrious personages dragged through the mire of every hustings throughout the empire [Hear, hear!]. If any discussion of this important question should ever arise in parliament, its character was ample guarantee for the examination of the subject with justice, moderation, and candour; and deeply interested, as he must be in the question, from professional considerations, as well as from his duties as a member of that House, he would enter into the discussion with a full confidence of an equitable result.

Lord Castlereagh rose only for the purpose of thanking the hon. and learned gentleman for a speech which did equal honour to his head and his heart, and which must have carried conviction to all who heard it. His majesty's ministers had not lost sight of the inconvenience which might arise from a lapse of the provision which had been made for an illustrious personage, and it was their intention to submit a suitable measure to the consideration of the House.

The House then resolved itself into a committee of supply; and the chancellor of the exchequer proposed a vote of 200,000*l.* towards satisfying such annuities and pensions as would have been paid out of the consolidated fund, in case the demise of his majesty had not taken place. Also for a sum not exceeding 50,000*l.* to provide for such expenses of a civil nature as did not form a part of the ordinary charges.—Agreed to.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' BILL.] Lord Althorp moved the second reading of the Insolvent Debtors bill. He said that one of the principal objections which had been made to this bill was the clause which gave the creditor a power to compel the surrender of the debtor's effects, and afterwards to imprison him. It had been contended, that it would be hard to compel the debtor to surrender his property, when he had rather remain in prison; but he could not help considering this as one of the great advantages of the bill. It was extremely desirable to give effect to the principle which gave the creditor a power over the property rather than the person of the debtor. In the present state of the law, a man might remain in prison for any length of time, and set his creditors at defiance. As to the making of freehold property liable to the payment of debts, an arrangement would be made on this point, which would, he hoped, prove satisfactory. The strongest objection had been made to the clause giving the creditor a power of imprisonment after the debtor surrendered, which had been considered by many persons as a very severe and unnecessary power. As the law stood at present, the debtor must remain three months in confinement previous to being brought up for judgment, and this was agreeable to the principle of imprisonment, which was to be regarded not as a punishment but as a security for the creditor. When, however, the cessio bonorum was adopted as the principle of legislation between debtor and creditor, the imprisonment was to be taken more as a punishment than before, and if not resorted to, those persons would escape with the greatest impunity who had contracted debts with the least ability to discharge them.

The bill was ordered to be read a second time this day fortnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, February 22.

THE QUEEN.] On the resolution being put, "That there be granted 200,000*l.* towards satisfying such pensions, payments, and allowances as would have become payable out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or out of the civil list, in case the demise of the Crown had not occurred before the 5th of April,"

Mr. Tierney said, he wished to know from what fund, the money necessary for the support of the queen was to be paid? During the late reign, provision was made for the princess of Wales, but now that royal personage was queen of England.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the money to be paid out of this grant would, were it not for the demise of the Crown, have been paid in the usual way to the princess of Wales. All that was intended was, to pay the sums now due in the same manner as if that melancholy event had not taken place.

Mr. Tierney denied the power of the right hon. gentleman to make any such payment. The grant of the princess of Wales was one of those grants which were subject to the life of the king. Besides, there was not now any such person as the princess of Wales. If it was intended to grant, to her present majesty a similar provision to that made for the princess of Wales, words to that effect ought to be introduced. If the chancellor of the exchequer granted a single penny in any other manner, he would be guilty of an offence to the House of Commons.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the right hon. gentleman knew that this or any other payment, officially made, could not alter the state of the party receiving it.

Mr. Tierney observed, that the only provision he knew of was made for the princess of Wales—but there was now no such personage in existence. How, then, could they vote a grant of this kind? He knew the right hon. gentleman dared not mention the name of the queen. But could they, he would ask, give to an individual not mentioned in the grant a sum of money voted to another person? He should like to hear the chancellor of the exchequer mention the name of the queen, as he wished to have it recorded on the Journals.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the sum formerly granted to the princess of Wales was now payable to the queen, and to no other person.

Mr. Tierney repeated, that there being no such personage as the princess of Wales, any grant to the queen should be so stated to parliament.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the individual to whom the grant had been made still remained, though her political character was changed. Her majesty had a right to receive in her present situation what had been granted to her in another.

Mr. Hume asked, why such difficulty was made about mentioning at once that the grant was for the queen? By merely stating this the objection of the right hon. gentleman would at once be met.

Mr. Lushington said, that the grant moved for was stated to be for paying of annuities, &c. payable out of the civil list, and which would have been duly paid but for the demise of the Crown. It would be improper to mention the name of her majesty as one of the persons receiving an annuity, unless all the other names were also mentioned, which it would at once be seen would be extremely inconvenient.

The resolution was agreed to.

Thursday, February 24.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—RESOLUTIONS OF THE COMMONS RESPECTING A SUPPLY, &c.] The Earl of Lauderdale rose, in pursuance of notice, observing that the case he had to state was so plain and clear that there was no necessity for taking up much of their lordships' time. It had been the uniform practice of parliament, for a great number of years, that all the votes of supply passed by the House of Commons, during the session, should be included in an appropriation bill, which came up to that House for its assent in the usual way, and it was the undoubted right of their lordships thus to exercise a legislative power with regard to the supplies voted by the other House. In the present instance that practice had, without any necessity, been departed from, and he thought it was incumbent upon their lordships to assert their undoubted rights, and to pass some resolution disapproving of such a proceeding—a proceeding which was certainly contrary to the constitution, and which was so decided in 1784, when the House of Commons passed a resolution, declaring it a high crime and misdemeanor for any officer of the Crown to apply money in any branch of the public service without the authority of an act of parliament. But in this case there were not only the votes of sums of money for the public service, but the House of Commons had actually voted a sum of money to pay annuities under the civil list act, which expired on the demise of his majesty; and they had thus assumed a power, of their own authority, to suspend the operation of the law which declared that these annuities should not be paid. This particularly applied to the case of the annual sum granted to the princess of Wales. Were ministers aware to what extent these votes went? Was it not the effect of them to continue to the king the income granted to his majesty as prince of Wales, as well as the amount of the civil list, whilst a portion of the hereditary revenues also fell to the Crown? Respecting the latter there was no account, and ministers themselves did not seem to be aware of the extent to which the votes went. It was in vain for the noble earl opposite to recur to the precedents of 1784 and 1807: in these cases parliament was dissolved by the act of the Crown without any previous communication of its intentions, but in the present case there was a previous communication of the intention of the Crown to dissolve the parliament, which rendered the present case perfectly unprecedented. If the House of Commons could then, in one instance, assume the power of voting the public money without the concurrence of their lordships, what was to prevent them from setting aside the privileges of their lordships' House? It surely was incumbent upon the noble lords opposite to take care that no such precedent was established, for if the universal suffrage and annual parliament men could unhappily gain the ascendancy, there could be no doubt that the first step of a House of Commons so constituted would be to set aside the legislative privileges of that House, and here would be a precedent established to assist them. He concluded by moving the following resolutions:—

“Resolved—That it appears from the votes of the House of Commons now on the table of this House, that the Commons' House of Parliament have voted the following resolutions:—1. That a sum, not exceeding 2,000,000*l.*, be granted to his majesty to pay off and discharge Irish treasury bills, charged upon the aids or supplies of 1820, outstanding and unprovided for. 2. That a sum, not exceeding 50,000*l.*, be granted to his majesty, upon account, to enable his majesty to provide for such expenses of a civil nature, as do not form a part of the ordinary charges of the civil list for the year 1820. 3. That there be granted to his majesty the sum of 200,000*l.*, towards satisfying such annuities, pensions, or other payments, as would have been payable out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or out of the civil list, in case the demise of his late majesty had not taken place, before the 5th day of April, 1820. 4. That a sum, upon account, not exceeding 200,000*l.* nett, be granted to his majesty towards defraying the charge of army services in Ireland for the year 1820. 5. That a sum, upon account, not exceeding 600,000*l.*, be granted to his majesty towards defraying the charge of army services at home and abroad, except in Ireland, for the year 1820.”

“ Resolved—That the Commons’ House of Parliament, informed by his majesty’s message of the intended dissolution of parliament, have, in these resolutions, attempted to appropriate money to be paid for services subsequent to the dissolution, which can only legally be effected by an act of parliament appropriating the supplies voted; and that they have farther, in a most unprecedented manner, assumed the power of providing for, and authorising the payment of certain pensions and annuities, subsequent to the dissolution of parliament, which by law are declared to be at an end.

“ Resolved—That, under these circumstances, we feel it our duty to declare, that though we regard these proceedings as derogatory to the privileges of this House and of parliament, yet we are induced, by a sense of the state in which public business is now placed, to forbear from any immediate proceedings, and to declare, that we will concur in indemnifying those who may pay money, or otherwise act under these resolutions, which we must nevertheless deprecate, as threatening the subversion of the best and wisest principles of the constitution of our country.”

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that it had been the invariable practice of parliament since the revolution, for no grant to be made, nor any sum to be levied upon the people, without the authority of an act of parliament; and this was so strictly adhered to, that in the case of a loan, though the bargain was made between the first lord of the treasury and the chancellor of the exchequer and the contractors, and the first instalment actually paid, still it was paid into the Bank, and not touched by any one till authorized to be drawn out for the public service by an act of parliament. But with respect to votes of supply, the practice had been different; it had been the constant practice for the House of Commons to vote various sums for different branches of the public service, under the authority of which votes alone the money had been applied. It was true that all these votes were included in the Appropriation bill; but the fact was, that frequently, particularly if the session was long, half the money wanted for the different branches of the public service had been expended before that bill was brought up to that House. He could not see any difference of principle, therefore, between the case

he had just stated and that of a dissolution happening in the middle of the usual period of a session, when, after the meeting of the new parliament, an appropriation bill, including all the sums voted, might still be passed. As to the resolution passed in 1784, it proved the direct contrary of what was urged by the noble earl; as it showed that the practice of the House of Commons had been what he had just stated; and it was well known that the object of passing that resolution was to prevent a dissolution which was suspected to be intended by the Crown. But the passing such a resolution proved that the practice had been different to what that resolution referred to. With regard to the Civil List act, it was not correctly stated, that it had expired, as, though the sums named in it ceased to be payable, the regulations in the act were of the nature of permanent regulations, and all that had been done was to vote a sum for current expences for the quarter intervening between the dissolution of the present parliament and the calling of a new one. He did not see the necessity of coming to any resolution upon the subject; but at all events he could not agree to the resolutions of the noble lord, which conveyed a strong censure upon the House of Commons, their lordships having in their address to the throne pledged themselves to concur in any measure for expediting the public business. He was, however, ready to meet the views of the noble lord in some respects by a resolution recognizing the rights of that House, and he therefore moved as an amendment, to leave out the resolutions after the statement of the resolutions of the House of Commons, and to insert, “that this House, from the state of the public business, acquiesce in these resolutions, although no act may be passed to give them effect.”

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, the question was one of the greatest importance, as affecting the constitutional rights of that House; and when it was asserted that their lordships had in their address to the throne agreed to expedite the public business as much as possible, he must tell the noble earl that they had not agreed to abandon their constitutional rights. The cases where the House of Commons acted in the usual manner in their votes, without being informed of there being any intention on the part of the Crown to dissolve them, were totally different from the present instance, where the information of the intention of the Crown to dissolve the parliament had been given, and where consequently, every arrangement might have been made to ensure a regular course of proceeding. That it had been uniformly the case since the Revolution, for the grants of public money made by the other House to pass under the review of their lordships in order to their being incorporated in an act of the legislature, could not be denied; and the noble earl most erroneously described the Resolution of the House of Commons, in 1784, when he said that it proved the practice of the House to be different. The fact was, that the resolution was merely declaratory of the law of the land. It had been most truly observed by his noble friend, that for the House of Commons to assume the power of voting the public money without the concurrence of their lordships, was a most injudicious precedent to set, for there could be no doubt, that if those persons who aimed at our institutions and establishments could unhappily obtain the ascendancy, the first step of a House of Commons constituted by them, would be to take away the legislative privileges of their lordships. His noble friend had also observed upon the anomalous proceeding to which recourse had been had with regard to the civil list, it appearing that his majesty would not only, pending the dissolution, have his revenue as king of England, but also that which was granted to him as prince of Wales, and a portion of the hereditary revenues of the Crown.

The Earl of Liverpool said, the vote on account of the civil list was for a specific sum, 200,000*l.*, and that it did not in the least interfere with the settlement of the civil list by the new parliament. As to the payment of the annuities under the civil list act, it was nothing more than would have been done as a matter of course for the current quarter, had parliament continued sitting.

The Earl of Donoughmore acquiesced in the amendment, by which he thought quite enough was done to protect the privileges of the House.

The amendment was then carried.

BARNSTABLE.] The Earl of Lauderdale presented a petition from the mayor and aldermen of Barnstaple against the Writs Suspension bill, and praying that they might be heard by counsel against it on the second reading. The petition was laid on the table, and lord Lauderdale moved that the petitioners be heard by counsel on the second reading. The earl of Caernarvon wished their lordships to proceed as speedily as possible to the discussion of the principle of the bill; but the time that counsel must occupy would prevent that object, if they were called in on the second reading. He therefore proposed that they should be heard in the committee, or on some subsequent stage of the bill. A conversation followed, in which lord Lauderdale and the lord chancellor supported the motion, and lords Grosvenor, Caernarvon, Lansdowne, and Dacre, opposed it. A division took place, when the numbers were Contents, 12; Non-contents, 11. It was accordingly ordered that counsel should be heard to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MUTINY BILL, &c.] On the third reading of the Mutiny bill.

Earl Grosvenor objected to the amount of the force with which the country was burdened, but he did not mean to oppose the bill in the present state of the public business. He could not, however, look with any satisfaction at the termination of the present parliament, when he reflected upon the various measures that might have been taken into consideration with advantage to the public, but which would be interrupted by the dissolution; and when he considered also that there was in reality nothing, so far as he could understand, that need have prevented the session from being carried on to its usual termination. Amongst the important questions which ought to have been taken into consideration and determined upon, was the civil list; instead of which, the dignity of the Crown was actually left without any provision for its support. Connected with this subject there was also another important question relative to the situation of the queen; which whenever it did come under consideration he should discuss with the utmost freedom. He put it to the noble lords opposite, whether they ought not, before dissolving the present parliament, to have considered whether they could not have brought forward some measure for the amelioration of the condition of the people? It could not be denied that much discontent and irritated feeling prevailed amongst the people, not only here, but in foreign countries; and when they heard of the assassination of the duke de Berri in France, and of the atrocious conspiracy discovered here, said to have for its object the assassination of his majesty's ministers, by a band of desperadoes, there could be no doubt of the existence of an highly irritated state of feeling. It was, however, for ministers seriously to consider whether the measures they had not long since carried through parliament, had not had an effect which was predicted from them by some of his noble friends—that of inducing men who were deprived of the privilege of openly meeting, to associate in secret cabals, leading to the most mischievous consequences? It had been precisely so in France, where, whilst a liberal system prevailed in the government, there was a feeling of satisfaction on the part of the people; but when a disposition was evinced of resorting to arbitrary measures, then followed a highly irritated state of public feeling, and an atrocious assassination. And it was for ministers to consider whether the harsh measures they had resorted to, unaccompanied by any manifestation of a desire to alleviate the discontents of the people, had not a tendency to excite to acts of assassination.

The Earl of Lauderdale spoke to order, observing, that it was highly improper to charge any body of men, whether on the ministerial or opposition side of the House, with conduct that tended to excite to assassination.

Earl Grosvenor disclaimed the slightest intention of imputing to any persons conduct that tended to excite to assassination; he only meant to dwell upon the expediency of resorting to such measures as might tend to alleviate the discontent of the people: he did not mean that any effort should be made to satisfy wretches who conspired assassination, but that conduct should be pursued to conciliate a considerable portion of the people who were suffering under distress, arising from the great pressure of taxation.

The bill was passed.

WRITS SUSPENSION BILL.] The Earl of Caernarvon said, it had been the practice of the House of Commons for a long series of years to suspend the issue of new writs to boroughs charged with corruption, until the case of such boroughs could be thoroughly investigated. This was all that was asked by the present bill. The writs that had been suspended for many months, it was now only asked further to suspend, during the short interval between the dissolution of the present parliament and the calling of the new one. If they did not do this there was little hope that any permanent measure would be agreed to, as by allowing these four boroughs to return eight members their cases might become so complicated by new circumstances as to render it impossible to come to any decision respecting their original guilt. He was one of those who had always opposed general systems of parliamentary reform, but such a reform as was likely to arise from the proceedings recommended in the House of Commons with regard to those boroughs, was one to which their lordships ought to lend their zealous co-operation. He would ask them to consider what the feelings of the country would be, if, when they saw that a bill was brought into the other House, to annihilate altogether the rights of one of these boroughs on the ground of corruption, if when they saw that the motion was made by a young nobleman, a descendant of that family, who had made the name of Russell dear to the hearts of Englishmen, and that the leading minister in that House had declared his cordial assent to that species of reform, they found at the same time the ministers in their lordships' House prepared to interpose their chilling negative to the hopes and expectations of the people. The revival of the same corruption, of the same immorality and perjury, at the next general election, was an evil that ought to be avoided. It had been stated that it was a great hardship to take away the rights of these boroughs even for a day, but all they were asked to do, was that which the House of Commons itself could have done by its own authority, if it had not been for the dissolution. The situation of the boroughs in the passing of this bill, would be precisely that of an individual who was committed for want of bail, and whose rights were therefore suspended until his case could be tried. All he contended for was, that while the question was at issue between the petitioners and the country, that House should not decide against the country, for if the writs were issued, and members were again returned for these boroughs, without any proof that they were elected by corrupt means, there was no way that he knew of to prevent such members from sitting in parliament. A case occurred in 1779, which appeared to him completely in point. Proceedings were adopted at that period against the borough of Shaftesbury. A bill was introduced shortly after into the House, empowering the Speaker to issue writs in cases of death during the prorogation, and in that bill a clause was introduced, suspending the operation of the act with respect to the borough of Shaftesbury during the period of the next prorogation. In that measure the House of Lords concurred. It could not be contended that the bill alluded to was a boon, from which an exception might be made; for the moment a law was passed, it was as much the law of the land as if it had existed for ages. Another objection to the bill was, that it commanded the sheriffs not to obey the king's writs. But what was the meaning of this objection? Did they mean to say it was disrespectful to the king, to pass a measure which could not be carried into effect without his own sanction and assent? It was absurd to suppose it. The learned lord on the woolsack had contended, on a former night, that when a public measure was passing, every body or individual, who felt themselves aggrieved, had a right to be heard by counsel, and their lordships had no discretion to refuse the exercise of that right. The present was not a private bill, it was a temporary measure to prevent a great inquiry from being prejudiced, and the greatest mischief might arise from the adoption of the general principle, that public measures might be delayed by the arguments of counsel, and the examination of witnesses at the bar. But was this principle adhered to, in cases where the standing orders were suspended to pass bills in one day, and was it too much to request, in the present case, that a measure of such importance to the public interests should not be lost for ever? His lordship concluded by moving, that the order for the hearing of counsel at the bar on that day, should be discharged.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he had no wish that the present bill should be disposed of by any thing like a side wind; for though it was true that upon public measures it was not the practice to hear counsel, yet in that case the interests of parties were so directly affected, that it would be hard to refuse to hear them by counsel at the bar. He was one of them who thought that if a case of corruption could be fairly made out, a bill to disfranchise the borough so offending, was a measure fit to be entertained by parliament. But it was one thing to say that the borough should be disfranchised, when the case was made out, and another thing to say, that before the case was made out, the rights of such boroughs should be suspended, until they were proved to have forfeited them by evidence at the bar. He did not hesitate to say, that the power exercised by the House of Commons, of suspending the writs of boroughs, not disfranchised, was a very strong power. If the possession of that power was at this moment a new question, he would be disposed to doubt much the propriety of investing it in either House of Parliament. The House of Commons, however, had undoubtedly exercised the right, and it was not expedient to try it now. In the case of Shaftesbury, the House of Commons had exercised that right, and all that parliament did, by the clause alluded to in the new bill, was, to leave the case of Shaftesbury in the same state as it would have been in if the bill had not passed. It bore no reference to the present measure, which amounted to this—whether, when parliament had no existence, they would say, without having any evidence before them, that the rights of the Crown should not be exercised, nor those of the persons concerned, who were not yet proved to have been guilty. It was possible that their lordships might differ from the House of Commons; they had done so upon other occasions; and the very act of hearing evidence was in itself a presumption that they might differ. The measure was, in fact, a serious innovation upon the principles of the constitution, to which there was nothing analogous. It was said to be a serious inconvenience to proceed to elect members for the boroughs named in the bill; but the noble lord had seemed to forget, that four members out of the eight were now sitting. Nor was it true that the question as to the corrupt practices must drop; for if a sufficient case could be made out, they would go to the question as if nothing had since happened. The alternative for their lordships to consider was this—whether it would be better to run the risk of having eight members returned by undue influence, or to adopt the strong measure of depriving the people of their rights for a time upon a principle supported by no analogy, or if by any analogy, by a remote one, founded on a practice of a very doubtful nature?

The Earl of Darnley declared his intention of voting for the bill.

The Lord Chancellor did not conceive that any argument which might be urged by counsel could at all change the opinion which he entertained on the subject. A noble earl had talked of the necessity of consulting the feelings and interest of the public. It was the conviction of his mind, resulting from long experience, that the only effectual mode of consulting the feelings and interest of the public was, by doing justice. Let parliament invariably do justice, and justice would eventually be done to them. Now, in the present instance, he contended it would be the height of injustice to agree to the bill, and thereby suspend the rights of a portion of the people, without any ground which would render such a proceeding warrantable. It was impossible that their lordships could be satisfied to take such a step without any evidence to show its expediency. Under existing circumstances, any attempt to obtain such evidence, at their own bar, would be futile; and, with all possible respect for the House of Commons, no noble lord, he presumed, would argue that their lordships should proceed on the evidence taken before a committee of that House. Even if that evidence were admissible by their lordships, it did not at all go to the question of the expediency of disfranchising the boroughs in question, but merely established the corruption of a part of the electors. The fact, that the House of Commons permitted four of the members for those boroughs to retain their seats, was a conclusive proof of this.

The Marquis of Lansdowne supported the bill. He was quite aware that a certain apparent inequality in the representation was desirable, as producing a greater real equality of representation than any theoretical system proceeding on a different principle. But he maintained, that when this was carried to excess, it ought to be corrected. He admitted, that individuals and bodies of individuals ought to be protected in their rights; but it should never be forgotten, that they possessed those rights, and ought to exercise them, not for selfish purposes, but for the general benefit. All that the bill tended to do was, to suspend the exercise of the elective franchise in the boroughs in question during the interval which the expected dissolution would occasion, thereby leaving the question for the determination of the new parliament precisely in the state in which it was at present.

Earl Grosvenor farther explained the misapprehension which had taken place with respect to what had fallen from him at an earlier period of the evening, and expressed his conviction that no noble lord could for a moment suppose him capable of palliating the dreadful atrocity recently contemplated. On the question immediately before their lordships, he entirely concurred in the opinion of his noble friend who had just sat down.

The Earl of Lauderdale moved, that the farther discussion of the question be adjourned for a fortnight. On this motion their lordships divided—Contents, 22; Non-Contents, 11: Majority, 11.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH AT THE CLOSE OF THE SESSION.] After the royal assent had been given, by commission, to several bills, the following Speech of the Lords Commissioners was delivered to both Houses by the Lord Chancellor:—

“ My Lords and Gentlemen ;

“ We are commanded by his majesty to inform you, that it is a great disappointment to his majesty, that on this first and solemn occasion he is prevented by indisposition from meeting you in person.

“ It would have been a consolation to his majesty to give utterance in this place to those feelings with which his majesty and the nation alike deplore, the loss of a Sovereign, the common father of all his people.

“ The King commands us to inform you, that in determining to call without delay the new parliament, his majesty has been influenced by the consideration of what is most expedient for public business, as well as most conducive to general convenience.

“ Gentlemen of the House of Commons ;

“ We are directed by his majesty to thank you for the provision which you

ing a right to vote for a member to serve in parliament for any city, borough, town or place, attending any meeting of such city, borough, town or place, which may be called by the mayor or other head officer.

Punishing persons attending meetings contrary to the provisions of this act.

V. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall knowingly and wilfully attend any meeting holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, upon the subject thereof, not being a freeholder, copyholder, heritor, or householder of or inhabitant usually residing in the county or riding, or division of the county, or the stewartry, within and for which the meeting shall be holden, when such meeting shall be holden for any county, riding, division or stewartry, or not being a freeman or member of the corporation, if the meeting be of any corporate body, or a householder of or inhabitant usually residing, or freeholder or copyholder having such estate as aforesaid, in the city, borough, or town corporate, parish or township (as the case may be), within and for which any such meeting shall be holden, and not being such member of the Commons House of Parliament, attending as aforesaid, such person being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment, not exceeding twelve calendar months, at the discretion of the Court in which the conviction shall be had.

VI. And be it further enacted, That all justices of the peace, sheriffs and under sheriffs, mayors, and other head officers aforesaid, are hereby respectively authorized and empowered, within their respective jurisdictions, where any meeting or assembly shall be holden, or be proposed to be holden, for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution or address, upon the subject thereof, to proceed to the place where such meeting or assembly shall be holden, or shall be proposed to be holden, and there to do or order or cause to be done all such acts, matters, and things, as the case may require, which they are hereby enabled to do, or to order to be done, or which they are otherwise by law enabled or entitled to do, or to order to be done; and it shall be lawful for all justices of the peace, sheriffs, under sheriffs, mayors, and other head officers respectively as aforesaid, to require and take the assistance of any number of constables, or other officers of the peace, within the district or place wherein such meeting as hereinbefore mentioned shall be holden, or any other persons in their aid or assistance, when they shall deem such aid or assistance to be necessary and requisite.

VII. And be it further enacted, That in case any meeting shall be holden in pursuance of any such notice as aforesaid, and such notice shall express or purport that any matter or thing by law established may be altered otherwise than by the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled; or shall tend to incite or stir up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or of the government and constitution of this realm, as by law established; every such meeting shall be deemed and taken to be an unlawful assembly.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall attend any meeting whatever, holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution or address, upon the subject thereof, contrary to the provisions of this act, it shall be lawful for any one or more justice or justices of the peace in and for any county, or the sheriff or under sheriff of any county, or the mayor or other head officer, or any justice of the peace of any city or town corporate, within which any such meeting shall be held, to make or cause to be made proclamation in the king's name, in the form directed in this act, commanding every person so unlawfully attending any such meeting immediately and peaceably to depart therefrom; and if any person or persons so ordered to depart as aforesaid, shall not, upon such proclamation, depart from any such meeting within the space of a quarter of an hour after such proclamation made, that then and in every such case, every such person so continuing and not departing as aforesaid, shall, upon being thereof lawfully convicted, be adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall be liable to be transported for any period not exceeding seven years.

IX. And be it further enacted, That the order and form of the proclamation to be made as aforesaid, shall be as hereafter followeth (that is to say), the justice of the peace or other person, or one of the justices of peace, or one of the other persons authorized by this act to make the said proclamation, shall, among the said persons assembled, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice, command or cause to be commanded silence to be, while proclamation is making; and after that shall openly, and with loud voice, make or cause to be made proclamation in these words, or to the like effect:

“ or inhabitant usually residing, or freeholder in, or “ copyholder in , naming the county, riding, division, stewardry, “ city, borough, town, body corporate, parish, or township, as the case may be], or
“ ing to his lawful business. GOD save the King.”

X. And be it further enacted, that when any such proclamation as aforesaid shall have been made at any meeting, it shall be lawful for any person lawfully attending such meeting, to seize and apprehend any person not entitled to attend such meeting, who shall not upon the making of such proclamation forthwith depart, and to carry such person before any justice of the peace of the county, riding, division, stewardry, city, or town corporate, within which such meeting shall be held, to be dealt with according to law.

Persons not entitled to attend meetings, and not departing upon proclamation, may be carried before a justice.

XI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any one or more, justice or justices of the peace in and for any county, or for the sheriff or under sheriff of any county, or for the mayor or other head officer, or any justice of the peace of any city or town corporate, within which any meeting shall be held, or persons shall assemble for the purpose of holding any meeting contrary to the provisions of this act, or where any person or persons not entitled to attend any meeting or assembly as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to depart therefrom for the space of a quarter of an hour after such proclamation made as aforesaid, to make or cause to be made proclamation in the king's name, in the manner and form hereinafter directed, to command all persons there assembled to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business; and if any such persons so assembled as aforesaid shall, to the number of twelve or more, notwithstanding such proclamation made, continue together by the space of half an hour after such proclamation made, that then and in every such case every person so continuing, being thereof legally convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for any term not exceeding seven years.

Punishing persons assembled contrary to this act, not dispersing after being required so to do, by proclamation.

XII. And be it further enacted, That the order and form of the proclamation to be made as aforesaid, shall be as hereafter followeth (that is to say); the justice or justices of the peace, or other person authorized by this act to make such proclamation, shall, among the said persons assembled, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice, command or cause to be commanded silence to be, while proclamation is making, and after that shall openly, and with loud voice, make or cause to be made proclamation in these words, or to the like effect:

XIII. And be it further enacted, That if one or more justice or justices of the peace present at any meeting requiring such notice as aforesaid, shall think fit to order any person or persons who shall attend such meeting in any manner contrary to the provisions of this act, or who shall at such meeting proceed to propound or maintain any proposition for altering any thing by law established, otherwise than by the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, or shall wilfully and advisedly make any proposition, or hold any discourse for the purpose of inciting and stirring up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the government and constitution of this realm as by law established, to be taken into custody, to be dealt with according to law; and in case the said justice or justices, or any of them, or any peace officer acting under his or their or any of their orders, shall be forcibly obstructed in taking into custody any person or persons so ordered to be taken into custody, then and in such case it shall be lawful for any such justice or justices thereupon to make or cause to be made such proclamation as last aforesaid, in manner aforesaid; and if any persons, to the number of twelve or more, being required or commanded by such proclamation to disperse themselves, and peace-

ably to depart as last aforesaid, shall, to the number of twelve or more, notwithstanding such proclamation made, remain or continue together by the space of half an hour after such command or request made by proclamation, that then such continuing together to the number of twelve or more, after such command or request made by proclamation, shall be adjudged felony, and the offenders therein shall be adjudged felons, and shall be liable to be transported for any term not exceeding seven years.

Punishment of persons obstructing justices, &c.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons do or shall, with force and arms, wilfully and knowingly oppose, obstruct, or in any manner wilfully and knowingly let, hinder, or hurt any justice of the peace, or other person authorized as aforesaid, or any person acting in aid or assistance of any justice of the peace who shall attend or disperse any such meeting as aforesaid, or shall be going to attend or to disperse any such meeting, or any justice of the peace or peace officer, or any person or persons acting in aid or assistance of any justice of the peace or other officer who shall begin to proclaim, or be going or endeavouring to make any proclamation authorized or directed to be made under the provisions of this act, whereby such proclamation shall not be made; and also if any persons so being assembled as aforesaid, to whom any such proclamation as aforesaid should or ought to have been made, if the same had not been hindered as aforesaid, shall, to the number of twelve or more, continue together, and not disperse themselves within half an hour after such let or hindrance so made, having knowledge of such let or hindrance so made; and also if any person so being at any such assembly as aforesaid shall, with force and arms, wilfully and knowingly oppose, obstruct, or in any manner wilfully and knowingly let, hinder, or hurt any justice of the peace or other magistrate, or any peace officer or other person acting in their aid or assistance, in the arresting, apprehending, or taking into custody, or detaining, in execution of any of the provisions of this act, any person or persons, or endeavouring so to do, that then and in every such case every person so offending, being thereof legally convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for any term not exceeding seven years.

Justices, &c.
indemnified in case of killing
or maiming.

XV. And be it further enacted, That if the persons assembled at any meeting or assembly held contrary to the provisions of this act, or which shall become and be an unlawful assembly, under the provisions of this act, or any of them, shall happen to be killed, maimed, or hurt, in the dispersing, or endeavouring to disperse, or arresting or apprehending or detaining them, or any of them, or in the endeavouring so to do, by reason of their resisting the persons so dispersing, seizing, or apprehending, or endeavouring to disperse, seize, or apprehend them, that every such justice of the peace, sheriff, under sheriff, mayor, head officer, magistrate, high or petty constable, or other peace officer, and all and singular persons being aiding and assisting to them, or any of them, shall be free, discharged, and indemnified, as well against the king's majesty, his heirs and successors, as against all and every other person and persons, of, for, or concerning the killing, maiming, or hurting of any such person or persons so continuing together as aforesaid, that shall happen to be so killed, maimed, or hurt as aforesaid.

Act not to ex-
meeting held
room.

XVI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein-before contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any meeting or assembly which shall be wholly holden in any room or apartment of any house or building; any thing herein-before contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Act not to ex-

XVII. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any meeting held in any county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, returning any member to serve in parliament, after the issuing and before the return of any writ for the election of any member to serve in parliament for such county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place.

Persons not to
ings with arms, weapons, &c.

XVIII. And be it further declared and enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person to attend, proceed to, or be present at any meeting whatsoever, which shall be holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon, or proceeding to deliberate upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, on the subject thereof, armed with any gun, pistol, sword, dagger, pike, bludgeon, or other offensive weapon; and that every person who shall offend in the premises, shall, upon being convicted thereof, be fined and imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the Court before which such conviction shall be had: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any justice of the peace, sheriff, under sheriff, mayor, or other head officer aforesaid, or to any peace officer, or to any other person or persons acting in their aid or assistance, who shall attend, proceed to, or be present at any such meeting as aforesaid.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person to attend, proceed to, or be present at, or return from any meeting whatever, which shall be holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon, or proceeding to deliberate upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, on the subject thereof, with any flag, banner, or ensign, or displaying or exhibiting any device, badge, or emblem, or with any drum or military or other music, or in military array or order; and that every person who shall offend in the premises, shall, upon being convicted thereof, be fined and imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the Court before which such conviction shall be had.

Persons not to attend meetings with flags, banners, and other ensigns or emblems.

XX. And be it further enacted, That the sheriffs depute and their substitutes, stewards depute and their substitutes, justices of the peace, magistrates of royal burghs, and all other inferior judges and magistrates, and also all high and petty constables, or other peace officers of any county, stewartry, city or town, within that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland, shall have such and the same powers and authorities for putting this present act in execution within Scotland, as the justices of the peace, and peace officers and constables aforesaid, respectively have, by virtue of this act, within and for other parts of the United Kingdom.

Sheriffs depute, &c. in Scotland, to have the same powers as magistrates in England.

XXI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace, assembled at any quarter or general sessions of the peace, in any case in which they shall deem it expedient for the purpose of preventing tumultuous meetings, to divide any parish or township within their jurisdiction, having a population exceeding, in the judgment of the said justices, twenty thousand inhabitants, into two or more divisions, for all the purposes of this act, and to assign the boundaries of such divisions; and that a registry of such divisions so made, specifying and describing the boundaries so assigned, shall be entered with the clerk of the peace of the county, riding, or division within which such parish or township is situate, and a duplicate thereof shall be transmitted to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, or to the minister and elders, or to the kirk session of the parish or township so divided, to be by them preserved and kept with the books of such parish or township, and copies thereof shall be put up, and from time to time (in case of the removal) replaced, upon the doors of the church of such parish or township; and when any such parish or township shall be so divided, each of such separate divisions shall, for all the purposes of this act be deemed a separate parish or township; and all the clauses, provisions, regulations, matters, and things, in this act contained, relating to any assemblies or meetings in parishes or townships, shall apply and be enforced, as to all such separate division of parishes or townships, as fully and effectually as if the same were severally and separately repeated and re-enacted in relation thereto: provided always, that no such division shall contain a population, which in the judgment of the said justices shall consist of less than ten thousand persons.

XXII. And be it further enacted, That every extra-parochial place shall be deemed and taken to be a parish or township, for all the purposes of this act; and all the clauses, provisions, regulations, matters and things in this act contained, relating to any assemblies or meetings in parishes or townships, shall apply and be enforced as to all extra-parochial places, as fully and effectually as if the same were severally and separately repeated and re-enacted in relation thereto.

Extra-parochial places to be deemed parishes for the purposes of this act.

XXIII. And whereas by an act passed in the fifty-seventh year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled an act for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies, certain regulations are enacted in relation to meetings in the city or liberties of Westminster, or county of Middlesex, which might prevent any meeting under the provisions of this act, in the parishes of Saint John and Saint Margaret, Westminster; be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful to hold any meetings in such parishes respectively, which may be held under the provisions of this act, within the distance of one mile from the gate of Westminster-hall, provided that the same shall not be held in Old or New Palace-yard at any time during the sitting of Parliament; any thing in the said recited act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Meetings may be held under this act in certain parishes in Westminster, within one mile of Westminster-hall gate, notwithstanding act of 57 G. 3, c. 14.

XXIV. Provided always, and be it enacted and declared, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to render lawful any notice, or any or suit may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon; and if such action shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, or the venue shall be laid in any other place than as aforesaid, then the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant or defendants; and in such case, or if the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant or defendants upon the merits, or if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall become nonsuit, or discontinue his, her, or their action after appearance, or if upon demurrer judgment shall be given against the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall have double costs, which he or they shall and may recover in such and the same manner as any defendant can by law in other cases.

Double costs.

Limitation of actions, &c. in Scotland.

VII. And be it further enacted, That every action or suit which shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons in Scotland, for any thing done or acted in pursuance of this act, shall in like manner be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and shall be brought in the court of session in Scotland; and the defender or defenders may plead that the matter complained of was done in pursuance of this act, and may give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if such action or suit shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, then the same shall be dismissed; and in such case, or if the defender or defenders shall be awarded, or the pursuer or pursuers shall suffer the action or suit to fall asleep, or a decision shall be pronounced against the pursuer or pursuers upon the relevancy, the defender or defenders shall have double costs or expenses, which he or they shall and may receive in such and the same manner as any defender can by law recover costs or expenses in other cases.

Double costs.

Act to extend to certain counties, and others by proclamation.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That this act and all the provisions thereof, shall extend to the several counties of Lancaster and Chester, and to the West Riding of the county of York, and to the counties of Warwick, Stafford, Derby, Leicester, Nottingham, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Northumberland, Durham, Renfrew, and Lanark, the counties of the towns of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and Nottingham, and of the city of Coventry, and such other counties or ridings of Great Britain as his majesty shall from time to time, upon the representation made by the justices assembled at any quarter or general session of the peace, or by any general meeting of the lieutenancy of any county or riding, in consequence of any disturbance therein, by any proclamation made by and with the advice of his privy counsel, declare to be so disturbed as to make it necessary that the provisions of this act should be enforced therein; and then and in such case this act shall be in full force as to any such county or counties, or ridings, from the day specified in any such proclamation, as if such county or riding had been contained in this act.

His majesty in council may restrict or extend the operation of the act.

IX. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for his majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, by proclamation, to declare that this act shall be no longer in force in any counties or ridings specified in this act, or in any county or riding to which the provisions of this act shall have been extended by proclamation as aforesaid; and from and after the period specified in any such proclamation, the powers of this act shall no longer be in force in such county or riding: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall prevent or be construed to extend to prevent his majesty, upon such representation and by such advice as aforesaid, declaring by proclamation any such county or riding to be again within the powers of this act.

Duration of this act.

X. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force until the twenty-fifth day of March one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two.

Act may be repealed or altered this session.

XI. And be it further enacted, That this act may be repealed in the whole or in any part thereof, or in any manner altered or amended, during the present session of parliament.

No. III.—Copy of the Misdemeanors Bill. 60 Geo. III. Chap. 4.

An Act to prevent Delay in the Administration of Justice in Cases of Misdemeanor.

WHEREAS great delays have occurred in the administration of justice, in cases of persons prosecuted for misdemeanors by indictment or information in his majesty's courts of King's-bench at Westminster and Dublin, and by indictment persons desiring the same, to open such house, room, or other building for the purpose of delivering, for money, any such public reading, lectures, or discourses as aforesaid, or for the purpose of holding debates on any subjects, the same being clearly expressed in such license, for which license a fee of one shilling and no more shall be paid; and the same shall be in force for the space of one year and no longer, or for any less space of time therein to be specified; and which license it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace of the same county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, at any general quarter or general sessions of the peace, to revoke and declare void and no longer in force, by any order of such justices, a copy whereof shall be delivered to or served upon the person to whom the said license so revoked shall have been granted, or shall be left at the house, room, or building for which such licence shall have been granted; and thereupon such license shall cease and determine, and be thenceforth utterly void and of no effect.

XXX. Provided always, and be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace of any county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, where any such house, room, or other building shall be licensed, as herein provided, to go to such house, room, or building so licensed, at the time of any such public reading, or delivering any such lecture or discourse, or of holding any debate therein as aforesaid, or at the time appointed for any such public reading, or delivering any such lecture or discourse, or of holding any debate, and demand to be admitted therein; and in case such justice or justices shall be refused admittance to such house, room, or building, the same shall be deemed, notwithstanding any such license as aforesaid, a disorderly house or place within the meaning of this act; and all and every the provisions herein-before contained respecting any house, room, field, or place, herein-before declared to be a disorderly house or place, shall be applied to such house, room, or building so licensed as aforesaid, where such admittance shall have been refused as aforesaid; and every person refusing such admittance shall forfeit the sum of twenty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same.

Penalty for refusing admittance, 20l.

XXXI. Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any lecture or discourses to be delivered in any of the Universities of the united kingdom, by any member thereof, or any person authorized by the chancellor, vice-chancellor or other proper officers of such Universities respectively; or to any public reading, or lecture or discourse, to be delivered in the public hall of any of the inns of court or chancery, by any person authorized by the benchers of the inns of court; or by the professors in Gresham College; or to the professors in the college established for the education of the civil servants of the East India Company, or the seminaries established for the education of their military service; or to any society or body of men incorporated or established by royal charter, or by authority of parliament; and that no payment made to any schoolmaster, or other person by law allowed to teach and instruct youth, in respect of any public readings, or lectures or discourses, delivered by such schoolmaster or other person, for the instruction only of such youth as shall be committed to his instruction, shall be deemed a payment of money for admission to public readings, or such lectures or discourses, within the intent and meaning of this act.

Lectures at the universities, inns of court, Gresham college, &c. excepted.

XXXII. Provided also, and be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any two justices of the peace, acting for any county, stewartry, riding, division, city, town, or place, upon evidence on oath that any house, room, or place so licensed and opened as aforesaid, is commonly used for the purpose of public reading or delivering lectures or discourses of a seditious, irreligious, or immoral tendency, to adjudge and declare the license for opening the same to have been forfeited; and such license shall thereupon cease and determine, and shall thenceforth be utterly void and of no effect.

Forfeiture of licence in case of seditious or immoral lectures.

XXXIII. And be it further enacted, That all or any of the pecuniary fines, penalties, or forfeitures, exceeding the sum of twenty pounds, incurred under this act in that part of Great Britain called England, or in Ireland, may be recovered by action of debt in any of his majesty's courts of record at Westminster and Dublin respectively, and in Scotland in the court of session there; and it shall be sufficient to declare in that part of Great Britain called England, and in Ireland, or conclude in Scotland, that the defendant or defender is indebted to the plaintiff or pursuer in the sum of (being the sum demanded by the said action), being forfeited by an act made in the sixtieth year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled An Act [here insert the title of this act]; and the plaintiff or pursuer, if he shall recover in such action, shall have his full costs or expenses; and any pecuniary penalty imposed by this act, not exceeding the sum of twenty pounds, and for the recovery whereof no provision is herein-before con-

Recovery of penalties.

Application of penalties.

Imitation of Actions.

Double costs.

Imitation of actions, &c. in Scotland.

XXXVII. And be it further enacted, That every action and suit which shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons in Scotland, for any thing done or acted in pursuance of this act, shall in like manner be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and shall be brought in the court of session in Scotland, and the defender or defenders may plead that the matter complained of was done in pursuance of this act, and may give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if such action or suit shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, then the same shall be dismissed; and in such case, or if the defender or defenders shall be assolaid, or the pursuer or pursuers shall suffer the action or suit to fall asleep, or a decision shall be pronounced against the pursuer or pursuers upon the relevancy, the defender or defenders shall have double costs or expenses, which he or they shall and may recover in such and the same manner as any defender can by law recover costs or expenses in other cases.

Double costs.

XXXVIII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That no person shall be prosecuted by virtue of this act, for any thing done or committed contrary to the provisions herein-before contained, unless the prosecution shall be commenced within six calendar months after the offence committed.

Prosecutions to be commenced within six months after offences.

XXXIX. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, varied, or repealed, by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

Act may be altered or repealed this session.

XL. And be it farther enacted, That this act shall commence and have effect within the city of London, and within twenty miles thereof, from the day next after the day of passing this act, and shall commence and have effect within all other parts of the kingdom, from the expiration of ten days next after the day of passing this act; and shall be and continue in force for five years from the day of passing this act, and until the end of the then next session of parliament.

No. V.—Copy of the Blasphemous and Seditious Libels Bill.

60 Geo. III. Chap. 8.

An Act for the more effectual Prevention and Punishment of blasphemous and seditious Libels.

WHEREAS it is expedient to make more effectual provision for the punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels; be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act, in every case in which any verdict or judgment by default shall be had against any person for composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous libel, or any seditious libel, tending to bring into hatred or contempt the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the regent, or the government and constitution of the united kingdom as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or to excite his majesty's subjects to attempt the alteration of any matter in church or state as by law established, otherwise than by lawful means, it shall be lawful for the judge, or the court before whom or in which such verdict shall have been given, or the court in which such judgment by default shall be had, to make an order for the seizure and carrying away and detaining in safe custody, in such manner as shall be directed in such order, all copies of the libel which shall be in the possession of the person against whom such verdict or judgment shall have been had, or in the possession of any other person named in the order for his use; evidence upon oath having been previously given to the satisfaction of such court or judge, that a copy or copies of the said libel is or are in the possession of such other person for the use of the person against whom such verdict or judgment shall have been had as aforesaid; and in every such case it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, or for any constable or other peace officer acting under any such order, or for any person or persons acting with or in aid of any such justice of the peace, constable, or other peace officer, to search for any copies of such libel in any house, building, or other place whatsoever belonging to the person against whom any such verdict or judgment shall have been had, or to any other person so named, in whose possession any copies of any such libel belonging to the person against whom any such verdict or judgment shall have been had, shall be; and in case admission shall be refused or not obtained within a reasonable time after it shall have been first demanded, to enter by force by day into any such house, building, or place whatsoever, and to carry away all copies of the libel there found, and to detain the same in safe custody until the same shall be restored under the provisions of this act, or disposed of according to any further order made in relation thereto.

Court to make order for the seizure of copies of the libel in possession of the persons against whom verdicts shall have been had, &c.

II. And be it further enacted, That if in any such case as aforesaid, judgment shall be arrested, or if, after judgment shall have been entered, the same shall be reversed upon any writ of error, all copies so seized shall be forthwith returned to the person or persons from whom the same shall have been so taken as aforesaid, free of all charge and expence, and without the payment of any fees whatever; and in every case in which final judgment shall be entered upon the verdict so found ing a right to vote for a member to serve in parliament for any city, borough, town or place, attending any meeting of such city, borough, town or place, which may be called by the mayor or other head officer.

Copies of libels so seized to be restored if judgment for defendant; otherwise to be disposed of as the court shall direct.

Punishing persons attending meetings contrary to the provisions of this act.

V. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall knowingly and wilfully attend any meeting holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, upon the subject thereof, not being a freeholder, copyholder, heritor, or householder of or inhabitant usually residing in the county or riding, or division of the county, or the stewartry, within and for which the meeting shall be holden, when such meeting shall be holden for any county, riding, division or stewartry, or not being a freeman or member of the corporation, if the meeting be of any corporate body, or a householder of or inhabitant usually residing, or freeholder or copyholder having such estate as aforesaid, in the city, borough, or town corporate, parish or township (as the case may be), within and for which any such meeting shall be holden, and not being such member of the Commons House of Parliament, attending as aforesaid, such person being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment, not exceeding twelve calendar months, at the discretion of the Court in which the conviction shall be had.

Allowing justices to resort to assemblies.

VI. And be it further enacted, That all justices of the peace, sheriffs and under sheriffs, mayors, and other head officers aforesaid, are hereby respectively authorized and empowered, within their respective jurisdictions, where any meeting or assembly shall be holden, or be proposed to be holden, for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution or address, upon the subject thereof, to proceed to the place where such meeting or assembly shall be holden, or shall be proposed to be holden, and there to do or order or cause to be done all such acts, matters, and things, as the case may require, which they are hereby enabled to do, or to order to be done, or which they are otherwise by law enabled or entitled to do, or to order to be done; and it shall be lawful for all justices of the peace, sheriffs, under sheriffs, mayors, and other head officers respectively as aforesaid, to require and take the assistance of any number of constables, or other officers of the peace, within the district or place wherein such meeting as hereinbefore mentioned shall be holden, or any other persons in their aid or assistance, when they shall deem such aid or assistance to be necessary and requisite.

Cases where meetings shall be deemed unlawful.

VII. And be it further enacted, That in case any meeting shall be holden in pursuance of any such notice as aforesaid, and such notice shall express or purport that any matter or thing by law established may be altered otherwise than by the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled; or shall tend to incite or stir up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or of the government and constitution of this realm, as by law established; every such meeting shall be deemed and taken to be an unlawful assembly.

Persons attending meetings contrary to this Act, to be required by proclamation to depart.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall attend any meeting whatever, holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution or address, upon the subject thereof, contrary to the provisions of this act, it shall be lawful for any one or more justice or justices of the peace in and for any county, or the sheriff or under sheriff of any county, or the mayor or other head officer, or any justice of the peace of any city or town corporate, within which any such meeting shall be held, to make or cause to be made proclamation in the king's name, in the form directed in this act, commanding every person so unlawfully attending any such meeting immediately and peaceably to depart therefrom; and if any person or persons so ordered to depart as aforesaid, shall not, upon such proclamation, depart from any such meeting within the space of a quarter of an hour after such proclamation made, that then and in every such case, every such person so continuing and not departing as aforesaid, shall, upon being thereof lawfully convicted, be adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall be liable to be transported for any period not exceeding seven years.

Form of proclamation.

IX. And be it further enacted, That the order and form of the proclamation to be made as aforesaid, shall be as hereafter followeth (that is to say), the justice of the peace or other person, or one of the justices of peace, or one of the other persons authorized by this act to make the said proclamation, shall, among the said persons assembled, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice, command or cause to be commanded silence to be, while proclamation is making; and after that shall openly, and with loud voice, make or cause to be made proclamation in these words, or to the like effect :

“ Member of householder of
“ or inhabitant usually residing, or freeholder in, or “ copyholder in , naming the county, riding, division, stewardry, “ city, borough, town, body corporate, parish, or township, as the case may be], or
“ who is not entitled to attend this meeting, immediately to depart from this meet“ ing to his lawful business. GOD save the King.”

X. And be it further enacted, that when any such proclamation as aforesaid shall have been made at any meeting, it shall be lawful for any person lawfully attending such meeting, to seize and apprehend any person not entitled to attend such meeting, who shall not upon the making of such proclamation forthwith depart, and to carry such person before any justice of the peace of the county, riding, division, stewardry, city, or town corporate, within which such meeting shall be held, to be dealt with according to law.

Persons not entitled to attend meetings, and not departing upon proclamation, may be carried before a justice.

XI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any one or more, justice or justices of the peace in and for any county, or for the sheriff or under sheriff of any county, or for the mayor or other head officer, or any justice of the peace of any city or town corporate, within which any meeting shall be held, or persons shall assemble for the purpose of holding any meeting contrary to the provisions of this act, or where any person or persons not entitled to attend any meeting or assembly as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to depart therefrom for the space of a quarter of an hour after such proclamation made as aforesaid, to make or cause to be made proclamation in the king's name, in the manner and form hereinafter directed, to command all persons there assembled to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business; and if any such persons so assembled as aforesaid shall, to the number of twelve or more, notwithstanding such proclamation made, continue together by the space of half an hour after such proclamation made, that then and in every such case every person so continuing, being thereof legally convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for any term not exceeding seven years.

Punishing persons assembled contrary to this act, not dispersing after being required so to do, by proclamation.

XII. And be it further enacted, That the order and form of the proclamation to be made as aforesaid, shall be as hereafter followeth (that is to say); the justice or justices of the peace, or other person authorized by this act to make such proclamation, shall, among the said persons assembled, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice, command or cause to be commanded silence to be, while proclamation is making, and after that shall openly, and with loud voice, make or cause to be made proclamation in these words, or to the like effect :

“ OUR sovereign lord the king chargeth and commandeth all persons here assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business. GOD save the King.”

XIII. And be it further enacted, That if one or more justice or justices of the peace present at any meeting requiring such notice as aforesaid, shall think fit to order any person or persons who shall attend such meeting in any manner contrary to the provisions of this act, or who shall at such meeting proceed to propound or maintain any proposition for altering any thing by law established, otherwise than by the authority of the King, Lords, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, or shall wilfully and advisedly make any proposition, or hold any discourse for the purpose of inciting and stirring up the people to hatred or contempt of the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the government and constitution of this realm as by law established, to be taken into custody, to be dealt with according to law; and in case the said justice or justices, or any of them, or any peace officer acting under his or their or any of their orders, shall be forcibly obstructed in taking into custody any person or persons so ordered to be taken into custody, then and in such case it shall be lawful for any such justice or justices thereupon to make or cause to be made such proclamation as last aforesaid, in manner aforesaid; and if any persons, to the number of twelve or more, being required or commanded by such proclamation to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart as last aforesaid, shall, to the number of twelve or more, notwithstanding such proclamation made, remain or continue together by the space of half an hour after such command or request made by proclamation, that then such continuing together to the number of twelve or more, after such command or request made by proclamation, shall be adjudged felony, and the offenders therein shall be adjudged felons, and shall be liable to be transported for any term not exceeding seven years.

Punishment of
persons obstructing justices, &c.

XIV. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons do or shall, with force and arms, wilfully and knowingly oppose, obstruct, or in any manner wilfully and knowingly let, hinder, or hurt any justice of the peace, or other person authorized as aforesaid, or any person acting in aid or assistance of any justice of the peace who shall attend or disperse any such meeting as aforesaid, or shall be going to attend or to disperse any such meeting, or any justice of the peace or peace officer, or any person or persons acting in aid or assistance of any justice of the peace or other officer who shall begin to proclaim, or be going or endeavouring to make any proclamation authorized or directed to be made under the provisions of this act, whereby such proclamation shall not be made; and also if any persons so being assembled as aforesaid, to whom any such proclamation as aforesaid should or ought to have been made, if the same had not been hindered as aforesaid, shall, to the number of twelve or more, continue together, and not disperse themselves within half an hour after such let or hindrance so made, having knowledge of such let or hindrance so made; and also if any person so being at any such assembly as aforesaid shall, with force and arms, wilfully and knowingly oppose, obstruct, or in any manner wilfully and knowingly let, hinder, or hurt any justice of the peace or other magistrate, or any peace officer or other person acting in their aid or assistance, in the arresting, apprehending, or taking into custody, or detaining, in execution of any of the provisions of this act, any person or persons, or endeavouring so to do, that then and in every such case every person so offending, being thereof legally convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for any term not exceeding seven years.

Justices, &c.
indemnified in
case of killing
or maiming.

XV. And be it further enacted, That if the persons assembled at any meeting or assembly held contrary to the provisions of this act, or which shall become and be an unlawful assembly, under the provisions of this act, or any of them, shall happen to be killed, maimed, or hurt, in the dispersing, or endeavouring to disperse, or arresting or apprehending or detaining them, or any of them, or in the endeavouring so to do, by reason of their resisting the persons so dispersing, seizing, or apprehending, or endeavouring to disperse, seize, or apprehend them, that every such justice of the peace, sheriff, under sheriff, mayor, head officer, magistrate, high or petty constable, or other peace officer, and all and singular persons being aiding and assisting to them, or any of them, shall be free, discharged, and indemnified, as well against the king's majesty, his heirs and successors, as against all and every other person and persons, of, for, or concerning the killing, maiming, or hurting of any such person or persons so continuing together as aforesaid, that shall happen to be so killed, maimed, or hurt as aforesaid.

Act not to ex-

room.

XVI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein-before contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any meeting or assembly which shall be wholly holden in any room or apartment of any house or building; any thing herein-before contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Act not to extend to meetings for returning members to parliament.

XVII. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any meeting held in any county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, returning any member to serve in parliament, after the issuing and before the return of any writ for the election of any member to serve in parliament for such county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place.

Persons not to attend meetings with arms, weapons, &c.

XVIII. And be it further declared and enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person to attend, proceed to, or be present at any meeting whatsoever, which shall be holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon, or proceeding to deliberate upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, on the subject thereof, armed with any gun, pistol, sword, dagger, pike, bludgeon, or other offensive weapon; and that every person who shall offend in the premises, shall, upon being convicted thereof, be fined and imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the Court before which such conviction shall be had: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any justice of the peace, sheriff, under sheriff, mayor, or other head officer aforesaid, or to any peace officer, or to any other person or persons acting in their aid or assistance, who shall attend, proceed to, or be present at any such meeting as aforesaid.

XIX. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person to attend, proceed to, or be present at, or return from any meeting whatever, which shall be holden for the purpose or on the pretext of deliberating upon, or proceeding to deliberate upon any public grievance, or upon any matter or thing relating to any trade, manufacture, business, or profession, or upon any matter in church or state, or of considering, proposing, or agreeing to any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, resolution, or address, on the subject thereof, with any flag, banner, or ensign, or displaying or exhibiting any device, badge, or emblem, or with any drum or military or other music, or in military array or order; and that every person who shall offend in the premises, shall, upon being convicted thereof, be fined and imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the Court before which such conviction shall be had.

Persons not to attend meetings with flags, banners, and other ensigns or emblems.

XX. And be it further enacted, That the sheriffs depute and their substitutes, stewards depute and their substitutes, justices of the peace, magistrates of royal burghs, and all other inferior judges and magistrates, and also all high and petty constables, or other peace officers of any county, stewartry, city or town, within that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland, shall have such and the same powers and authorities for putting this present act in execution within Scotland, as the justices of the peace, and peace officers and constables aforesaid, respectively have, by virtue of this act, within and for other parts of the United Kingdom.

Sheriff depute, &c. in Scotland, to have the same powers as magistrates in England.

XXI. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace, assembled at any quarter or general sessions of the peace, in any case in which they shall deem it expedient for the purpose of preventing tumultuous meetings, to divide any parish or township within their jurisdiction, having a population exceeding, in the judgment of the said justices, twenty thousand inhabitants, into two or more divisions, for all the purposes of this act, and to assign the boundaries of such divisions; and that a registry of such divisions so made, specifying and describing the boundaries so assigned, shall be entered with the clerk of the peace of the county, riding, or division within which such parish or township is situate, and a duplicate thereof shall be transmitted to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, or to the minister and elders, or to the kirk session of the parish or township so divided, to be by them preserved and kept with the books of such parish or township, and copies thereof shall be put up, and from time to time (in case of the removal) replaced, upon the doors of the church of such parish or township; and when any such parish or township shall be so divided, each of such separate divisions shall, for all the purposes of this act be deemed a separate parish or township; and all the clauses, provisions, regulations, matters, and things, in this act contained, relating to any assemblies or meetings in parishes or townships, shall apply and be enforced, as to all such separate division of parishes or townships, as fully and effectually as if the same were severally and separately repeated and re-enacted in relation thereto: provided always, that no such division shall contain a population, which in the judgment of the said justices shall consist of less than ten thousand persons.

Justices at sessions may subdivide large parishes and Townships for all the purposes of this act.

XXII. And be it further enacted, That every extra-parochial place shall be deemed and taken to be a parish or township, for all the purposes of this act; and all the clauses, provisions, regulations, matters and things in this act contained, relating to any assemblies or meetings in parishes or townships, shall apply and be enforced as to all extra-parochial places, as fully and effectually as if the same were severally and separately repeated and re-enacted in relation thereto.

Extra-parochial places to be deemed parishes for the purposes of this act.

XXIII. And whereas by an act passed in the fifty-seventh year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled an act for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies, certain regulations are enacted in relation to meetings in the city or liberties of Westminster, or county of Middlesex, which might prevent any meeting under the provisions of this act, in the parishes of Saint John and Saint Margaret, Westminster; be it therefore enacted, That it shall be lawful to hold any meetings in such parishes respectively, which may be held under the provisions of this act, within the distance of one mile from the gate of Westminster-hall, provided that the same shall not be held in Old or New Palace-yard at any time during the sitting of Parliament; any thing in the said recited act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Meetings may be held under this act in certain parishes in Westminster, within one mile of Westminster-hall gate, notwithstanding act of 57 G. 3, c. 19.

XXIV. Provided always, and be it enacted and declared, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to render lawful any notice, or any

assembly or meeting, or any act or thing which may be done at any assembly or meeting in pursuance of any such notice, or the attendance of any person or persons, which notice, assembly, meeting act or attendance, would have been contrary to law if this act had not been made.

Offenders may be indicted, if not prosecuted
under this act.

XXV. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent any prosecution by indictment or otherwise, for any thing which may be an offence within the intent and meaning of this act, and which might have been so prosecuted if this act had not been made, unless the offender shall have been prosecuted for such offence under this act, and convicted or acquitted of such offence.

XXVI. And whereas it is expedient that houses and places used for the purpose of publicly delivering lectures, or of holding debates should be regulated; be it therefore enacted, That every house, room, field, or other place, at or in which any person shall publicly read, or at or in which any lecture or discourse shall be publicly delivered, or any public debate shall be had, on any subject whatever, for the purpose of raising or collecting money, or any other valuable thing, from the persons admitted, or to which any person shall be admitted by payment of money, or by any ticket or token of any kind delivered in consideration of money, or any other valuable thing, or in consequence of paying or giving or having paid or given, or having agreed to pay or give, in any manner, any money or other valuable thing or where any money or other valuable thing, shall be received from any person admitted, either under pretence of paying for any refreshment or other thing, or under any other pretence, or for any other cause, or by means of any device or contrivance whatever, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, unless the same shall have been previously licensed in manner hereinafter mentioned; and the person by whom such house, room, field, or place shall be opened or used, for any of the purposes aforesaid, shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds for every day or time that such house, room, field, or place shall be opened or used as aforesaid, to such person as will sue for the same, and be otherwise punished as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses; and every person managing or conducting the proceedings, or acting as moderator, president, or chairman, at such House, room, field, or place, so opened or used as aforesaid, or therein debating, publicly reading, or delivering any discourse or lecture; and also every person who shall pay, give, collect, or receive, or agree to pay, give, or receive any money or thing, for or in respect of the admission of any person into any such house, room, field or place, or shall deliver out, distribute, or receive any such ticket or tickets, or token or tokens as aforesaid, knowing such house, room, field or place to be opened or used for any such purpose as aforesaid, shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.

Penalty on persons by whom such places shall be opened.

Prosecuting masters of such places.

XXVII. And be it farther enacted, That every person who shall at any time hereafter appear, act, or behave him or herself as master or mistress, or as the person having the command, government, or management of any such house, room, field, or place as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be a person by whom the same is opened or used as aforesaid, and shall be liable to be sued or prosecuted, and punished as such, notwithstanding he or she be not in fact the real owner or occupier thereof.

Magistrates may demand
admission to
places :

XXVIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace of any county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, who shall by information upon oath have reason to suspect that any house, room, field, or place, or any parts or part thereof, are or is opened or used for the purpose of publicly reading or delivering lectures or discourses, or for public debate, contrary to the provisions of this act, to go to such house, room, field, or place, and demand to be admitted therein, and in case such justice or justices shall be refused admittance to such house, room, field, or place, or any part thereof, the same shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, within the intent and meaning of this act; and all and every the provisions herein-before contained respecting any house, room, field, or place herein-before declared to be a disorderly house or place, shall be applied to such house, room, field, or place, where such admittance shall have been refused as aforesaid; and every person refusing such admittance shall forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.

Penalty for refusal, 20l.

Justices may license places

XXIX. Provided nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for two or more justices of the peace for the county, riding, division, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, where any house, room, or other buildings shall be intended to be opened for any of the purposes aforesaid, by writing under their hands and seals, at the quarter or general sessions of the peace, or at any special session to be held for the particular purpose, to grant a licence to any person or persons desiring the same, to open such house, room, or other building for the purpose of delivering, for money, any such public reading, lectures, or discourses as aforesaid, or for the purpose of holding debates on any subjects, the same being clearly expressed in such license, for which license a fee of one shilling and no more shall be paid; and the same shall be in force for the space of one year and no longer, or for any less space of time therein to be specified; and which license it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace of the same county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, at any general quarter or general sessions of the peace, to revoke and declare void and no longer in force, by any order of such justices, a copy whereof shall be delivered to or served upon the person to whom the said license so revoked shall have been granted, or shall be left at the house, room, or building for which such licence shall have been granted; and thereupon such license shall cease and determine, and be thenceforth utterly void and of no effect.

XXX. Provided always, and be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any justice or justices of the peace of any county, stewartry, city, borough, town, or place, where any such house, room, or other building shall be licensed, as herein provided, to go to such house, room, or building so licensed, at the time of any such public reading, or delivering any such lecture or discourse, or of holding any debate therein as aforesaid, or at the time appointed for any such public reading, or delivering any such lecture or discourse, or of holding any debate, and demand to be admitted therein; and in case such justice or justices shall be refused admittance to such house, room, or building, the same shall be deemed, notwithstanding any such license as aforesaid, a disorderly house or place within the meaning of this act; and all and every the provisions herein-before contained respecting any house, room, field, or place, herein-before declared to be a disorderly house or place, shall be applied to such house, room, or building so licensed as aforesaid, where such admittance shall have been refused as aforesaid; and every person refusing such admittance shall forfeit the sum of twenty pounds to any person who shall sue for the same.

Justices may inspect licensed places:

Penalty for refusing admittance, 20l.

XXXI. Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any lecture or discourses to be delivered in any of the Universities of the united kingdom, by any member thereof, or any person authorized by the chancellor, vice-chancellor or other proper officers of such Universities respectively; or to any public reading, or lecture or discourse, to be delivered in the public hall of any of the inns of court or chancery, by any person authorized by the benchers of the inns of court; or by the professors in Gresham College; or to the professors in the college established for the education of the civil servants of the East India Company, or the seminaries established for the education of their military service; or to any society or body of men incorporated or established by royal charter, or by authority of parliament; and that no payment made to any schoolmaster, or other person by law allowed to teach and instruct youth, in respect of any public readings, or lectures or discourses, delivered by such schoolmaster or other person, for the instruction only of such youth as shall be committed to his instruction, shall be deemed a payment of money for admission to public readings, or such lectures or discourses, within the intent and meaning of this act.

Lectures at the universities, inns of court, Gresham college, &c. excepted.

XXXII. Provided also, and be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any two justices of the peace, acting for any county, stewartry, riding, division, city, town, or place, upon evidence on oath that any house, room, or place so licensed and opened as aforesaid, is commonly used for the purpose of public reading or delivering lectures or discourses of a seditious, irreligious, or immoral tendency, to adjudge and declare the license for opening the same to have been forfeited; and such license shall thereupon cease and determine, and shall thenceforth be utterly void and of no effect.

Forfeiture of licence in case of seditious or immoral lectures.

XXXIII. And be it further enacted, That all or any of the pecuniary fines, penalties, or forfeitures, exceeding the sum of twenty pounds, incurred under this act in that part of Great Britain called England, or in Ireland, may be recovered by action of debt in any of his majesty's courts of record at Westminster and Dublin respectively, and in Scotland in the court of session there; and it shall be sufficient to declare in that part of Great Britain called England, and in Ireland, or conclude in Scotland, that the defendant or defender is indebted to the plaintiff or pursuer in the sum of (being the sum demanded by the said action), being forfeited by an act made in the sixtieth year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled An Act [here insert the title of this act]; and the plaintiff or pursuer, if he shall recover in such action, shall have his full costs or expenses; and any pecuniary penalty imposed by this act, not exceeding the sum of twenty pounds, and for the recovery whereof no provision is herein-before contained, shall and may be recovered before any justice or justices of the peace for the county, stewardry, riding, division, city, town, or place, in which the same shall be incurred, or the person having incurred the same shall happen to be, in a summary way; and in case such last-mentioned penalty shall not be forthwith paid, such justice or justices shall, by warrant under his or their hand and seal or hands and seals, and directed to any constable or other peace officer, cause the same to be levied by distress and sale of the offender's goods and chattels, together with all costs and charges attending such distress and sale; and in case no sufficient distress can be had or made, such justice or justices shall commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction for such county, stewardry, riding, division, city, borough, town, or place, there to remain, without bail or mainprize, for any time not exceeding six calendar months, nor less than three calendar months: provided always, that no person shall be prosecuted or sued for any pecuniary penalty imposed by this act, unless such prosecution shall be commenced, or such action shall be brought, within three calendar months next after such penalty shall have been incurred.

Application of penalties.

XXXIV. And be it further enacted, That all pecuniary penalties and forfeitures imposed by this act, shall when recovered, either by action in any court or in a summary way before any justice, be applied and disposed of in manner hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, one moiety thereof to the plaintiff in any such action, or to the informer before any justice, and the other moiety thereof to his majesty, his heirs and successors.

Form of conviction.

XXXV. And be it further enacted, That the justice or justices of the peace by or before whom any offender shall be convicted under this act, shall cause the said conviction to be made out in the manner and form following, or in any other form of words to the like effect, mutatis mutandis ; that is to say,

[illegible]

Imitation of Actions

XXXVI. And be it further enacted, That any action and suit which shall be brought or commenced against any justice or justices of the peace, constable, peace officer, or other person or persons, in that part of Great Britain called England, or in Ireland, for any thing done or acted in pursuance of this act, shall be commenced within six calendar months next after the fact committed, and not afterwards; and the venue in every such action or suit shall be laid in the proper county where the fact was committed, and not elsewhere; and the defendant or defendants in every such action or suit may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon; and if such action or suit shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, or the venue shall be laid in any other place than as aforesaid, then the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant or defendants; and in such case, or if the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant or defendants upon the merits, or if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall become nonsuit, or discontinue his, her, or their actions after appearance, or if upon demurrer judgment shall be given against the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall have double costs, which he or they shall and may recover in such and the same manner as any defendant can by law in other cases.

Double costs.

Imitation of actions, &c. in Scotland.

XXXVII. And be it further enacted, That every action and suit which shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons in Scotland, for any thing done or acted in pursuance of this act, shall in like manner be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and shall be brought in the court of session in Scotland, and the defender or defenders may plead that the matter complained of was done in pursuance of this act, and may give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if such action or suit shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, then the same shall be dismissed; and in such case, or if the defender or defenders shall be assolaid, or the pursuer or pursuers shall suffer the action or suit to fall asleep, or a decision shall be pronounced against the pursuer or pursuers upon the relevancy, the defender or defenders shall have double costs or expenses, which he or they shall and may recover in such and the same manner as any defender can by law recover costs or expenses in other cases.

Double costs.

XXXVIII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That no person shall be prosecuted by virtue of this act, for any thing done or committed contrary to the provisions herein-before contained, unless the prosecution shall be commenced within six calendar months after the offence committed.

Prosecutions to be commenced within six months after offences.

XXXIX. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, varied, or repealed, by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

Act may be altered or repealed this session.

XL. And be it farther enacted, That this act shall commence and have effect within the city of London, and within twenty miles thereof, from the day next after the day of passing this act, and shall commence and have effect within all other parts of the kingdom, from the expiration of ten days next after the day of passing this act; and shall be and continue in force for five years from the day of passing this act, and until the end of the then next session of parliament.

No. V.—Copy of the Blasphemous and Seditious Libels Bill.

60 Geo. III. Chap. 8.

An Act for the more effectual Prevention and Punishment of blasphemous and seditious Libels.

WHEREAS it is expedient to make more effectual provision for the punishment of blasphemous and seditious libels; be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act, in every case in which any verdict or judgment by default shall be had against any person for composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous libel, or any seditious libel, tending to bring into hatred or contempt the person of his majesty, his heirs or successors, or the regent, or the government and constitution of the united kingdom as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or to excite his majesty's subjects to attempt the alteration of any matter in church or state as by law established, otherwise than by lawful means, it shall be lawful for the judge, or the court before whom or in which such verdict shall have been given, or the court in which such judgment by default shall be had, to make an order for the seizure and carrying away and detaining in safe custody, in such manner as shall be directed in such order, all copies of the libel which shall be in the possession of the person against whom such verdict or judgment shall have been had, or in the possession of any other person named in the order for his use; evidence upon oath having been previously given to the satisfaction of such court or judge, that a copy or copies of the said libel is or are in the possession of such other person for the use of the person against whom such verdict or judgment shall have been had as aforesaid; and in every such case it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, or for any constable or other peace officer acting under any such order, or for any person or persons acting with or in aid of any such justice of the peace, constable, or other peace officer, to search for any copies of such libel in any house, building, or other place whatsoever belonging to the person against whom any such verdict or judgment shall have been had, or to any other person so named, in whose possession any copies of any such libel belonging to the person against whom any such verdict or judgment shall have been had, shall be; and in case admission shall be refused or not obtained within a reasonable time after it shall have been first demanded, to enter by force by day into any such house, building, or place whatsoever, and to carry away all copies of the libel there found, and to detain the same in safe custody until the same shall be restored under the provisions of this act, or disposed of according to any further order made in relation thereto.

Court to make order for the seizure of copies of the libel in possession of the persons against whom verdicts shall have been had, &c.

II. And be it further enacted, That if in any such case as aforesaid, judgment shall be arrested, or if, after judgment shall have been entered, the same shall be reversed upon any writ of error, all copies so seized shall be forthwith returned to the person or persons from whom the same shall have been so taken as aforesaid, free of all charge and expence, and without the payment of any fees whatever; and in every case in which final judgment shall be entered upon the verdict so found against the person or persons charged with having composed, printed, or published such libel, then all copies so seized shall be disposed of as the court in which such judgment shall be given shall order and direct.

Court of Justiciary in Scotland to make order for seizing copies of libels, &c.

III. Provided always, and be it enacted, That in Scotland, in every case in which any person or persons shall be found guilty before the court of justiciary, of composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel, or whose sentence of fugitation shall have been pronounced against any person or persons, in consequence of their failing to appear to answer to any indictment charging them with having composed, printed, or published any such libel, then and in either of such cases, it shall and may be lawful for the said court to make an order for the seizure, carrying away, and detaining in safe custody, all copies of the libel in the possession of any such person or persons, or in the possession of any other person or persons named in such order, for his or their use, evidence upon oath having been previously given to the satisfaction of such court or judge, that a copy or copies of the said libel is or are in the possession of such other person for the use of the person against whom such verdict or judgment shall have been had as aforesaid; and every such order so made shall and may be carried into effect, in such and the same manner as any order made by the court of justiciary, or any circuit court of justiciary, may be carried into effect according to the law and practice of Scotland: provided always, that in the event of any person or persons being reposed against any such sentence of fugitation, and being thereafter acquitted, all copies so seized shall be forthwith returned to the person or persons from whom the same shall have been so taken as aforesaid; and in all other cases, the copies so seized shall be disposed of in such manner as the said court may direct.

Punishment of persons convicted of second offence.

IV. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, after the passing of this act, be legally convicted of having after the passing of this act composed, printed, or published any blasphemous libel or any such seditious libel as aforesaid, and shall, after being so convicted, offend a second time, and be thereof legally convicted before any commission of Oyer and Terminer or Gaol Delivery, or in his majesty's court of King's-bench, such person may, on such second conviction, be adjudged, at the discretion of the court, either to suffer such punishment as may now by law be inflicted in cases of high misdemeanors, or to be banished from the united kingdom, and all other parts of his majesty's dominions, for such term of years as the court in which such conviction shall take place shall order.

Persons not departing within thirty days after sentence of banishment, may be conveyed out of his majesty's dominions. Persons banished abroad at large within his majesty's dominions to suffer transportation.

V. And be it further enacted, That in case any person so sentenced and ordered to be banished as aforesaid, shall not depart from this united kingdom within thirty days after the pronouncing of such sentence and order as aforesaid, for the purpose of going into such banishment as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for his majesty to convey such person to such parts out of the dominions of his said majesty, as his majesty by and with the advice of his Privy Council shall direct.

VI. And be it further enacted, That if any offender who shall be so ordered by any such court as aforesaid to be banished in manner aforesaid, shall after the end of forty days from the time such sentence and order hath been pronounced, be at large within any part of the united kingdom, or any other part of his majesty's dominions, without some lawful cause, before the expiration of the term for which such offender shall have been so ordered to be banished as aforesaid, every such offender being so at large as aforesaid, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be transported to such place as shall be appointed by his majesty, for any term not exceeding fourteen years; and such offender may be tried, either before any justice of Assize, Oyer and Terminer, Great Sessions, or Gaol Delivery, for the county, city, liberty, borough, or place where such offender shall be apprehended and taken, or where he or she was sentenced to banishment; and the clerk of assize, clerk of the peace, or other clerk or officer of the court having the custody of the records where such order of banishment shall have been made, shall, when thereunto required on his majesty's behalf, make out and give a certificate in writing, signed by him, containing the effect and substance only (omitting the formal part) of every indictment and conviction of such offender, and of the order for his or her banishment, to the justices of assize, Oyer and Terminer, Great Sessions, or Gaol Delivery, where such offender shall be indicted, for which certificate six shillings and eight pence, and no more shall be paid, and which certificate shall be sufficient proof of the conviction and order for banishment of any such offender.

Certificate to be given of conviction of former libel.

VII. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of assize, clerk of the peace, or other clerk or officer of the court having the custody of the records where any offender shall have been convicted of having composed, printed, or published any blasphemous or seditious libel, shall, upon request of his majesty's behalf, make out and give a certificate in writing, signed by him, containing the effect and substance only (omitting the formal part) of every indictment and conviction of such offender, and of the order for his or her banishment, to the justices of assize, Oyer and Terminer, Great Sessions, or Gaol Delivery, where such offender shall be indicted, for which certificate six shillings and eight pence, and no more shall be paid, and which certificate shall be sufficient proof of the conviction and order for banishment of any such offender.

the effect and substance only (omitting the formal part) of every indictment and conviction of such offender, to the justices of assize, Oyer and Terminer, Great Sessions, or Gaol Delivery, where such offender or offenders shall be indicted for any second offence of composing, printing, or publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel, for which certificate six shillings and eight pence and no more shall be paid, and which certificate shall be sufficient proof of the conviction of such offender.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That any action and suit which shall be brought or commenced against any justice or justices of the peace, constable, peace officer or other person or persons, within that part of Great Britain called England, or in Ireland, for any thing done or acted in pursuance of this act, shall be commenced within six calendar months next after the fact committed, and not afterwards; and the venue in every such action or suit shall be laid in the proper county where the fact was committed, and not elsewhere; and the defendant or defendants in every such action or suit may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon; and if such action or suit shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, or the venue shall be laid in any other place than as aforesaid, then the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant or defendants; and in such case, or if the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant or defendants upon the merits, or if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall become nonsuit, or discontinue his, her, or their actions after appearance, or if, upon demurrer, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall have double costs, which he or they shall and may recover in such and the same manner as any defendant can by law in other cases.

Limitation of actions.

Double costs.

IX. And be it further enacted, That every action and suit which shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons in Scotland for any thing done or acted in pursuance of this act, shall in like manner be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and shall be brought in the court of session in Scotland; and the defender or defenders may plead that the matter complained of was done in pursuance of this act, and may give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if such action or suit shall be brought or commenced after the time limited for bringing the same, then the same shall be dismissed; and in such case, or if the defender or defenders shall be assoilzied, or the pursuer or pursuers shall suffer the action or suit to fall asleep, or a decision shall be pronounced against the pursuer or pursuers upon the relevancy, the defender or defenders shall have double costs, which he or they shall and may receive in such and the same manner as any defender can by law recover costs or expences in other cases.

Limitation of actions, &c. in Scotland.

Double costs.

X. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or considered as in any respect altering the law or practice of Scotland regarding the punishment of persons convicted of composing, printing, publishing, or circulating any blasphemous or seditious libel.

Not to alter the law of Scotland in respect to punishment for libels.

XI. And be it further enacted, that this act may be repealed in the whole or in any part thereof, or in any manner altered or amended, during the present session of parliament.

Act may be repealed or altered this session.

No. VI.—Copy of the Newspaper Stamp Duties Bill. 60 Geo. III. Chap. 9.

An Act to subject certain Publications to the Duties of Stamps upon Newspapers, and to make other Regulations for restraining the Abuses arising from the Publication of blasphemous and seditious Libels.

WHEREAS pamphlets and printed papers containing observations upon public events and occurrences, tending to excite hatred and contempt of the government and constitution of these realms as by law established, and also vilifying our holy religion, have lately been published in great numbers, and at very small prices; and it is expedient that the same should be restrained: may it therefore please your majesty that it may be enacted: and be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after ten days after the passing of this act, all pamphlets and papers containing any public news, intelligence or occurrences, or any remarks or observations thereon, or upon any matter in church or state, printed in any part of the united kingdom for sale, and published periodically, or in parts or numbers omitting the same, 20l.

VI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to subject any person publishing any pamphlet or paper to any penalty for any allowance in price made by the person for whom and on whose behalf, and for whose profit, benefit, or advantage, the same shall have been first published, to any bookseller or distributor, or other person to whom the same shall be sold for the purpose of retailing the same.

Not to extend to the allowance made to distributors who buy to retail.

VII. And be it further enacted, That all pamphlets and papers which are by this act declared to be subject to the stamp duties upon newspapers, shall be freed and discharged from all the stamp duties and regulations contained in any act of parliament relating to pamphlets.

Pamphlets liable to stamp duties freed from all regulations relating to pamphlets.

VIII. And be it further enacted, That no person, from and after thirty days after the passing of this act, shall print or publish for sale, any newspaper, or any pamphlet or other paper containing any public news, intelligence, or occurrences, or any remarks or observations thereon, or upon any matter in church or state, which shall not exceed two sheets, or which shall be published for sale at a less price than sixpence, until he or she shall have entered into a recognizance before a baron of the exchequer in England, Scotland, or Ireland respectively, as the case may be, if such newspaper or pamphlet, or other paper aforesaid, shall be printed in London or Westminster, or in Edinburgh or Dublin, or shall have executed in the presence of, and delivered to some justice of the peace for the county, city, or place where such newspaper, pamphlet, or other paper shall be printed, if printed elsewhere, a bond to his majesty, his heirs and successors, together with two or three sufficient sureties, to the satisfaction of the baron of the exchequer taking such recognizance, or of the justice of the peace taking such bond, every person printing or publishing any such newspaper or pamphlet or paper aforesaid, in the sum of three hundred pounds, if such newspaper, pamphlet, or paper shall be printed in London or within twenty miles thereof, and in the sum of two hundred pounds, if such newspaper, pamphlet, or paper shall be printed elsewhere in the united kingdom, and his or her sureties in a like sum in the whole, conditioned that such printer or publisher shall pay to his majesty, his heirs and successors, every such fine or penalty as may at any time be imposed upon or adjudged against him or her, by reason of any conviction for printing or publishing any blasphemous or seditious libel, at any time after the entering into such recognizance or executing such bond; and that every person who shall print or first publish any such newspaper, pamphlet, or other paper, without having entered into such recognizance, or executed and delivered such bond with such sureties as aforesaid, shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.

No persons to print or publish newspapers, &c. or pamphlets, without entering into recognizance, or giving bond for securing fines upon conviction for libels.

Penalty 20l.

IX. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That in every case in which any surety or sureties in any such recognizance or bond shall have been required to pay and shall have paid the whole or any part of the sum for which he, she, or they shall have become surety; or in case any such surety or sureties shall become bankrupt, or be discharged under any insolvent act; then and in every such case the person for whom such surety or sureties shall have been bound, shall not print or publish any newspaper or pamphlet, or other paper aforesaid, until he or she shall, upon being required so to do by the commissioners of stamps for Great Britain and Ireland respectively, have entered into a new recognizance, or executed a new bond, with sufficient sureties, in the manner and to the amount aforesaid; and in case he or she shall print or publish any such newspaper or pamphlet, or other paper aforesaid, without having entered into such new recognizance, or executed such new bond as aforesaid, having been required so to do as aforesaid, he or she shall forfeit for every such offence the sum of twenty pounds.

If sureties pay any part of the money for which they are bound, or become bankrupt, new recognizance or bond with sureties must be given.

Penalty 20l.

X. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if any surety or sureties shall be desirous of withdrawing from such recognizance or bond, it shall and may be lawful to and for him or them so to do, upon giving twenty days previous notice in writing to the said commissioners of stamps respectively, or to the distributor of stamps of and for the district where the printer or publisher for whom he or they is or are surety or sureties shall reside, and also to such printer or publisher; and that in any such case, every such surety or sureties, from and after the expiration of such notice, shall not be liable upon the said bond or recognizance, other than and except for any penalty or penalties before that time imposed or incurred, and for which he or they would otherwise have been liable under the said recognizance or bond; and that then and in every such case, the person for whom such surety or sureties shall have been bound, shall not print or publish any newspaper or pamphlet, or other paper aforesaid, until he or she shall have entered into a new recognizance, or executed a new bond, with sufficient sureties in the manner and to the amount aforesaid; and in case he or she shall print or publish any such newspaper or pamphlet, or other paper aforesaid, without having entered into such new recognizance or bond as aforesaid, he or she shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.

XI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That no such bond as aforesaid shall be subject or liable to any stamp duty; any thing in any act or acts of parliament to the contrary notwithstanding.

XII. And be it further enacted, that lists of all the recognizances which shall have been entered into in the respective courts of exchequer in England, Scotland, or Ireland, shall, four times in each year, be transmitted to the commissioners managing the stamp duties in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, as the case may be, by the respective officers recording such recognizances in such respective courts; and all bonds executed under the provisions of this act, shall within ten days after the furthest after the execution thereof, be transmitted to the said commissioners respectively by the justices of the peace to whom the same shall have been respectively delivered.

XIII. And whereas the printer or publisher of any newspaper, and of any pamphlet and paper hereby enacted to be deemed and taken to be a newspaper, will, after the passing of this act, be bound, under and by virtue of the provisions contained in the said acts made and passed in the thirty-eighth and fifty-fifth years of his majesty's reign respectively, to deliver to the commissioners of stamps in Great Britain and Ireland respectively or or some distributor of stamps or other officer, on the day on which the same is published, or within a certain time afterwards, one of the newspapers, pamphlets, or papers so published, signed as in the said acts is respectively directed: and whereas it is expedient that the same or similar provisions and regulations should extend and be applied to all pamphlets and papers, whether published periodically or not, and which shall contain any public news, intelligence, or occurrence, or any remarks or observations thereon, or upon any matter in church or state, and which shall not exceed two sheets as aforesaid, or which shall be published for sale at a less price than sixpence; be it therefore enacted, that from and after ten days after the passing of this act, the printer or publisher of any pamphlet or other paper for sale, containing any public news, intelligence, or occurrences, or any remarks or observations thereon, or on any matter in church or state, shall, upon every day upon which the same shall be published, or within six days after, deliver to the commissioners of stamps for Great Britain and Ireland respectively, at their head offices, or to some distributor or officer to be appointed by them to receive the same, and whom they are hereby required to appoint for that purpose, one of the pamphlets or papers so published upon each such day, signed by the printer or publisher thereof, in his hand-writing with his name and place of abode; and the same shall be carefully kept by the said commissioners, or such distributor or officer as aforesaid, in such manner as the said commissioners shall direct; and such printer or publisher shall be entitled to demand and receive from the commissioners, or such distributor or officer, the amount of the retail price of such pamphlet or paper so delivered; and in every case in which the printer and publisher of such pamphlet or paper shall neglect to deliver one such pamphlet or paper in the manner hereinbefore directed, such printer and publisher shall, for every such neglect respectively, forfeit and lose the sum of one hundred pounds.

XIV. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That in case the said commissioners, or such distributor or officer aforesaid, shall refuse to receive or pay for any copy of such pamphlet or paper offered to be delivered to them or him as aforesaid, for or on account of the same not being within the true intent and meaning of this act, such commissioners, distributor, or officer shall, if required so to do, give and deliver to such printer or publisher a certificate in writing that a copy of such pamphlet or paper had been by him duly offered to be delivered; and such printer or publisher shall thereupon be freed and discharged from any penalty for not having delivered such copy as aforesaid.

XV. And be it further enacted, that if any person shall sell or expose to sale, any pamphlet or other paper not being duly stamped, if required to be stamped, such person shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.

XVI. And be it declared and enacted, that it shall be lawful for any of his majesty's courts of record at Westminster or Dublin, or of great session in Wales, or any judge thereof respectively, or for any court of quarter or general sessions of the peace, or for any justice of the peace before whom any person charged with having printed or published any blasphemous, seditious, or malicious libel shall be brought for the purpose of giving bail upon such charge, to make it a part of the condition of the recognizance to be entered into by such person and his or her bail; that the person so charged shall be of good behaviour during the continuance of such recognizance.

Recognizance, in case of libel, to be of good behaviour, as well as to appear to answer.

XVII. And be it further enacted, That all fines, penalties and forfeitures by this act imposed, shall be recovered by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information in any of his majesty's courts of record at Westminster or Dublin, or the courts of Great Session in the principality of Wales, or the courts of the counties palatine of Chester, Lancaster, and Durham, or in the court of session or court of exchequer in Scotland (as the case shall require), wherein no essoign, privilege, protection, wager of law, or more than one imparlance shall be allowed; or before any two justices of the peace of the county, riding, stewartry, city, or place where the offence shall be committed: provided always, that no larger amount in the whole than one hundred pounds shall be recoverable or recovered before any justices of the peace, for any such penalties incurred in any one day; any thing in this act, or any other acts of parliament contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any two or more justices of the peace in all cases in which they are authorized to hear and determine any offence or offences which shall be committed against this act, or any other act or acts of parliament which are by this act required to be construed therewith as part thereof, upon information exhibited or complaint made in that behalf, within three months after any such offence committed to summon the party accused, and also the witnesses on either side; and upon the appearance or contempt of the party accused in not appearing, to proceed to the examination of the witness or witnesses upon oath (which oath they are hereby empowered to administer), and to give judgment for the penalty or penalties incurred; and in case the party shall not immediately pay the said penalty or penalties to commit the offender to prison, there to remain for any time not exceeding six months, unless such pecuniary penalty or penalties shall be sooner paid and satisfied; and if any party shall find himself or herself aggrieved by the judgment of any such justices, then he, she, or they may, upon giving security to the amount or value of the penalty or penalties adjudged, together with such costs as may be awarded in case such judgment shall be affirmed, appeal to the justices of the peace at the next quarter or general sessions of the peace for the county, riding, division, or place, wherein such offence shall be committed, who are hereby empowered to summon and examine witnesses upon oath, and finally to hear and determine the same; and in case the judgment shall be affirmed, it shall be lawful for such justices to order the person or persons making such appeal, to pay such costs occasioned by such appeal, as to them shall seem meet; Provided nevertheless, that it shall and may be lawful for the said respective justices, where they shall see cause, to mitigate or lessen any such penalty or penalties, in such manner as they in their discretion shall think fit; the reasonable costs and charges of the officers or informers being always allowed over and above such mitigation; and so as such mitigation does not reduce the penalty to less than one fourth part thereof, over and above the said costs and charges.

Two or more justices to determine offences:

may mitigate penalties.

XLX. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall be summoned as a witness to give evidence before such justices of the peace touching any such offence, either on the part of the prosecutor or of the person or persons accused, and shall neglect or refuse to appear at the time and place to be for that purpose appointed, without a reasonable excuse for such his or her neglect or refusal, to be allowed of by the justices before whom the prosecution shall be depending, or appearing shall refuse to give evidence, then every such person shall forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding twenty pounds, to be levied and paid in such manner and by such means as is in this act directed as to other penalties.

Penalty on persons summoned as witnesses not appearing, &c.

XX. And be it further enacted, that the justices before whom any offender shall be convicted as aforesaid, shall cause the said conviction to be made out in the manner and form following, or in any other form of words to the like effect mutatis mutandis; that is to say,

Convictions to be made out in the following form.

" County of                      } Be it remembered, that on                      at                      A. B to wit.                      }                      of                      was duly convicted before us,
 " of his majesty's justices of the peace for                      in pursuance of an " act passed in the sixtieth year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled an

" act [title of this act]; for that the said A. B. on the day of 1887,
 " now last past, did [here state the offence, as the case may happen to be];
 " trary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided; for which
 " fence we do adjudge that the said A. B. hath forfeited the sum of 100 £.
 " and [if the justices mitigate the penalty] which sum of 100 £.
 " we do hereby mitigate to the sum of 50 £.
 " hands and seals, this day of 1887.

Order or conviction of justices not to be removed into any court, or the execution superseded.

No actions for penalties shall be commenced but in the name of the attorney-general in England and Ireland, and advocate for Scotland, or some officer of the stamp duties.

Duties to be under the management of the commissioners of stamps.

Duties and discounts to be paid and allowed as for former duties and discounts; and provisions of former acts to extend to this act.

Application of duties.

XXI. And be it further enacted, that no order or conviction made in pursuance of this act by any justices of the peace, shall be removed by certiorari, writ of error, or suspension into any court whatever; and that no writ of certiorari, writ of error, or suspension shall supersede execution or other proceedings upon any such order or conviction, but that execution and other proceedings shall be had thereupon as such writ or writs or allowance thereof notwithstanding.

XXII. And be it further enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons whatsoever to commence, prosecute, enter, or file, or cause or procure to be commenced, prosecuted, entered or filed, any action, bill, plaint, or information in any of his majesty's courts, or before any justice or justices of the peace against any person or persons, for the recovery of any fine, penalty or forfeiture under incurred by virtue of this act, unless the same be commenced, prosecuted, entered, or filed in the name of his majesty's attorney-general in that part of Great Britain called England, or in the name of his majesty's attorney-general in Ireland, or his majesty's advocate for Scotland (as the case may be respectively); or in the name of the solicitor or some other officer of his majesty's stamp duties in that part of Great Britain called England, or in Scotland or Ireland respectively; and if any action, bill, plaint or information shall be commenced, prosecuted, entered, or filed in the name or names of any other person or persons than he or she or they in that behalf before mentioned, the same and every proceeding thereupon had, are hereby declared, and the same shall be null and void to all intents and purposes.

XXIII. And be it further enacted, That for the better and more effectually levying and collecting the said duties, the same shall be under the government, care, and management of the commissioners for the time being appointed in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, to manage the duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; who, or the major part of them, in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, are hereby required and empowered to do all other things necessary to be done for putting this act into execution, with relation to the said duties hereby granted, in the like and in as full and ample a manner as they or the major part of them were authorized to put in execution any law or laws concerning stamped vellum, parchment, and paper.

XXIV. And be it further enacted, That the said duties shall be and are hereby made payable to his majesty, his heirs and successors; and the said duties and the several allowances, discounts, and sums of money, for or in respect of the same, shall and may be respectively raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, adjudged, accounted for, and applied and appropriated, mitigated and allowed, in such and the like manner, and in or by any or either of the general, or special ways, means, or methods, by which the duties upon newspapers, and discounts and allowances in respect thereof, under the management of the said commissioners of stamped vellum, parchment, or paper, are or may be raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, adjudged, mitigated and allowed; and the several persons and also all such pamphlets and papers, of what nature or kind soever, by this act made liable to the payment of duty, or entitled to any discount or allowance, shall be and the same are hereby made subject and liable to all and every the conditions, regulations, rules, and restrictions, to which such persons and newspapers are generally or specially subject and liable by any act or acts of parliament in force before the passing of this act; and all and every pain, penalty, fine, or forfeiture for any offence whatever committed against or in breach of any act or acts of parliament now in force for securing the duties under the management of the said commissioners of stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, upon newspapers, or for the regulation or improvement of the said duties, and the several clauses, powers, provisions, directions, matters, and things therein contained, shall (except as the same or any of them are by this act altered or repealed) and are hereby directed and declared to extend to, and shall be respectively applied, practised, and put in execution for and in respect of the several duties charged, imposed, and allowed, in as full and ample a manner, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as if all and every the said clauses, provisions, powers, restrictions, directions, fines, pains, penalties or forfeitures, matters and things, were particularly repeated and re-enacted in the body of this act.

XXV. And be it further enacted, that the monies arising from the duties hereby granted shall be paid into the receipt of the exchequer at Westminster and Dublin, respectively, and shall be carried to and made part of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

XXVI. Provided always, and be it further enacted, that nothing in this act shall Exceptions. extend to acts of parliament, proclamations, orders of council, forms of prayer and thanksgiving, and acts of state, ordered to be printed by his majesty, his heirs, or successors, or his or their sufficient and authorized officer; or to any printed votes or other matters by order of either House of Parliament; or to books commonly used in the schools of Great Britain or Ireland, or books or papers containing only matters of devotion, piety, or charity; or daily accounts; or bills of goods imported and exported; or warrants or certificates for the delivery of goods; and the weekly bills of mortality; or to papers containing any lists of prices current, or of the state of the markets, or any account of the arrival, sailing, or other circumstances relating to merchant ships or vessels; or of any other matter wholly of a commercial nature; provided such bills, lists or accounts do not contain any other matter than what hath been usually comprised therein; or to the printers or publishers of the foregoing matters, or any or either of them.

XXVII. Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to charge with stamp duties any work Reprinted works repub-
bers not chargeable
with stamp
duty, &c. reprinted and republished in parts or numbers, whether such work shall be wholly reprinted or shall be republished in an abridged form; provided that the work so reprinted and republished shall have been first printed and published two years at the least previous to such reprinting and republication, and provided the said work was not first published in any parts or numbers.

XXVIII. And be it further enacted, that this act may be altered, amended, or Act may be
tered this session. repealed, by any act to be passed in the present session of parliament.
